Mr. GALLINGER. I will say that the purpose the committee had in view beyond question was the appointment of persons outside of Congress, and I am sure that the President would not for a moment consider the matter of appointing a Member of either branch of Congress on a commission of this kind.

Mr. HALE. That is the purpose of the committee?

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the purpose of the committee.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I should like to say one thing, suggested by the inquiry and the answer, which I think it is proper to say here. I suppose I am warranted in saying that a majority of the Senate, certainly with substantial unanimity two important committees of the Senate of which I am a member—I think there is but one exception—think that the practice of appointing Members of this or the other House of Congress to such important public places by the President, whether with or without the advice and consent of the Senate, is one which on the whole is not a good one. A great many Members of the Senate think it is contrary to the Constitution of the United States. I think one Senator, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], said in my hearing somewhere, when it was proposed to the Senate to confirm such appointees on one occasion, that if the commissioners were officers they could not lawfully be appointed, and if they were not officers they could not lawfully be confirmed by the Senate. I thought that was a suggestion of great weight.

But the practice has grown up. It did not originate with the present President. The first examples of it in this administration were at a time when a particular diplomatic service was such that it seemed there was hardly another man in the United States so fit for the particular function as a very eminent Member of this body, who sits near me on my left. He was selected, and the public desire for that most valuable service caused the general principle to be lost sight of. So nobody, I suppose, wanted to do anything or to say anything which would seem to blame the President of the United States. Still less did anybody wish to do anything or to say anything which would seem to cast any reflection whatever on the Members of the Senate who had undertaken in important and difficult periods of our history these important and difficult and responsible duties.

But at the same time many people think it is unconstitutional, as I do. Many others think that it establishes a wrong relation between the Executive and the Senate to put it in the power of the Executive to select from this body Members for special public honors and distinctions, for the most attractive public employments, and in some cases it must be a serious embarrassment to Members of the Senate. For instance, if Senators who negotiate a treaty come back with it and it is laid before the Senate, how can any of their associates argue to their minds in debate here the wisdom of such a measure? They come pledged beforehand. Before their senatorial duty begins another duty has affected and influenced their minds.

I am sure, after the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire, that there is no purpose of continuing that practice. I think it would be better, at some time when there is nobody immediately concerned and interested—so that it could not be supposed to be doing anything to reflect on anyone—that Congress should pass a law or resolution expressing its disapprobation of that practice.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President—

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Georgia permit me just one moment to offer an amendment?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, sympathizing with the view the Senator from Massachusetts holds as to men in public life being appointed on commissions, I desire to offer an amendment to the bill. I move to amend by inserting, after the word "persons," in line 3, the words: "No one of whom shall be a Member of either branch of Congress."

That would seem to meet that objection, certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 3, after the word "persons," page 1, insert:

"No one of whom shall be a Member of either House of Congress."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am not entirely sure that that amendment is a proper one. The object sought to be accomplished is undoubtedly proper, and that is that no one who is a Member of either House of Congress shall, while a Member of Congress, perform the duties of one of these commissioners. But it is certainly entirely practicable to appoint a Member of Congress if he proposes to give up his seat in Congress for the purpose of accepting it.

The position ascribed by the Senator from Massachusetts to myself was not stated with exact accuracy, although it is very rare that that criticism can be made upon anything which is said by the Senator from Massachusetts. The position which I think is a correct one is not that a Member of Congress can not be appointed to the office, but that if a Member of Congress is appointed to any office his acceptance ipso facto vacates his seat either in the Senate or in the House.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, my statement, I think, was that the Senator said if it were an office he could not hold it; but, of course, if he ceased to be a Member of Congress, he could fill it.

Mr. BACON. That he could not hold his position as a Congressman at the same time?

Mr. HOAR. Yes; that is what I meant to say; and if it were not an office the duty could not be put upon the Senate of confirming him.

Mr. BACON. Now, Mr. President, I am in entire sympathy with the object sought to be accomplished by this amendment. I think, however, there should be a change of phraseology, because it is certainly competent for the President, under the Constitution at least, to appoint a Member of the Senate or a Member of the House to any office, and it has frequently been done in the past, the understanding being, of course, that he surrenders his position as a Senator or as a Representative when he accepts it.

I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts such a change of phraseology as would simply cover the point that no one should serve while a Member of Congress, because it is entirely competent for the President to appoint him and entirely competent for him to accept it; but if he accepts he vacates his office as a Member of the Senate or of the House.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator suggest phraseology that would suit him? Of course, it is competent for Congress to prohibit the appointment of Senators and Members of the House.

Mr. BACON. I do not think that ought to be done, because there might be a man eminently fitted for the position, and he might be willing to surrender his place in the Senate or in the House to accept it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly. I shall be glad to accept an amendment to the amendment if the Senator will suggest it.

Mr. BACON. I have not drawn it. I am sure the Senator from New Hampshire, with his accustomed facility in such matters, will readily make the desired change.

Mr. HOAR. May I make a suggestion?

Mr. BACON. I have not quite finished, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. HOAR. May I make a suggestion before you go on, because I should like to have you give your opinion on it.

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest the following:

"Provided, That no Member of either House of Congress shall hereafter serve under any appointment made by the executive department of the Government while holding his office as such Member."

So the matter was disposed of for that occasion, but the discussion was renewed a few years later in 1903 when Mr. Hoar again spoke at length upon the same subject.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. On the record just read it seems the constitutional question was not raised. They conceded, it seemed to me, what was vital to their cause, and that is that a Member of Congress could accept the office if he would resign. Of course, the constitutional provision goes further than that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, yes. The resolution provided for the creation of the commission, and, of course, the constitutional question was involved because the Members were taking pains that the resolution should be so framed as that if the President wanted to appoint a Member of Congress upon it he would not be permitted to do so by the very terms of the resolution itself.

Mr. NORRIS. But under the terms of the constitutional provision the resignation of a Member of Congress would still leave him ineligible.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is quite right about that as to an office created or the emoluments whereof had been increased during the term for which he was elected, but I take it that those Senators were considering the matter of the appointment of a Member of Congress to an office which was in existence before they came to the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, as I understand the Senator from Nebraska, he is making the practical point that neither the Senator from Utah nor the Representative from Ohio could qualify by resigning now and accepting the appointment as a member of the commission.

Mr. NORRIS. If it is an office, under the meaning of the Constitution, then the resignation of either one of them would not qualify him.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is quite true, but as in the case of former Senator Kenyon, the office of the United States circuit judge having been created before he was elected, he may resign his place in the Senate and accept that appointment.

Mr. NORRIS. That, of course, is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But even that practice was to some extent condemned by Senators in the discussion to which I am referring.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further to me?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am compelled to leave the Chamber for a few moments on an important matter. I do not wish to divert the Senator from the line of argument he is now pursuing, but on yesterday the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] asked the Senator from Montana a question which implied doubt in the mind of the Senator from Connecticut as to whether the commissionership created by the act we are discussing constitutes an office, and his doubt seemed to arise in part by reason of the fact that no salary is attached to the commissionership.

So far as my information goes, and I think the Senator from Montana stated yesterday that it was his opinion, the matter of salary is not essential to the creation of an office.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I had intended to submit some authorities on that point.

Mr. ROBINSON. With the Senator's permission I wish to submit some now that I have before me.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall be grateful to the Senator if he will do so.

Mr. ROBINSON. I quote from Words and Phrases, a standard authority:

"The oath, the salary, or fees are mere incidents, and they constitute no part of the office."

There are cited a number of cases to support that doctrine, including Clarke v. Stanley (66 N. C., 59); State Prison of North Carolina v. Day (32 S. E., 748, 46 L. R. A., 295). All of these are North Carolina cases, but there are other cases which sustain that doctrine, and none to the contrary. So the fact that no salary attaches to these commissionerships is not a material consideration in determining the question as to whether or not they in fact constitute offices within the meaning of the Constitution.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am obliged to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what became of the resolution to which he referred a few moments ago? Was the amendment adopted and was the resolution passed as amended?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I assume so.

Mr. FLETCHER. And that question referred to a particular commission?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; it was not general.

The subject again engaged the attention of the Senate in the year 1903, on February 26 of that year, as shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 36, part 3, Fifty-seventh Congress, second session, as follows:

Mr. HALE. * * * I want to call the attention of Senators, and especially of certain old Senators, to the attitude which the Senate has taken very clearly in reference to the practice, which the Senate reprobated, of selecting members of this body for appointment on commissions to negotiate treaties which are to be reported to the Senate.

The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] will very well remember that upon an occasion where the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Cullom] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Morgan] had been appointed upon an important commission, to be confirmed by the Senate, the Senate declined to confirm the nominees upon the ground that it would not further consent to the selection of members of this body to negotiate important treaties that were to be reported to the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me to inquire what reference he has made to me?

Mr. HALE. I think it was a commission that dealt with questions and subjects in Hawaii, where I think the Senators visited the islands and made a report. They had been appointed by the President, to be confirmed by the Senate; but so strong was the feeling in the Senate, upon the statement of the case and the ill effects of this practice, presented by the senior Senator from Massachusetts, that the Senate declined to confirm them, and they never were confirmed.

I need not say in that connection, Mr. President, the very high character of both the Senators named—Senator Cullom, of Illinois, and Senator Morgan, of Alabama—and the esteem in which they were both held by all Members of the body at that time without regard to politics, leaves our minds in no doubt that the objection was not at all personal in its nature.

Mr. Tillman offered to the resolution then under consideration an amendment, in substance, like that offered to the resolution referred to heretofore, providing that no Senator or Representative should be appointed upon the commission, and with reference to that Mr. Bacon spoke as follows:

Mr. President, this matter was quite carefully considered in a former Congress, and I think the judgment of the Senate has come to be practically unanimous upon the subject of the impropriety of the appointment of Senators and Representatives to any other position than that which relates strictly to their legislative duties. The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar], the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, is present, and of course is best capacitated to speak upon what occurred in reference to the subject under a resolution introduced by himself and considered by the Judiciary Committee. So I shall not now undertake, as he is present, to recite what did occur and what was done in pursuance thereof; but if the Senator from Massachusetts will relate it, it will cast great light upon the attitude assumed by the Senate and especially by the Judiciary Committee in reference to this matter.

I only rose, Mr. President, for the purpose of particularly calling attention to the fact that, however correct the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Foraker] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Aldrich] may be as to the desirability upon certain occasions that Senators should serve upon any of these commissions, it is distinctly in opposition to the express policy, if not to the express command of the Constitution of the United States. The policy of the Constitution and the design of the Constitution is that no man occupying a seat in this Chamber or in the other House shall exercise any other function in the shape of an office under the Government. So far as it may be technically an office, that is distinctly and positively prohibited. The only possible escape from the prohibition is to say that a position on one of those commissions is not an office. But whether it is or is not technically an office, it is distinctly in contravention of the policy which is declared by this prohibition which I now read to the Senate. In Article I of the Constitution, in the second paragraph of section 6, there is this provision:

"No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time."

Now—

"and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office."

I say, Mr. President, that the only escape from that as a distinct, direct prohibition is the technical position that a place on one of those commissions is not an office; but even if there is that escape from the technical prohibition, there is no escape from the broad, unambiguous expression of the policy of the Constitution, that no man holding a seat in this Chamber shall hold any other position under the Government.

Then, Mr. President, after some considerable discussion Mr. Hoar participated in the debate. I think that it will be universally conceded that on questions of this character the utterances of no man who ever sat in this body are entitled to a higher degree of respect and consideration than those of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. He expressed himself on the occasion referred to as follows:

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I have taken very great interest in the question raised by the proposed amendment of the Senator from South Carolina, and I hope he will take an opportunity, or that some other Senator will—if nobody else does I shall, if I can get one—to bring up this question of the appointment by the President of Senators and Representatives in the other House for important public functions under circumstances where it can be carefully and thoughtfully dealt with as we should deal with a proposed amendment to the Constitution, or as we should have dealt with it if we had been in the Constitutional Convention in the beginning.

It is evident that it can not be so dealt with to-day. There is no time for a full discussion. It comes up on a measure to which it is hardly germane after the statements of gentlemen who are likely to know what is expected, that there is not thought or probability—the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Aldrich] corrects me by saying "possibility"—of individuals being taken from either House of Congress for this commission. So I hope the matter will be brought up at some time when it is not entangled in the least by personal considerations in regard to our colleagues or gentlemen in the other House who may have been asked to do such service, and will be dealt with solely as a broad general principle for the future.

Mr. President, a great many years ago a President of the United States—I am not sure whether it was in President Hayes's time or Gen. Grant's or a little later—was called upon to make up a commission to go to Europe to deal with the silver question, and he appointed on that commission—if I may be permitted to say so—the one man in this country who was fitted for that duty. That was the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Allison], now chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I took the liberty then of expressing my feeling of anxiety that that act might grow into a precedent and be the occasion of public complaint.

Later, in President McKinley's time, there were some eight or ten appointments made from this body of a like character, and they were, I suppose, appointments that the whole country regarded as most admirable for the public service. They were men who had studied the subjects with which they were to deal, men of great capacity, and that they were men of the highest quality of personal integrity it is unnecessary to say.

But I have no doubt it seemed to a large majority of the Senate, on reflection, that the practice had better not go further, and two measures were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary—one a general law, the other a resolve of the Senate. The committee carefully considered them. It happened that there were three members of the committee at that time who had been among those who had been selected for such functions. The committee almost unanimously agreed to a resolution disapproving of this practice. One or two of the members thought the President ought not to be restricted in his resources for that branch of the public service. However, the committee thought such a resolution might be construed into some discourtesy to the gentlemen who had acted in such places. One of the men who was then acting as a commissioner under such an appointment was one of the most zealous and emphatic in favor of the resolution. He said he had accepted the place hastily, and he agreed that the practice ought not to go further.

But the committee thought it was not best, under the circumstances, to report the matter at that time, and instructed me to call upon the President and tell him what had happened and say to him that the committee hoped the practice would not be continued. I suppose there is no indelicacy in my reporting what happened. President McKinley said he was aware of the objections; that he had come to feel them very strongly; and while he did not say in terms that he would not make another appointment of the same kind, he conveyed to me, and I am sure meant to convey to me, an assurance that it would not occur again. But he said it was impossible to understand how few people there were in this country who were out of the Senate and the House who were qualified for important diplomatic service of that kind; that we had to contend with the trained diplomats of Europe, men who had studied the subject all their lives. He went over some of the difficulties he had encountered in making selections of ministers abroad for some very important matters that were expected to be dealt with. Our people came from entirely other service and conditions. He might have added what is an additional strong consideration, that we have to deal with nations who can wait, while in general our political conditions and diplomatic condition are such that we can not wait.

The American people want to have a question settled and have it over. Great Britain says to us, "Well, if you do not come to my terms I will be here 50 years hence, and my minister of foreign relations very likely will be here 20 years hence, and we will wait. We are in no hurry."

But at the same time, in spite of all those considerations, it seems to me it is a violation of the sound principles of the Constitution as enunciated in the clause read by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Bacon]. The Constitution says the President shall not have patronage enough at his command to give a Senator, during his senatorial term, a $20 a year post office in his country seat, where perhaps he is the only man who resides there receiving letters. During the term for which a Senator is elected he can not be appointed to any place which has been created or the salary of which has been increased by sixpence during the whole six years.

So careful were the framers of the Constitution of executive influence and control. And yet if the practice is to go on the President may come into the Senate, pick out a half a dozen of our Members and send them to Europe, where they spend the summer in the most honorable positions on the face of the earth, meeting the society of foreign capitals, and then he can pay them out of the contingent fund at his disposal a sum three times greater than our salary. Now, does anybody suppose the framers of the Constitution would have approved of that? It is the question of the relation between the legislative power and the executive power. There were two things of which our fathers, when they framed the Constitution, were especially afraid. One was corruption in office—and that was provided for by impeachment—and the other an executive influence over legislation.

Mr. President, it seems to me at some convenient time we must have this matter out and have it settled so far as an act of Congress can settle it. At the same time I wish to say there is not, in my judgment, the smallest criticism to be made of the purity of purpose and patriotism of the gentlemen who in the past have been selected by the Executive for these various offices.

Take the late Senator from Minnesota, now unhappily withdrawn from the sphere of public service. It would be difficult for me to put into words an expression of higher esteem for the senatorial character as exemplified by any man with whom I have ever served than by that intelligent, brave, patriotic, and courteous man, so accomplished and delightful in every relation of life, a great citizen, a great soldier, a great Senator.

It is only when the President is forced to say, "The Senator I want to employ is the fittest man in the world for the service, and I can not find anybody else," that it will be done this year or has been done last year or will be done next year. But if the practice is once established it will be done as a matter of course. Senators can not accept an office, but they can do something which has ten times the power and the distinction and the compensation of an office, and a measure can be carried through, if we ever have an unscrupulous Executive, by the knowledge that Senators are to be appointed to discharge the functions. It seems to me that hardly a more dangerous practice can be conceived of than this one.

I hope the question as to what the Senate think on this subject or what they seem to think by their votes will not be determined on a mere amendment coming in at the close of a session, when we can have no extended debate upon it, and on a bill which is not especially germane and to which it practically has no relation.

In these eloquent words, Mr. President, Senator Hoar pointed out that the mere matter of salaries is a small consideration; and, of course, we all know—it has been disclosed here in the Senate recently—that to many men the salary that is attached to the position they hold is a matter of small consequence, it being revealed that at least $200,000, or thereabouts, was spent to secure for a Senator a seat in this body. The dignity of the office, the honor which is attached to it, and similar considerations are often—it might perhaps be said in a majority of cases as to the higher offices, the Cabinet positions, for instance—valued very much more highly than the salary. Accordingly, Mr. President, the courts have held that the fact that no salary is attached to a place is of no consequence. The Senator from Arkansas has called your attention to some of the decisions upon that point; and in the report of Speaker Henderson the case of In re Corliss, decided in Rhode Island, was referred to. That is so interesting, and the discussion is so logical, that I take the liberty of reading from it.

In that case, Mr. President, one George H. Corliss was chosen as an elector of President and Vice President of the United States in November, 1876, and when he was so chosen he was the commissioner from Rhode Island of the United States Centennial Commission. Thereupon the governor, acting under article 10, section 3, of the constitution of the State, which provides that "the judges of the supreme court shall give their written opinion upon any question of law whenever requested by the governor," addressed a communication to the supreme court asking for their official opinion as to whether Mr. Corliss, in view of the provision of the constitution, was an officer of the United States which disqualified him from election as an elector of President and Vice President. After reciting the provisions of the act, the supreme court said:

It is apparent from this statement, which is but partial, that the duties and functions of the commission were various, delicate, and important; that they could be successfully performed only by men of large experience and knowledge of affairs; and that they were not merely subordinate and provisional, but in the highest degree authoritative, discretionary, and final in their character. We think that persons performing such duties and exercising such functions, in pursuance of statutory direction and authority, are not to be regarded as mere employees, agents, or committeemen, but that they are, properly speaking, officers, and that the places which they hold are offices. It appears, moreover, that they were originally regarded as officers by Congress, for the act under which they were appointed declares, section 7, that "no compensation for services shall be paid to the commissioners or other officers, provided by this act, from the Treasury of the United States." The only other officers provided for were the "alternates" appointed to serve as commissioners when the commissioners were unable to attend.

We think, too, the office is an office "under the United States." It was created by act of Congress, and all its powers and duties were conferred and imposed by Congress. It was created, not for the service of any particular State or section but in the interest of all the States united. The commissioners were appointed under the act by the President, and were commissioned like other United States officers. There seems to be no room for doubt upon this point.

Is it an "office of trust or profit under the United States"? It is not an office of profit under the United States, for the commissioners are not entitled to any pay from the United States nor to any perquisite or emolument under any law of the United States. But we think it is an office of trust. It is true that originally the United States had no pecuniary interest in the exhibition. The commissioners, however, were to be intrusted with a large supervisory and regulative control of the property sent for exhibition; and from the time the Government gave its sanction to the exhibition, and especially after the President issued his proclamation, the honor and reputation of the United States were pledged for its proper management to its own citizens and to the foreign nations. From that time the honor and reputation of the United States were largely in the keeping of the commissioners; and in this view there was a very delicate and important trust imposed in them. It would be a narrow, and we think an improper interpretation, to hold that an office is an office of trust only when the officer has the handling of public money or property or the care and oversight of some pecuniary interest of the Government. But even if it were so, there came a time when the United States did become pecuniarily interested in the exhibition by the appropriation of a million and a half of dollars for it, to be repaid out of the profits if any should accrue; and when, also, valuable property belonging to the United States was exhibited on the exhibition grounds. We repeat that the office is, in our opinion, an office of trust.

Mr. President, I think the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] correctly stated the necessary elements that make an office. The first question is, Is it created by law? Undoubtedly this commission was created by law, by an act of Congress. Second, is the officer or are the commissioners intrusted with a portion of the sovereign power of the Government, either to legislate, to enact law, to execute a law, or to construe a law? There can be no doubt that the commission is created for the purpose of executing this law.

Those are the essential features. The compensation may possibly help to characterize a position as one official in its character rather than a mere employment, or it may not. So, likewise, other features may enter or may not.

Just exactly what are essential features of an office was the subject of consideration in the case of Groves against Barden, reported in One hundred and sixty-ninth North Carolina, and also reported in Annotated Cases for 1917, volume D. In the opinion in that case the court said:

In determining whether a position is an office, place of trust or profit, or an employment the authorities, which are collected in the valuable note to Attorney General v. Tillinghast (17 Ann. Cas., 452), attach significance to the fact that an oath to support the Constitution is required, or that a bond for the faithful performance of duties must be executed, or that the duties are prescribed by law and not regulated by contract, or that the incumbent discharges independent duties and is not acting under the direction of others, or that the duties are continuing and permanent in their nature and are not occasional or intermittent, or that the term is fixed and continuing and not temporary, or that the position is named an office or an employment in the statute creating it; but in the absence of a constitutional provision these are only circumstances which are entitled to consideration and are not determinative or conclusive.

The editor of the note says: "It may be stated as a general rule, fairly deducible from the cases discussing this question, that a position is a public office when it is created by law, with duties cast upon the incumbent which involve an exercise of some portion of the sovereign power and in the performance of which the public is concerned and which also are continuing in their nature and not occasional or intermittent, while a public employment, on the other hand, is a position which lacks one or more of the foregoing elements."

CREATION OF POSITION.

To constitute an office it is essential that the position shall be created by the constitution or statutes of the sovereignty or that the sovereign power shall have delegated to an inferior body the right to create the position in question.

Citing a large number of cases.

POWERS AND DUTIES.

An indispensable element of a public office as distinguished from an employment is that the duties of the incumbent of an office shall involve an exercise of some portion of the sovereign power.

TENURE OF OFFICE.

In several recent decisions the presence of a definite tenure has been referred to as a circumstance tending to show that the position in question was an office, and in other decisions the absence of tenure has been considered with other circumstances in holding that the position was a mere employment.

Of course, here there is a definite tenure of three years.

OFFICIAL BOND.

The fact that a person occupying a position is or is not compelled to give a bond for the faithful performance of his duties does not seem to be an absolute criterion by which to distinguish between an office and an employment, but in several recent cases the presence or absence of a bond has been considered in connection with other circumstances.

OATH OF OFFICE.

The duty to take an oath of office is a strong circumstance in distinguishing between an office and an employee, and in a number of recent cases that circumstance is considered with others in determining the character of the position in question.

Citing cases.

COMPENSATION.

While the compensation of a public officer is generally fixed by law, the manner in which the compensation of a position is fixed is not an absolute test to determine whether the position is an office or an employment, but is merely a circumstance to be considered in connection with other matters in determining the question.

Reference is made in a number of these paragraphs to the view that the duties to be performed must be in a measure continuous, and not entirely intermittent. Just exactly what is meant by that is made clear in the case of United States against Germaine, reported in Ninety-ninth United States. That is the case to which reference has heretofore been made of the appointment of a surgeon to aid the Commissioner of Pensions in the discharge of his duties. The court says:

If we look to the nature of defendant's employment, we think it equally clear that he is not an officer. In Hartwell's case the court said the term embraces the ideas of tenure, duration, emoluments, and duties, and in that case it said the latter were continuing, and * * * permanent, not occasional or temporary. In the case before us the duties are not continuing and permanent, and they are occasional and intermittent. The surgeon is only to act when called on by the Commissioner of Pensions in some special case, as when some pensioner or claimant of a pension presents himself for examination. He may make 50 of these examinations in a year or none. He is required to keep no place of business for the public use. He gives no bond and takes no oath unless by some order of the Commissioner of Pensions of which we are not advised.

Mr. President, the discussions in the Senate to which I have adverted canvass at some length the propriety of appointments such as these as a matter of policy, and not as a matter of power; but the contention which I have advanced that these appointments are prohibited by the Constitution is supported by the powerful men who were in the Senate during the early portion of the present century, and particularly by Senator Bacon on the Democratic side and by Senator Hoar upon the Republican side.

The remarks of Senator Bacon seem to me particularly apt here; namely, that the appointments can be justified only by resorting to a technicality in the construction of the language of the Constitution. That they contravene the spirit of the Constitution, he said, can not be controverted; and to that view I think a candid consideration of the subject will force every reflecting mind.

These appointments which have come before us include, of course, the appointment of three members of the Cabinet. Those, of course, stand upon an entirely different footing. It is often argued that when one is appointed to a Federal office, particularly a very important Federal office, it is implied that it shall take his entire time, and that his appointment to any other office is impliedly forbidden in the Constitution. I make no such contention. I do not think there is any doubt about the eligibility of members of the Cabinet to the positions for which they have been nominated, and I make no contention here against their confirmation. The question upon which I have addressed the Senate relates only to the Members of Congress who have been named upon this important commission.

If nothing else is to be said upon the resolution, Mr. President, I ask for a vote upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HARRISON and Mr. REED. Let it be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the resolution.

The Assistant Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 244), submitted yesterday by Mr. WALSH of Montana, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it hereby is, directed to inquire into and report to the Senate, not later than Tuesday next (Feb. 28, 1922), touching the eligibility of Hon. REED SMOOT and Hon. THEODORE E. BURTON to membership on the commission created by the act of Congress approved February 9, 1922, entitled "An act to create a commission authorized to refund or convert obligations of foreign Governments held by the United States of America, and for other purposes," reference being made to section 6 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, as follows:

"No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

MARINE INSURANCE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2265) to regulate marine insurance in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, which were, on page 1, line 3, to strike out "Chapter" and insert "Title"; on page 3, line 16, to strike out "Chapter" and insert "Title"; on page 11, line 1, to strike out "Chapter" and insert "Title"; on page 12, line 6, to strike out "Chapter" and insert "Title"; on page 12, line 18, to strike out "Chapter" and insert "Title"; on page 21, line 20, to strike out "and"; on page 21, line 24, to strike out "and"; on page 21, after line 26, to insert:

SEC. 17. Nothing herein shall be construed so as to relieve any corporation organized or doing business under the provisions hereof from the payment of taxes on its income under the revenue laws of the United States.

On page 22, line 1, to strike out "Chapter" and insert "Title"; on page 22, line 3, to strike out "17" and insert "18"; on page 24, line 14, after "faith," to insert "in order to prevent losses and"; on page 24, line 17, to strike out "18" and insert "19"; on page 24, line 18, after "estate," to insert "only"; on page 24, line 19, to strike out "only"; on page 26, line 1, to strike out "Chapter" and insert "Title"; on page 26, line 2, to strike out "19" and insert "20"; on page 26, line 7, to strike out all after "company," down to and including "the" in line 13, and insert "The"; on page 27, line 5, to strike out all after "District," down to and including "office" in line 8; on page 28, line 10, to strike out "Chapter" and insert "Title"; on page 28, line 12, to strike out "20" and insert "21"; on page 29, line 5, to strike out "21" and insert "22"; on page 29, line 19, to strike out "Chapter" and insert "Title"; on page 29, line 21, to strike out "22" and insert "23"; on page 30, line 17, to strike out "23" and insert "24"; on page 32, line 9, to strike out "24" and insert "25"; on page 34, line 3, to strike out "25" and insert "26"; on page 34, line 10, to strike out "Chapter" and insert "Title"; on page 34, line 11, to strike out "26" and insert "27"; on page 35, line 17, to strike out "Chapter" and insert "Title"; on page 35, line 18, to strike out "27" and insert "28"; on page 36, line 1, to strike out "28" and insert "29"; on page 36, line 14, to strike out "Chapter" and insert "Title"; on page 36, line 16, to strike out "29" and insert "30"; on page 36, line 22, to strike out "Chapter" and insert "Title"; on page 36, line 24, to strike out "30" and insert "31"; and on page 37, after line 4, to insert:

SEC. 32. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby reserved.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The amendments are largely of a formal character, and those which are not are of no particular importance. Therefore I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, this is considered to be a very important bill, one especially important in connection with the merchant marine. I feel it is but just to say that while it is a Senate bill it was largely the product of the House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, of which Representative GREENE of Massachusetts is chairman, and the result of investigations carried on by that committee.

TREATY WITH JAPAN.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in open executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty between the United States and Japan with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator, in particular the island of Yap, signed at Washington on February 11, 1922.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to article 1.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Asburst	Harrison	New	Simmons
Borah	Heflin	Newberry	Smith
Bursum	Johnson	Nicholson	Spencer
Cameron	Jones, N. Mex.	Norbeck	Stanfield
Capper	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Sterling

France	McKinley	Pomerene	Watson, Ga.
Gerry	McLean	Ransdell	Williams
Glass	McNary	Reed	Willis
Gooding	Moses	Sheppard
Harris	Nelson	Shortridge

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, we now have under consideration the matter of the ratification of the treaty between the United States and Japan with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean, lying north of the Equator, in particular the island of Yap, which was signed at Washington on February 11, 1922.

It is not my purpose at this time and in these remarks to discuss the policy upon which, in my opinion, will depend the advisability of ratifying or rejecting this treaty. I desire that this discussion shall determine definitely, if possible, the correct construction to be placed upon the various material paragraphs of the treaty and the effect the treaty will have upon the rights and privileges of the United States and its nationals in said islands, and particularly the island of Yap.

We should first determine what are our rights and privileges in these islands at the present time and then what rights and privileges we reserve in the event of the ratification of the pending treaty. All of these islands were possessed by the German Empire at the beginning of the World War. During that war these islands came into the possession of the United States and Japan through conquest of war. The principal allied and associated powers, which consisted of Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, and the United States, took the grounds that these islands, being conquered territory, should become the property of and be held in common by such powers. This right was asserted by such powers prior to the execution and ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany, commonly known as the Versailles treaty. In that treaty it was provided, in article 119, that:

Germany renounces in favor of the principal allied and associated powers all her rights and titles over her overseas possessions.

There is no controversy over the fact that all of the islands described in the pending treaty come under the provisions of said article 119. There is some difference of opinion, however, between the United States and some of the allied powers as to whether or not the title of the allied and associated powers in and to such islands is dependent entirely upon such cession in article 119 of the Versailles treaty or whether it is deraigned through the conquest of such islands during the war.

The United States Government, through both the former and the present administration, has uniformly and firmly contended that this Government was in no way dependent upon the provisions of the Versailles treaty for its rights and privileges in said islands, and that the rights that it had obtained through conquest in a war against Germany could not be divested without its authority either through the League of Nations or the principal allied powers or otherwise.

On the other hand, it is contended that the sovereignty of the principal allied and associated powers over these islands is derived from the Versailles treaty and is subject to all of the qualifications and limitations contained in the treaty. For instance, in the same treaty with said article 119 are provisions giving the League of Nations authority to grant mandates over conquered territory, including the islands described in the pending treaty. If, then, the sovereignty over these islands is dependent entirely upon the provisions of the Versailles treaty, then such sovereignty is accepted, subject to the power of the League of Nations to grant the mandate to Japan described in the pending treaty.

And that the pending treaty may be clearly understood, let me call attention to the fact that its chief purpose is to ratify with certain reservations a mandate that has already been granted to Japan through the action of Great Britain, France, and Italy, with the approval and confirmation of the Council of the League of Nations. The United States is not asked, as one of the co-owners of these islands, to grant an original mandate to the Empire of Japan, but it is requested to join in, approve, and adopt the existing mandate to Japan which the principal allied powers, without the concurrence of the United States, attempted to grant with the approval of the League of Nations.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I was very much interested in the statement made a moment ago by the Senator as to the source of title which the allied and associated powers have for the territories renounced by Germany in the treaty. As I understood the treaty, it is contended by some that the title is deraigned through the treaty, while others might contend that it was obtained by conquest. I value so much the opinion of the Senator that I hope he will discuss the question a little more fully.

Mr. PITTMAN. I shall do so.

Mr. KING. It occurs to me, in view of the treaty and the various terms there respecting the disposition to be made of mandated territory, that it is very clear that the title is deraigned through the treaty or derived from the treaty and that all of the conditions of the treaty annexed to the grant Germany has a right to insist should be carried out, so that territory and peoples which she ceded away may not be treated as chattels but must be treated in conformation to the solemn obligations to which she was a party.

Mr. PITTMAN. With regard to the title, there is no doubt that Germany in the treaty has confirmed the title, and there is no doubt that those who accepted that treaty have also agreed to all the limitations or qualifications which are contained in the treaty. The position of the United States is a little different from that of the other powers who have accepted a confirmation of their title by accepting the treaty. It is necessary for us to consider our position somewhat differently by reason of the fact that the treaty which confirmed that conquest was not executed by us, and, while we have referred to it in a separate treaty of peace with Germany, we have expressly limited the effect of the treaty to those things which are beneficial to us, and have assumed none of the burdens.

Having briefly described the purpose of the pending treaty as I understand it, let us return to a consideration of the contentions as to the deraignment of title of the principal allied and associated powers in and to such islands.

On November 9, 1920, when this matter became of particular interest to our Government, the Secretary of State, on behalf of our Government, sent a note to the chargé d'affaires of our Government at Tokyo, requesting that the note be delivered to the Japanese foreign office. The note was as follows:

[Telegram.]

I.

The Secretary of State to the American chargé d'affaires at Tokyo. November 9, 1920. Copy left with Japanese foreign office, November 12, 1920.

During the recent sessions of the communications conference some question has arisen in regard to the disposition of the island of Yap by the supreme council. It has been contended that this island was included in the islands north of the Equator, which were offered by action of the supreme council of May 7, 1919, under mandate to Japan. It was the clear understanding of this Government that for reasons vitally affecting international communications, the supreme council, at the previous request of President Wilson, reserved for future consideration the final disposition of the island of Yap in the hope that some agreement might be reached by the allied and associated Governments to place the island under international control, and thus render it available as an international cable station. For this reason it is the understanding of the Government that the island of Yap was not included in the action of the supreme council on May 7, 1919.

In order to avoid misunderstanding on this point, you are instructed to read the foregoing to the minister of foreign affairs and to leave a copy with him.

This was done. That note was given general publication in April, 1921. That was in November, 1920, when our Government was protesting against the initial steps in the granting of the very mandate which in the pending treaty we are asked to confirm.

From that note it might be concluded that the Government only objected to the other four powers acting without consideration of the United States, but further notes on the subject on behalf of our Government, both by former Secretary of State Bainbridge Colby and by the present Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, throw great light upon the view of this Government with regard to its present rights in the island of Yap and the other islands under consideration. I am not going to read the entire communication, but ask leave to append it to my remarks.

Mr. PITTMAN. It is a communication by former Secretary of State Colby, on behalf of this Government, under date of February 21, 1921, and addressed to the President and members of the Council of the League of Nations.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator if that is the dispatch in which he speaks about Palestine and Mesopotamia also?

Mr. PITTMAN. I think he does refer to them.

Mr. LODGE. I am familiar with the dispatch.

Mr. PITTMAN. He starts out by saying:

Gentlemen, the Government of the United States has received information that the council of the League of Nations at its meeting which is to be held in Paris on this date (Feb. 21), proposes to consider at length the subject of mandates, including their terms, provisions, and allocation, and accordingly takes this opportunity to deliver to the council of the League of Nations a copy of its note addressed under date of November 20, 1920, to his excellency Lord Curzon of Kedleston, the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in which the views of the United States are quite fully set forth regarding the responsibility of mandatory powers.

Then he proceeds in the discussion of that matter and, among other things, said:

The United States has never given its consent to the inclusion of the island of Yap in any proposed mandate to Japan, but, on the other hand, at the time of the discussion of a mandate covering the former German islands in the Pacific north of the Equator, and in the course of said discussion President Wilson, acting on behalf of this Government, was particular to stipulate that the question of the disposition of the island of Yap should be reserved for future consideration.

Further on in the note it was stated:

The information was further conveyed that the reservations which had been previously made by this Government regarding the island of Yap were based on the view that the island of Yap necessarily constitutes an indispensable part of any scheme or practicable arrangement of cable communication in the Pacific, and that its free and unhampered use should not be limited or controlled by any one power.

Again, in the same instrument, the following statement was made:

As one of the principal allied and associated powers, the United States has an equal concern and an inseparable interest with the other allied and associated powers in the overseas possessions of Germany, and concededly an equal voice in their disposition, which, it is respectfully submitted, can not be undertaken or effectuated without its assent.

Later on—in fact at quite a recent date—the matter of the island of Yap was still a subject of dispute or differences between our Government and the allied powers. That dispute and those contentions arose over the action of the allied powers, consisting of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan in assuming, through the very mandate we are now asked to approve, to act with regard to the island of Yap in spite of the reservations made by our President in the matter, and in spite of the fact that we were admittedly a coowner, an equal owner, in this property with Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan. So Mr. Hughes, the Secretary of State, on April 6, 1921, addressed a communication in behalf of this Government to Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan. I ask to have this letter appended as a part of my remarks. It is all very interesting, but I do not care to take the time of the Senate to read it all.

I desire, however, Mr. President, to call the attention of the Senate to certain specific statements in the letter as bearing upon our present title to those islands. I am contending that until the pending Yap treaty is ratified we have an undivided one-fifth interest in the islands; that our sovereignty is equal to the sovereignty of any of the other powers; that we have just as much right of possession and action in that island as has Japan to-day. Let us see what Mr. Hughes has to say in this note, and, remember, I am just reading paragraphs from it:

It will not be questioned that the right to dispose of the overseas possessions of Germany was acquired only through the victory of the allied and associated powers, and it is also believed that there is no disposition on the part of the British Government to deny the participation of the United States in that victory. It would seem to follow necessarily—that the right accruing to the allied and associated powers through the common victory is shared by the United States and there could be no valid or effective disposition of the overseas possessions of Germany, now under consideration, without the assent of the United States.

Now, mind you, he was referring to a protest against the very mandate which we are now asked to ratify and confirm.

Mr. REED. When was that statement made?

Mr. PITTMAN. That was April 6, 1921.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHORTRIDGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to inquire of the Senator if there is anyone who contends that the United States has not a fifth interest in those islands?

Mr. PITTMAN. There are some who contend that the United States has an equal interest in those islands, but that that equal sovereignty is limited by the covenant of the League of Nations. I am presenting both views of it; I am presenting the position held by this Government both during the former administration and the present administration, that our title is not dependent upon the treaty, but that our title is dependent upon the conquest of the territory from a foreign enemy; that the statement in the treaty under article 119 is nothing but an admission that it is conquered territory, and that we, not being members of the League of Nations, not being signatory to the treaty which contains article 119, are not bound by its terms. If, however, Germany sees fit to confirm this title, well and good.

Now, let us see what further Mr. Hughes has to say about it.

Mr. FRANCE. If the Senator from Nevada will yield to me, I should like to ask him a question before he leaves this particular portion of his address.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. FRANCE. Does the Senator think that it was a very bold and reckless proposition for the United States to present to the great empires the claims of the United States to these territories, including this great imperial island of Yap, in recognition of our services in the war? Would it not have been more unselfish for us to have simply renounced all instead of announcing the doctrine that we were entitled to the island of Yap, and give all the territories acquired by conquest to our beloved allies, whom we are expected, if we favor these treaties, to love better than we love the American people themselves?

Mr. PITTMAN. I have stated in my opening remarks that it is not my purpose at this particular time to discuss the question of policy. I am trying first to present to the Senate the various contentions as I see them. The United States does not desire to retain any of the conquered territory. It does not desire to retain even the island of Yap. On the other hand, it does not wish any one of the other conquerors of this island to retain and exert absolute and separate sovereignty over it. President Wilson, when the matter first came up, stated the policy of this country. He stated that, in his opinion, the island of Yap should be reserved from all mandates and that it should not go under the control of any one power, but should be internationalized for the benefit of all powers. This contention has been maintained at all times and was maintained by the present administration upon the occasion of the last public word spoken on behalf of that administration with regard to the subject.

I will now continue to read from Secretary Hughes's note to the allied powers:

This Government must, therefore, point out that as the United States has never vested either the supreme council or the League of Nations with any authority to bind the United States or to act on its behalf there has been no opportunity for any decision which could be deemed to affect the rights of the United States. It may also be observed that the right accruing to the United States through the victory in which it has participated could not be regarded as in any way ceded or surrendered to Japan or to other nations, except by treaty, and that no such treaty has been made.

Further in the same note Mr. Hughes says—and I am only skipping here and there, as I intend later to append the entire note to my remarks:

As in the absence of any treaty with the United States relating to the matter, there was no decision on May 7, 1919—

That is the time they attempted to grant this very mandate which we are now asked to confirm—binding the United States, it is deemed to be unnecessary again to examine the brief minutes of the meeting of the supreme council on that date. It may, however, be proper to say that the minutes of this meeting, although obviously without any finality, could not properly be construed without due regard to the other proceedings of the supreme council and without taking account of the reservations which President Wilson had already made in the previous meetings of the supreme council on April 21, April 30, and May 1, 1919.

The attitude of President Wilson is sufficiently shown by the following statement which he made to the Department of State on March 3, 1921—

Here follows the statement of President Wilson, as quoted in this same note of Mr. Hughes:

I beg to return the note received yesterday from the Japanese Government, which I have read, in relation to the proposed mandate covering the island of Yap.

My first intimation of a contention that the so-called decision of May 7, 1919, by the council of four assigned to Japan a mandate for the island of Yap was conveyed to me by Mr. Norman W. Davis in October last. I then informed him that I had never consented to the assignment of the island of Yap to Japan.

I had not previously given particular attention to the wording of the council minutes of May 7, 1919, which were only recently called to my attention. I had on several occasions prior to the date mentioned made specific reservations regarding the island of Yap and had taken the position that it should not be assigned under mandate to any one power, but should be internationalized for cable purposes.

Mr. Hughes is quoting this as the attitude of this Government at the time this mandate was first mentioned and as the attitude of this Government now, because we have never taken any action favorable to that mandate.

Mr. KING. And Mr. Hughes is quoting ex-President Wilson?

Mr. PITTMAN. He is quoting ex-President Wilson, and is undoubtedly quoting his statement with approval, it might be said, or at least in support of the argument that Mr. Hughes was then making to the other four powers.

Mr. REED. What was the date of President Wilson's statement?

Mr. PITTMAN. It was on the 3d of March, 1921, that the statement was made. Mr. Hughes goes on further to say:

In particular, as no treaty has ever been concluded with the United States relating to the island of Yap, and as no one has ever been authorized to cede or surrender the right or interest of the United States in the island, this Government must insist that it has not lost its right or interest as it existed prior to any action of the supreme council—

"As it existed," mind you—or of the League of Nations, and can not recognize the allocation of the island or the validity of the mandate to Japan.

In this view this Government deems it to be unnecessary at this time to consider the terms of the so-called "C" mandates, or the discussion with respect thereto.

This Government, as has been clearly stated in previous communications, seeks no exclusive interest in the island of Yap and has no desire to secure any privileges without having similar privileges accorded to other powers, including, of course, Japan, and relying upon the sense of justice of the Government of Japan and of the Governments of the other allied and associated powers, this Government looks with confidence to a disposition of the matter whereby the just interests of all may be properly conserved.

It, therefore, may be safely asserted that it is the contention of this Government that the United States of America is a co-owner with Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan in the islands to be affected by the pending treaty, with equal rights of sovereignty.

I state that whether we believed that its real interest in these islands comes from the conquest of war or whether we believe it is derived from the treaty with Germany known as the Versailles treaty, whether the title is absolute or whether it is limited, it is true that whatever is the title or sovereignty of Japan is also the title or sovereignty of the United States.

But it is said that Japan already has a mandate over these islands; that that mandate was given shortly after the war by Great Britain, France, and Italy to Japan. Our Government under the former administration denied the authority of these four to affect us by the execution of a mandate or by any other act of theirs in which the United States did not participate. Whether their action was based on the provisions of the Versailles treaty, or whether it was based on conquest, it is recognized by all of those powers that the United States has an equal sovereignty, and nobody but the United States can divest itself of that sovereignty.

The mandate which we are now asked to ratify and confirm has been the cause of all this correspondence; it has been the cause of all of the protests of this Government. Those protests were based not alone on the fact that we were not being considered in the matter, but they were based upon the fact that President Wilson thought that the island of Yap should not be controlled by any one power; that its strategic position in regard to electrical communications was of such vast importance to the United States and to the allied and associated powers that it should be in some way internationalized and kept under control by the five powers.

Mr. KING. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I venture to call the Senator's attention to one aspect of this case, which has been suggested, perhaps, not on the floor of the Senate, but I have heard the suggestion made upon a number of occasions, namely, that the title to the territories which were renounced by Germany consisted of the Versailles treaty; that the grant was one of joint tenancy and not tenancy in common; that the United States, having refused to ratify the Versailles treaty and to accept, as one of the joint tenants, whatever benefits came by reason of that treaty to the ceded German territory, lost its rights; that the other tenants succeeded to whatever interest the United States might have had, and took title to all of the territory which Germany ceded. That position is strengthened, it is contended, by the subsequent repeated declarations of the United States that we are not a party to the Versailles treaty; that we do not claim any territory from Germany; we never claimed any indemnity from Germany other than that which was mentioned in the Versailles treaty, and expressly by Executive statement and by legislative declaration disclaimed any desire to receive any territorial acquisition as the result of the war. There may be some serious question as to whether the Versailles treaty created a tenancy in common or a joint tenancy, and if the former there is something in the contention that we have no rights in Yap or in any of the renounced territories.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the position of those who contend that our right was initiated by conquest and that the action of Germany was simply an admission of the conquest are in a much less embarrassing position, I admit, than those who contend that we derive our title from the Versailles treaty. I would not attempt to answer the Senator with regard to the deraignment of title through the Versailles treaty. It is too complicated. In fact, it is almost incomprehensible. We got no rights under a treaty to which we were not a party, as the Senator says. That may be true. It is very difficult to see, if the title depends on a contract, how we can assert our rights, unless it be under the theory that the allied powers who did enter into a contract with Germany did it partially for our benefit, or that we have accepted such cession in our separate treaty with Germany by reference to the Versailles treaty. Of course, that would involve the assertion of the power of the contracting parties to contract for the benefit of a third person not a party to the contract, or that the benefit of the Versailles treaty could be conferred upon the United States by its separate treaty. That may be one explanation. Another explanation of it may be that in our own separate treaty with Germany she has expressly given us all of the benefits that the allied powers received under the Versailles treaty, with none of the responsibilities or restrictions.

It satisfies me, though, to say that the correspondence of the former administration and the correspondence of the present administration clearly show that it is the contention of our Government and has always been its contention that we had equal sovereignty and equal rights and privileges in those islands with the allied and associated powers, and that in that condition of affairs there was nothing they could do to deprive us of those rights and privileges and sovereignty.

If this title does come under the Versailles treaty, then the Versailles treaty has expressly stated that the allocation of these mandates shall be in the hands of the allied and associated powers, and that includes the United States. It was not in the hands of the Allies alone. Even in the Versailles treaty we were mentioned as one of the parties essential to the determination of the allocation of those mandates. It may be contended by some that, by our refusal to execute the Versailles treaty, we abandoned the cession by Germany of the island of Yap to the United States and the allied powers. To sustain such a contention it would be necessary to find that such cession could not be made by Germany in a separate treaty with the United States, and that, therefore, the United States had lost all rights in the cession referred to in the Versailles treaty by failure to execute the Versailles treaty.

That was certainly not the theory of our Government when it executed the separate treaty of peace with Germany, because in that separate treaty it expressly accepts the cession of the German islands as set forth in the Versailles treaty. The allied and associated powers could not have taken such a position, because, under the Versailles treaty, Germany can not make a treaty that is in conflict with the Versailles treaty. If the United States had forfeited its right to the cession of these islands by not executing the Versailles treaty, then the attempted cession to the United States, together with the allied powers, of such islands would be in conflict with the Versailles treaty. The allied powers and all of the other signatory powers to the Versailles treaty have silently consented to the separate treaty of peace between the United States and Germany. There is no rule of international law relating to war or conquest that requires that all of the powers engaged on one side shall execute a joint treaty with the enemy. Each one of the powers could execute a separate treaty containing the same provisions, and the country last executing the separate treaty would not be deprived of any benefits by reason of the execution of a separate treaty by another power at an earlier date.

The United States and Japan were in possession of the island of Yap at the time of the conquest. The nationals of each of such countries were at that time operating electrical cables on the island and continued to maintain such possession after the conquest and even until the present time. From the time of conquest until the execution of the treaties they held it by virtue of conquest. After the execution of the separate treaty of peace by the United States, the United States held its possession under that treaty. There was no time limit set, nor could there be a time limit set wherein the United States or any other country could execute and negotiate a treaty of peace.

Therefore, I hold that no American citizen will contend that the United States, by executing a separate treaty of peace, has forfeited its rights to the German cession because it did not join in with other powers in another treaty of peace. Certainly this administration can not make any such contention, because it has represented to the citizens of the country that by the separate treaty of peace with Germany it obtained all of the benefits and advantages guaranteed to the other powers under the Versailles treaty.

It has protested up until almost the present time. It contended that it was invalid by reason of the lack of concurrence on the part of the United States. Certainly one of the powers thinks it is invalid, and that is Japan. If it is a valid grant, if the concurrence of the United States was unnecessary, then why is this treaty here at all to-day? Does Japan think that she has a mandate without the concurrence of the United States? If she did, would she be here seeking the special privileges that the ratification of this mandate gives her in those islands? Would she be here asking the United States to sign a contract divesting itself of all sovereignty in those islands? Yet that is what it does. That is what she asks. There is not any doubt whatever that the position taken by our administration now, and by the former administration then, has been practically admitted by the allied powers. Those powers—Great Britain, France, and Italy—are almost as anxious for the United States to affirm the mandate they made as Japan is, because they know that there is no answer to the contentions that have been presented by the former administration and the present administration, and they have not attempted to meet them except that they come here and ask us now to ratify a treaty that we have constantly protested against.

The United States, therefore, being an equal owner with Japan and the other principal allied powers in such islands, is not required by necessity or propriety to seek or to accept permission from Japan to exercise that sovereignty.

The United States Government does not have to obtain permission from Japan to land and operate her cables or to erect and operate electrical and aerial service on the island of Yap. It has an equal right with Japan to do these things by virtue of its equal sovereignty with Japan.

I hope that it may be kept in mind that I am not at present discussing the wisdom of approving this mandate to Japan, but only our rights in the premises and the purpose of the treaty. I shall probably discuss the question of policy later on.

Whilst there may be some grounds for contention as to the extent of sovereignty over these islands now possessed by the United States and the principal allied powers, there can be little doubt that, if this treaty be ratified, the absolute and exclusive sovereignty over these islands by Japan will be confirmed.

The mandate was granted under the terms and in accordance with the provisions of the Versailles treaty. Under the provisions of such treaty relating to mandates, three classes are established. The islands described in the mandate under consideration in the pending treaty fall within class (c), which are described as follows:

There are territories, such as Southwest Africa and certain of the South Pacific islands which, owing to the sparseness of their population, or their small size, or their remoteness from the centers of civilization, or their geographical contiguity to the territory of the mandatory, and other circumstances, can be best administered under the laws of the mandatory as integral portions of its territory, subject to the safeguards above mentioned in the interests of the indigenous population.

In article 2 of the mandate under consideration in the pending treaty it is provided:

The mandatory shall have full power of administration and legislation over the territory subject to the present mandate as an integral portion of the Empire of Japan, and may apply the laws of the Empire of Japan to the territory, subject to such local modifications as circumstances may require.

This is undoubtedly a grant of exclusive sovereignty. The islands are made an integral part of Japan, subject to the laws of Japan. It is true that under the mandate Japan is required to look after the health and the morals of the people on these islands, but this in no way contradicts the plain and absolute sovereign power granted to her over the islands.

And, again, in section 7 of article 4 of the pending treaty, that there may be no misunderstanding as to the exclusive sovereignty of Japan in the island of Yap, it is expressly provided as follows:

The Government of Japan will exercise its power of expropriation in the island to secure to the United States or its nationals needed property and facilities for the purpose of electrical communications if such property or facilities can not otherwise be obtained.

It is understood that the location and the area of land so to be expropriated shall be arranged between the two Governments according to the requirements of each case. Property of the United States or of its nationals and facilities for the purpose of electrical communication in the island shall not be subject to expropriation.

In reading the section hurriedly one might construe it to mean that the United States and Japan should between them arrange the land and property to be expropriated to be used by Japan as well as land to be used by the United States. Such is not the proper construction of the section. The language, "It is understood that the location and the area of land so to be expropriated shall be arranged between the two Governments according to the requirements of each case," refers solely to the land to be expropriated in the island for the use of the United States. Under the section Japan has the use of all of the land of the island and the United States can have only the use of such land as Japan may agree that she may have in each particular case.

It has been contended by the proponents of the pending treaty that the nationals of the United States have equal rights in the island of Yap with the nationals of Japan. I do not believe that the treaty is subject to such construction. The mandate itself, which we are asked to ratify in the treaty, only guarantees privileges to missionaries.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator suffer an interruption there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want to get this matter clear in my mind, if I can.

I always had the idea that the mandate was conferred by the council of the League of Nations, but the treaty here recites that the mandate has been conferred by the four powers—the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan. It says "pursuant to the treaty of Versailles," but that is not pursuant to the treaty of Versailles, because under the treaty of Versailles the mandate is to be conferred by the council of the league, which embraces representatives of other nations than these four; but I refer to this provision of article 22 of the League of Nations referring to mandates:

The degree of authority, control, or administration to be exercised by the mandatory shall, if not previously agreed upon by the members of the league, be explicitly defined in each case by the council.

Has the council put out some kind of a document in which is set forth the degree of authority, control, or administration which is to be exercised by Japan in these islands?

Mr. PITTMAN. Not that I know of; no. I have no knowledge of it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Apparently, then, Japan exercises unlimited jurisdiction over these islands, except as that jurisdiction is restricted by the instrument referred to in the present treaty.

Mr. PITTMAN. I so construe it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I had an idea that the covenant of the League of Nations in that particular contemplated that something in the nature of an organic act, such as is customary in the case of territories, should be issued, fixing the character of the jurisdiction that was to be exercised by the mandatory, what powers it was to have, and so forth.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If I understood the Senator from Nevada a while ago, the statement was made that the mandate which was granted by these other powers, the council of the League of Nations, was absolute and complete, and conferred upon Japan the complete power and sovereignty of those islands, and gave to her the right to control so completely as to warrant imposing upon the island of Yap the laws of Japan. If I am in error about that I should like to be corrected.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think that is true. I have attempted to give the history of it. The four powers known as the principal allied powers executed this mandate, which speaks for itself; and subsequently, at the meeting of the council of the League of Nations, it was approved and was approved over the protest of our Secretary of State, who was there the day they approved it. Evidently the Senator from Montana is astonished that the League of Nations has so little influence in mandates.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Not alone that, but this document, made a part of the treaty now under consideration—which, as I take it, merely specifies certain limitations upon the power of Japan—can by no stretch of construction be said to comply with this provision of the covenant to the effect that the degree of authority, control, or administration to be exercised by the mandatory shall be explicitly defined in each case by the council.

If the Senator will pardon me, I can not think that anybody will contest the view now expressed by the Senator from Nevada, that the treaty which we are asked to approve does not grant to American citizens generally any rights whatever in Yap or any other of the vast number of islands over which we are entitled, as we contend, to exercise sovereignty to the extent of one-fifth. The rights conceded by this treaty are clearly only to permit missionaries to reside there and to prosecute their avocations, and to permit those interested in the operation of cables connected with the island to be there. That is the point I wanted to present to the Senator.

It was represented to me some time ago that the Empire of Japan, during all of these years, since the armistice, for that matter, has exercised the power of excluding anybody from these islands, and I wondered if the committee had any information upon that subject. For instance, I am told that American citizens are not permitted to go there freely for the purpose of carrying on commerce, but that they are obliged to get a license from the Empire of Japan.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If I may be permitted just this observation, the point I want to be clear about is this: If I understand it, the council has acted, under the provisions of the treaty of Versailles, by abrogating any further power over the island of Yap, and has surrendered all of its authority under the mandate provisions of the Versailles treaty to Japan, and in the exercise of that authority to control these mandates, has chosen to confer absolute authority upon Japan.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have been contending that all the time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not find that they have done so. They do not say that Japan shall be entitled to exercise full and unlimited power and authority over these islands "subject only to the following restrictions." They do not say so in this, at least, and I wanted to know if there was some other document under which Japan assumed to exercise this power.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I do not believe there is any other such document. I think we have before us the only document that is involved. It is a mandate, and it speaks for itself. It was granted by four of the coowners, the cosovereigns, of the island of Yap. It has been approved, verbatim et literatim, by the council of the League of Nations, over our protest.

I have been arguing this proposition, first, as to our title. I think I have established that no matter how that title comes, we have an equal sovereignty with these other powers. I then turned to the effect of this mandate. I believe, and I am trying to express the belief, that this mandate having been granted, the island becomes an integral part of Japan, being subjected to the laws of Japan, and the treaty specially limiting the rights of nationals of other countries, constituting Japan an absolute sovereign over the island of Yap.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I have been very much interested in the Senator's argument, and I do not want to interrupt; but the Senator from New Mexico raised the question of sovereignty. I do not think there is any doubt about the fact that Japan is exercising, and has the right to exercise, substantial sovereignty under the treaty of Versailles. That treaty, of course, is the source of her title. No matter what the four allied and associated powers may have done for themselves, in the end this mandatory was made by the council of the League of Nations, and it is under the covenant of the league that she holds the mandate, because there is no other power in the world which could grant her such a mandate. But under that clause in the treaty of Versailles referring to mandates for this particular kind of islands, in article 22 there are different classes of mandates to be established, but toward the end of that article it is stated: "There are territories, such as Southwest Africa and certain of the South Pacific Islands," and these islands just north of the Equator would fall under the words "such as."

Mr. PITTMAN. I will say to the Senator, so as not to have to draw the analogy, that since that time the League of Nations has directly stated that these islands come under class (c).

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is my understanding. Article 22 continues:

Which, owing to the sparseness of their population, or their small size, or their remoteness from the centers of civilization, or their geographical contiguity to the territory of the mandatory, and other circumstances, can be best administered under the laws of the mandatory as integral portions of its territory, subject to the safeguards above mentioned in the interests of the indigenous population.

What I wanted to call attention to was that under this particular kind of mandatory, which has been declared, these particular territories are put in this class, and they are to be administered under the laws of the mandatory as an integral portion of its territory; in other words, the sovereignty of the mandatory power is recognized, so that it is entirely within the covenant of the League of Nations that this is done.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I am glad to have adduced this discussion, and I am very glad, so far, that those who have discussed this question of sovereignty concur with the position I was taking with regard to the matter. At least we have one matter settled, so far as the discussion has gone, and that is that if we ratify this treaty we will confirm the mandate whose validity we have heretofore denied, and in confirming that mandate we will confirm the absolute sovereignty of Japan over the island of Yap and the other islands.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, my understanding is, from the communications emanating from the office of the Secretary of State, to which the Senator has directed attention, that it objected to this mandate to Japan particularly because the mandate extended over the island of Yap, which the Department of State insisted should be internationalized. We have surrendered that claim, and what do we get in exchange for that surrender?

Mr. PITTMAN. That is just the subject I am coming to. As the Senator from Montana says, our protest was particularly directed toward the island of Yap, and it was based upon the theory that we had to participate in the control of that island by reason of the great importance of that place as a base for electrical communication. We all know that, and the condition has not changed a particle since the time we protested. The island is just as valuable to-day as a base for electrical communication as it was before, and every argument used before against the absolute sovereignty of Japan over that island is good now. Our former Secretary of State protested against this mandate on that ground, and our present Secretary of State, who was head of the American delegation in the Limitation of Armaments Conference, recently held, protested against it on that ground up until April, 1921.

It has been contended by the proponents of the pending treaty that the nationals of the United States have equal rights in the island of Yap with the nationals of Japan. I do not believe the treaty is subject to such a construction. The mandate itself which we are asked to ratify in this treaty only guarantees privileges to missionaries. No other class of people, other than the nationals of Japan, are authorized to enter into or travel or reside in the territory for the purpose of prosecuting their callings. The language used in the mandate is as follows:

The mandatory * * * shall allow all missionaries, nationals of any State member of the League of Nations, to enter into, travel, and reside in the territory for the purpose of prosecuting their calling.

They have singled out missionaries, and they have singled out the calling of missionaries, and have expressly limited the right of entry to that class of people, and for that purpose only.

By article 2 of the pending treaty this privilege is extended to the missionaries of the United States, notwithstanding the fact that the United States is not a member of the League of Nations; but it is still limited to missionaries.

In article 3 the United States and its nationals are expressly given the same rights and privileges as the nationals of Japan as to one particular occupation. This is the article in the pending treaty, and not in the mandate. It is in the nature of a reservation to the mandate. It reads.

ARTICLE III.

The United States and its nationals shall have free access to the island of Yap on a footing of entire equality with Japan or any other nation and their respective nationals in all that relates to the landing and operation of the existing Yap-Guam cable, or any cable which may hereafter be laid or operated by the United States or by its nationals connecting with the island of Yap.

It will be observed that the right to enter is absolutely limited to "all that relates to the landing and operation" of cables. The mandate did not even go that far, but, as a consideration for agreeing to this mandate, we put this additional article in, that in addition to missionaries going on the island for the purpose of conducting their work, electricians may go on the island for the purpose of conducting their work.

But even in this same article, for the purpose of further restricting the United States and its nationals in the island of Yap, it is provided:

That so long as the Government of Japan shall maintain on the island of Yap an adequate radiotelegraphic station, cooperating effectively with the cables and with the other radio stations on ships or on shore, without discriminatory exactions or preferences, the exercise of the right to establish radiotelegraphic stations on the island by the United States or its nationals shall be suspended.

In other words, as long as Japan runs the aerial telegraph business of Yap, we have no right to do it, nor can our nationals do it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, is there anything in the treaty which determines who is to be the judge of the character of the radio service there, as to its sufficiency and efficiency; in other words, whether or not Japan is furnishing sufficient facilities of that character?

Mr. PITTMAN. The only precedent we have for that matter is that we have found it necessary, as a matter of courtesy and confidence, to allow nations like Japan to determine when conditions are such that they may remove from occupied territory.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, in view of the silence of the treaty upon the subject, would not the United States have the right to determine whether or not there had been compliance with it?

Mr. PITTMAN. I shall discuss that in a few moments. I have a memorandum of that. I am glad, however, that the Senator mentioned it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President—

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. Before leaving the subject of the rights of American nationals in the island of Yap I would like to call the Senator's attention to a provision of the treaty, the third subdivision of article 2, which provides that existing treaties between the United States and Japan shall be applicable to the mandated islands.

Mr. PITTMAN. I shall take that up in just a moment.

Mr. KELLOGG. Under that provision our treaty with Japan as to the rights of nationals would apply, would it not?

Mr. PITTMAN. I am not so sure about that, but I shall take that up right now. It would apply undoubtedly where it would not come in conflict with special provisions.

Mr. KELLOGG. The treaty of 1911 provides that—

The citizens or subjects of each of the high contracting parties shall have liberty to enter, travel, and reside in the territories of the other, to carry on trade, wholesale and retail, to own or lease and occupy houses, manufactories, warehouses, and shops, to employ agents of their choice, to lease land for residential and commercial purposes, and generally to do anything incident to or necessary for trade upon the same terms as native citizens or subjects, submitting themselves to the laws and regulations there established.

Does the Senator contend that that article and also article 2 of the same treaty apply to Yap?

Mr. PITTMAN. Of course, the Senator from Nevada does not deny that a treaty which exists does exist. I am glad the Senator has read it. In a few moments I shall discuss the very question he is asking, but I prefer to proceed without breaking the line along which I am moving. However, I shall answer that in just a few moments.

At the present time our sovereignty in the island of Yap is equal to that of Japan, and yet we propose to allow Japan to exclusively conduct radio telegraphic communications on the island. Is this a concession on the part of Japan to the United States or is it a surrender of our commercial opportunities to Japan?

Our press associations have long been complaining that they could not get adequate service through the electrical communications controlled by Japan. They have protested that our position on many matters was misunderstood, to the detriment of our country and its commerce, by reason of the character of such electrical news service. It is true that Japan contracts to conduct such service effectively and without discriminatory exactions or preferences; but if in our opinion she fails in this, then what action shall be taken and what will be the effect? Will we proceed to construct our own electrical communications? Could we accomplish this peacefully? In the event of a dispute over this question, who would settle the dispute? Would it be settled under the four-power pact by the four powers, Great Britain, France, Japan, and the United States? Would it require a unanimous vote to settle it? It is contended by the proponents of the pending treaty that it would require a unanimous vote. Is it reasonable to suppose that unanimity could be obtained in such a conference if unanimity had not been obtained between the United States and Japan with regard to the dispute? And if such unanimity was not obtained, then what would be the action of the United States? Would it agree to the processes of settlement provided in the covenant of the League of Nations under the Versailles treaty? The proponents of this treaty would hardly contend that that would be the remedy, because to do so would be to admit that this mandate is subject to the control of a body in which we have no membership. And if it be held in the event of such a dispute that we have no recourse to such processes as provided in the League of Nations, then what remedy would we have? There is one thing that is evident, and that is that in the surrender of our rights under the pending treaty we are inviting a situation that, to say the least, may be very unfortunate.

In section (1) of article 4 there appears upon first glance to be granted to the nationals of the United States all the privileges and rights of the nationals of Japan, and yet a reference to the opening clause of that article discloses clearly that those rights and privileges relate solely to electrical communications. The opening clause to which I refer reads as follows:

In connection with the rights embraced by article 3, specific rights, privileges, and exemptions, in so far as they relate to electrical communications, shall be enjoyed in the island of Yap by the United States and its nationals in terms as follows.

Then follows, in section (1), the specific rights; but remember that these specific rights are only rights relating solely to electrical communications.

Let me call attention to this, that in the treaty in referring to article 3 it speaks of "specific rights, privileges, and exemptions," and yet we would have those some rights, privileges, and exemptions under the general treaty which the Senator from Minnesota has just read. The general treaty which the Senator has just read allows our nationals to enter for the purpose of business. It does not interfere with their conduct of business on the island. Why, then, was it necessary to specify that they had a right to go there for the specific purposes of conducting the cables? It did so specify. The United States thought it was necessary to specifically provide something in addition to what the general treaty provided.

It is, however, contended in reply to this argument that the pending treaty, in section 3 of article 2, makes applicable to these islands existing treaties between the United States and Japan. The existing treaties between the United States and Japan do not grant to American citizens the right to own land in the Japanese Empire.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does the Senator demand greater rights for American citizens in Japan than we grant to them?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; but I demand equal rights in the island of Yap, which is not Japanese.

Mr. KELLOGG. But it is under this treaty.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; it is under this treaty, but we have not yet ratified the treaty.

Mr. KELLOGG. It will be ratified.

Mr. PITTMAN. Not by the argument which the Senator from Minnesota is now making.

The existing treaties between the United States and Japan do not grant to American citizens the right to own land in the Japanese Empire. These islands, including the island of Yap, by the pending treaty and the mandate therein set forth, are an integral part of the Empire of Japan and subject to the laws of Japan. Under the laws of Japan a citizen of the United States can not acquire and own land in the Japanese Empire.

Yet even this extension of existing treaties to these islands gives birth to a new cause for dispute. It may be contended by Japan that the privileges and rights of the United States and its nationals having been expressly and particularly stated in the pending treaty, any inference as to other rights and privileges are expressly excluded.

In other words, if, under existing treaties, the United States and its nationals have a right to carry on the aerial electrical radio business there, why specifically grant them that right in this contract? Remember that the treaty says that for the purpose of "settling all differences" with regard to this island they enter into this specific agreement. This specific agreement is clear. It is so clear that nobody under mandate except missionaries may enter there. Under the express terms that we have placed in it, it is expressly provided that our people may enter there for the purpose of the radio business and nothing else.

If it was not the intention of the contracting parties to limit it to these occupations, why was the provision ever put in here? Why did they not leave it to the general treaties which the Senator from Minnesota says are broad enough to allow our citizens to go there as they see fit? They must have had some intention in the matter and they could so contend later on. This is a common and accepted rule of construction of contracts. But whether this construction be sought by Japan or not, the ownership of land is essential to the fullest enjoyment of economic and commercial opportunities, and this right is denied not only in the pending treaty but in every treaty with Japan.

But the Senator from Minnesota says we do not want to ask any more rights in Japan than we grant to her. Not at all; but nowhere in the treaty have we ever asked as many rights of Japan. We have given up our sovereignty to Japan, and the treaty shows what little we get back. If we ask for rights in Japan we could not ask for the right of ownership of property, because we reserve the right to deny the ownership of property to Japanese in this country. The great trouble is that the Senator is thinking about this island as Japanese property, when it is not. It is just as much American property as it is Japanese. Whenever the Senator gets to thinking of it in that light some of his arguments probably will be different.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge], the leader of the majority in this body and the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, in reporting favorably this treaty on behalf of the Foreign Relations Committee, seems to have attempted to minimize the value to the United States of the island of Yap. We all realize that the island is of little value except as a base for electrical communications, but the importance of the island for this purpose was not underestimated by the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee at the time that the Versailles treaty was pending before this body. At that time he declared that the uninterrupted maintenance of such electrical communications by the United States on the island of Yap was a matter of great importance.

The facts bearing upon the importance of this island as a base for electrical communications with the Philippine Islands, China, Japan, and the entire Far East were sought by and presented to the committee. We have been informed that, by reason of the depth of water and the conformation of the bottom of the ocean around other islands, few if any of them can be satisfactorily used for such a base. The island of Yap is admitted to be free from these obstructions to cable communication.

Now, admitting, for the sake of argument, that the United States Government suffers all of the disadvantages that I have suggested through the ratification of this treaty, the question still remains as to whether or not it is good policy to ratify the treaty. This determination depends in part, if not largely, upon the action that this body takes with regard to the several treaties that have been presented to the Senate through the labors and negotiations of the recent Conference for the Limitation of Armament. If the so-called naval treaty is to be ratified, then we will have by that act, in my opinion, abandoned our influence and our commerce in the Far East. Our greatest naval experts give it as their expert opinion that it would be impracticable, if not impossible, to operate our fleet in the waters of the Far East unless we had established there adequate coaling stations, supply, and repair bases.

We had some experience during the World War in the transportation of men and material across 3,000 miles of water. From that experience we are able to fairly accurately appraise the apparently insurmountable obstacles to the transportation of fuel and supplies and the maintenance of repairs several thousand miles away from the coast of the United States. Without these naval bases in the Far East our Navy is excluded from those waters.

In the so-called naval treaty, in article 19, we are prevented from establishing these effective bases by the following provision:

The United States, the British Empire, and Japan agree that the status quo at the time of the signing of the present treaty, with regard to fortifications and naval bases, shall be maintained in their respective territories and possessions specified hereunder:

(1) The insular possessions which the United States now holds or may hereafter acquire in the Pacific Ocean, except (a) those adjacent to the coast of the United States, Alaska, and the Panama Canal Zone, not including the Aleutian Islands, and (b) the Hawaiian Islands.

We are prohibited by the so-called naval treaty, which is now before this body for consideration, from establishing bases in the Philippine Islands or Guam or in any of the islands which we possess in the Pacific waters of the Far East, either now owned or hereafter acquired, with the positive, certain knowledge that without the establishment of those bases our Navy is limited to the Pacific coast of the United States. I therefore say that the action we take in regard to the island of Yap depends to a large extent upon what action we take with regard to the so-called naval treaty.

Mr. President, we may aid in the peaceful settlement of disputes that arise in the Far East; we may be able through our economic and moral power to assist in some slight degree in protecting the sovereignty of China, which we pledge ourselves to do in one of the conference treaties presented to this body; but when a nation undertakes solemn obligations to protect other Governments and nationalities against injustices and oppression it must be very uneasy, if not unhappy, by reason of such responsibility when its sole power is moral and economic.

The great desire for peace and to be freed of the burdens of militarism may even justify our abandonment of our influence beyond the borders of our own territory. As a self-supporting people, not dependent upon any other land for the necessities of life, it may be, in this particular era, the part of wisdom to surrender all sovereignty at any place that may be the cause for future disputes and future wars. These policies should be first determined, and then we could act intelligently with regard to the various interlocking treaties that are now before the Senate for action. These treaties, though separately executed and presented, are interdependent, and must relate to a common policy. I would prefer to see action upon the pending treaty deferred until we have determined our naval policy and our policy with regard to alliances affecting the Pacific and the Far East.

APPENDIX.

The full text of the American note to the council of the League of Nations in Paris was made public by Secretary Colby on February 24. It read as follows:

FEBRUARY 21, 1921.

To the president and members of the council of the League of Nations:

GENTLEMEN: The Government of the United States has received information that the council of the League of Nations at its meeting which is to be held in Paris on this date (February 12) proposes to consider at length the subject of mandates, including their terms, provisions, and allocation, and accordingly takes this opportunity to deliver to the council of the League of Nations a copy of its note addressed, under date of November 20, 1920, to His Excellency Lord Curzon of Kedleston, the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in which the views of the United States are quite fully set forth regarding the nature of the responsibilities of mandatory powers.

The attention of the council of the League of Nations is particularly invited to the request therein made on behalf of this Government that the draft mandate forms intended to be submitted to the League of Nations be communicated to this Government for its consideration before submission to the council of the league, in order that the council might thus have before it an expression of the opinion of the Government of the United States on the form of such mandates and a clear indication of the basis upon which the approval of this Government, which is essential to the validity of any determinations which may be reached, might be anticipated and received.

It was furthermore, stated in said note that the establishment of the mandate principle, a new principle in international relations, and one in which the public opinion of the world is taking special interest, would seem to require the frankest discussion from all pertinent points of view, and the opinion was expressed that suitable publicity should be given to the drafts of mandates which it is the intention to submit to the council, in order that the fullest opportunity might be afforded to consider their terms in relation to the obligations assumed by the mandatory powers and the respective interests of all Governments who deem themselves concerned or affected.

A copy of this note was transmitted to the Governments of France and Italy, requesting an interpretation by each Government of the provisions of the agreement between Great Britain, Italy, and France, signed at Sevres on August 10, 1920, relating to the creation of spheres of special interest in Anatolia, in the light of this Government's note to the British Government of November 20, 1920.

A reply has thus far been received only from the French Government, in which attention is directed to article 10 of the so-called Sevres treaty, which provides in favor of nationals of third powers for all economic purposes free access to the so-called zones of special interest.

THE PACIFIC MANDATE.

This Government is also in receipt of information that the council of the League of Nations at its meeting at Geneva on December 17 last approved, among other mandates, a mandate to Japan embracing "all the former German islands situated in the Pacific Ocean and lying north of the Equator." The text of this mandate to Japan, which was received by this Government, and which, according to available information, was approved by the council, contains the following statement:

"Whereas the principals of the allied and associated powers agreed that, in accordance with article 22, part 1 (covenant of the League of Nations) of the said treaty, a mandate should be conferred upon His Majesty the Emperor of Japan to administer the said islands and have proposed that the mandate should be formulated in the following terms," etc.

The Government of the United States takes this opportunity respectfully and in the most friendly spirit to submit to the president and members of the council of the league that the statement above quoted is incorrect and is not an accurate recital of the facts.

On the contrary, the United States, which is distinctly included in the very definite and constantly used descriptive phrase "the principal allied and associated powers," has not agreed to the terms or provisions of the mandate which is embodied in this text, nor has it agreed that a mandate should be conferred upon Japan covering all the former German islands situated in the Pacific Ocean and lying north of the Equator.

The United States has never given its consent to the inclusion of the island of Yap in any proposed mandate to Japan, but, on the other hand, at the time of the discussion of a mandate covering the former German islands in the Pacific north of the Equator, and in the course of said discussion, President Wilson, acting on behalf of this Government, was particular to stipulate that the question of the disposition of the island of Yap should be reserved for future consideration.

Subsequently, this Government was informed that certain of the principal allied and associated powers were under the impression that the reported decision of the supreme council, sometimes described as the council of four, taken at its meeting on May 7, 1919, included or inserted the island of Yap in the proposed mandate to Japan.

This Government, in notes addressed to the Government of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan, has set forth at length its contention that Yap had, in fact, been excepted from this proposed mandate and was not to be included therein. Furthermore, by direction of President Wilson, the respective Governments above mentioned were informed that the Government of the United States could not concur in the reported decision of May 7, 1919, of the supreme council.

The information was further conveyed that the reservations which had previously been made by this Government regarding the island of Yap were based on the view that the island of Yap necessarily constitutes an indispensable part of any scheme or practicable arrangement of cable communication in the Pacific, and that its free and unhampered use should not be limited or controlled by any one power.

POSITION WAS MADE CLEAR.

While this Government has never assented to the inclusion of the island of Yap in the proposed mandate to Japan, it may be pointed out that even if one or more of the other principal allied and associated powers were under a misapprehension as to the inclusion of this island in the reported decision on May 7, 1919, nevertheless the notes above mentioned of the Government of the United States make clear the position of this Government in the matter.

At the time when the several notes were addressed to the respective Governments above mentioned a final agreement had not been reached as to the terms and allocation of mandates covering the former German islands in the Pacific.

Therefore the position taken in the matter by the President on behalf of this Government, and clearly set forth in the notes referred to, necessarily had the result of effectively withdrawing any suggestion or implication of assent, mistakenly imputed to this Government, long before December 17, 1920, the date of the council's meeting at Geneva.

As one of the principal allied and associated powers, the United States has an equal concern and an inseparable interest with the other principal allied and associated powers in the overseas possessions of Germany, and concededly an equal voice in their disposition, which it is respectfully submitted can not be undertaken or effectuated without its assent. The Government of the United States therefore respectfully states that it can not regard itself as bound by the terms and provisions of said mandate and desires to record its protest against the reported decision of December 17 last of the council of the League of Nations in relation thereto, and at the same time to request that the council, having obviously acted under a misapprehension of the facts, should reopen the question for the further consideration which the proper settlement of it clearly requires.

Accept, gentlemen, the assurance of my high consideration.

BAINBRIDGE COLBY,
Secretary of State.

[From Current History, New York Times, April, 1921, vol. 14, No. 1.]

The following is the text of the note sent to Great Britain April 6, 1921, by Secretary Hughes, which is similar to those forwarded to France, Japan, and Italy:

"With respect to the mandate to Japan, purporting to have been confirmed and defined in its terms by the supreme council of the League of Nations, of the German possessions in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator, this Government deems it appropriate to state the fundamental basis of its representations and the principles which, in its view, are determinative.

"It will not be questioned that the right to dispose of the overseas possessions of Germany was acquired only through the victory of the allied and associated powers, and it is also believed that there is no disposition on the part of the British Government to deny the participation of the United States in that victory. It would seem to follow necessarily that the right accruing to the allied and associated powers through the common victory is shared by the United States, and there could be no valid or effective disposition of the overseas possessions of Germany now under consideration without the assent of the United States.

"[This Government must, therefore, point out that as the United States has never vested either the supreme council or the League of Nations with any authority to bind the United States or to act on its behalf, there has been no opportunity for any decision which could be deemed to affect the rights of the United States. It may also be observed that the right accruing to the United States through the victory in which it has participated could not be regarded as in any way ceded or surrendered to Japan or to other nations, except by treaty, and that no such treaty has been made.]

"The fact that the United States has not ratified the treaty of Versailles can not detract from rights which the United States has already acquired, and it is hardly necessary to suggest that a treaty to which the United States is not a party could not affect these rights. But it should be noted that the treaty of Versailles did not purport to secure to Japan or to any other nation any right in the overseas possessions of Germany, save as an equal right therein should be secured to the United States. On the contrary, article 119 of the treaty of Versailles provides:

"Germany renounces in favor of the principal allied and associated powers—

"in whose favor Germany renounced her rights and titles in the United States. Thus not only could the position of the Government of Japan derive no strength from the treaty of Versailles or from any discussions preliminary thereto, but the terms of that treaty confirm the position of the Government of the United States.

"Further, the draft convention relating to the mandate for the German concessions in the Pacific Ocean north of the Equator, which was subsequently proposed, proceeded in the same view, purporting, on behalf of the United States as one of the grantors, to confer the mandate upon Japan, thus recognizing the right and interest of the United States, and the fact that the proposed action could not be effective without the agreement of the United States as one of the principal allied and associated powers.

"As the United States did not enter into this convention or into any treaty relating to the subject, this Government is unable to understand upon what grounds it was thereafter attempted to confer the mandate without the agreement of the United States. It is manifest that the League of Nations was without any authority to bind the United States, and the confirmation of the mandate in question and the definition of its terms by the council of the League of Nations in December,

1920, can not be regarded as having efficacy with respect to the United States—

"All her rights and titles over her overseas possessions."

"It will not be questioned that one of the 'principal allied and associated powers'—

"It should be noted that this mandate not only recited article 119 of the treaty of Versailles, to the effect that 'Germany renounced in favor of the principal allied and associated powers all her rights over her overseas possessions, including therein the groups of islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator,' but also recited that 'the principal allied and associated powers agreed that in accordance with article 22, part 1 (covenant of the League of Nations) of the said treaty a mandate should be conferred upon his Majesty the Emperor of Japan to administer the said islands, and have proposed that the mandate should be formulated,' as set forth. While this last-quoted recital, as has already been pointed out in previous communications by this Government, is inaccurate in its terms, inasmuch as the United States, as one of the principal and associated powers, had not so agreed and proposed, the recital again recognizes the necessity of the participation of the United States in order to make the proposed disposition effective.

"[As, in the absence of any treaty with the United States relating to the matter, there was no decision on May 7, 1919,] [binding the United States, it is deemed to be unnecessary again to examine the brief minutes of the meeting of the supreme council on that date. It may, however, be proper to say that the minutes of this meeting, although obviously without any finality, could not properly be construed without due regard to the other proceedings of the supreme council and without taking account of the reservations which President Wilson had already made in the previous meetings of the supreme council on April 21, April 30, and May 1, 1919.

"The attitude of President Wilson is sufficiently shown by the following statement which he made to the Department of State on March 3, 1921:]

"[I beg to return the note received yesterday from the Japanese Government, which I have read, in relation to the proposed mandate covering the island of Yap.

"My first information of a contention that the so-called decision of May 7, 1919, by the council of four assigned to Japan a mandate for the island of Yap, was conveyed to me by Mr. Norman W. Davis in October last. I then informed him that I had never consented to the assignment of the island of Yap to Japan.

"I had not previously given particular attention to the wording of the council minutes of May 7, 1919, which were only recently called to my attention. I had on several occasions prior to the date mentioned made specific reservations regarding the island of Yap and had taken the position that it should not be assigned under mandate to any one power, but should be internationalized for cable purposes.] I assumed that this position would be duly considered in connection with the settlement of the cable question and that it therefore was no longer a matter for consideration in connection with the peace negotiations. I never abandoned or modified this position in respect to the island of Yap, and I did not agree on May 7, 1919, or at any other time, that the island of Yap should be included in the assignment of mandates to Japan.

"As a matter of fact, all agreements arrived at regarding the assignment of mandates were conditional upon a subsequent agreement being reached as to the specific terms of the mandates, and further upon their acceptance by each of the principal allied and associated powers. The consent of the United States is essential both as to assignments of mandates and the terms and provisions of the mandates, after agreement as to their assignment or allocation.

"The consent of the United States, as you know, has never been given on either point as to the island of Yap."

"Apart from the expressed purpose of President Wilson in relation to the island of Yap, inasmuch as the proceedings of the supreme council on May 7, 1919, did not, and in the nature of things could not, have finality, this Government is unable to perceive any grounds for the contention that it was the duty of this Government to make immediate protest with respect to the so-called decision of May 7, 1919, and certainly it can not be said that an omission to do so operated as a cession of its rights. It may be added, however, that when the matter was brought to the attention of this Government in connection with conference on communications in October last this Government informed the Government of Japan and other Governments (by notes of November 9, 1920) that it was the understanding of this Government that the island of Yap was not included in the action of May 7, 1919. Its position was subsequently stated at length.

"It is a cause of regret to this Government that after and despite this protest there should have been any attempt to pass upon drafts of mandates purporting to deal with the Pacific Islands, including Yap, and that a mandate should have been approved, or attempted to be put into effect, which while purporting to be made in the name of the United States, was without the assent of the United States. This Government trusts that this action, which it must assume was taken under a misapprehension, will be reconsidered.

"[In particular, as no treaty has ever been concluded with the United States relating to the island of Yap, and as no one has ever been authorized to cede or surrender the right or interest of the United States in the island, this Government must insist that it has not lost its right or interest as it existed prior to any action of the supreme council] [or of the League of Nations, and can not recognize the allocation of the island or the validity of the mandate to Japan.

"In this view this Government deems it to be unnecessary at this time to consider the terms of the so-called 'C' mandates, or the discussion with respect thereto.

"This Government, as has been clearly stated in previous communications, seeks no exclusive interest in the island of Yap and has no desire to secure any privileges without having similar privileges accorded to other powers, including, of course, Japan, and relying upon the sense of justice of the Government of Japan and of the Governments of the other allied and associated powers, this Government looks with confidence to a disposition of the matter whereby the just interests of all may be properly conserved.]"

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION FOR VETERANS OF WORLD WAR.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, in common with the great majority of the Members of this and the other branch of Congress I have been under a promise to support adjusted compensation legislation. I am rising here now in advance of the measure's coming to us in order that those to whom such promise has been made may know that I can not go forward with it at the present time.

No one will undertake to minimize the country's obligation to the young men whom the long arm of the Government reached out and seized for military service in the World War. Neither will anyone undertake to rebuke the wholly proper feeling of resentment which these young men feel toward their associates of like age and physical strength who sought shelter in the essential occupations at home and who received the unduly swollen compensation which those occupations provided.

But, Mr. President, we must bear in mind the scriptural admonition that there is time for all things, and this is not the time for pressing legislation of this character. No plan thus far advanced for dealing with this subject can possibly be carried out without unwarranted dislocation of the impelling and unavoidable financial readjustment growing out of the existing debt of the war or without continuing for an indefinite period features of the existing taxation system which I regard as iniquitous, inquisitorial, and unjust.

With commendable moderation the authorized spokesmen for the organized bodies of World War veterans who have come before Congress have laid their first emphasis upon the care of the disabled, the widowed, and the orphaned rather than upon any special recognition for those who successfully withstood the difficulties and the dangers of war-time experience and who were permitted to return home in sound health.

No suggestion brought here for the succor of the needy, the sick and the bereft, who constitute our most sinister inheritance of the war, has fallen upon deaf ears. With cheerful alacrity and without regard to party designations, Senators and Representatives hastened to relieve the needs of those upon whom war had laid the heaviest burden. In all of these the question of expense was never raised. And the Republic, never ungrateful, through its Congress in the years of the war and those succeeding the armistice, including the appropriations already made for the fiscal year 1923, has set aside the unparalleled sum of $1,852,000,000, all of which has been allocated for military and naval family allowances, for compensation for death and disability, for insurance, for vocational training, for hospital construction, for the care of patients, for the bringing home or segregating in France of the heroic bones of our dead. And it is especially noteworthy, Mr. President, that in the tabulation furnished me by the accomplished clerk of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, there is in this stupendous sum only $53,000,000 specifically allowed for administrative expense, so that substantially 97 per cent of the total sum appropriated has gone directly to those whom we have sought to relieve.

This tabulation, in much detail, which I have in my hand, Mr. President, I ask to have incorporated in my remarks when they shall be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The statement referred to is as follows:

Statement showing appropriations made for allowances and benefits on account of soldiers and sailors who participated in the World War, including appropriations made at the third session of the Sixty-sixth Congress and the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress.

NOTE.—To the grand total above indicated should be added the sum of $300,000,000 in the items of the bill now in conference, and providing for the maintenance of the independent Government establishments, including the War Risk Insurance Bureau, etc.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, the so-called bonus bill, around which the storm of discussion now rages, is so curiously complex with its fivefold beneficiary features and is so complicated additionally by the difficulty of indicating with exactness the cash sums, either by installments or in grand total, which will be needed to carry out its provisions, that we may not estimate even with seeming accuracy the draft which it will make upon the Treasury. We know, however, that it will be great.

The President in his address to the Senate last July indicated his belief that the sum required would range from $3,000,000,000 to $5,000,000,000. These figures were produced upon the assumption that the cash adjustments should be made in one payment—a method which the President then favored by implication and which more recently in his letter to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, has declared to be "a vastly better bestowal if we can await the day when we may safely undertake to pay at once in full, so that the award may be turned to real advantage."

Both in his address of last July and in his recent letter, the President pointed out the conditions which beset the Treasury and which involve the meeting within the next 16 months of more than $6,000,000,000 of maturing national obligations. These conditions can not be changed by act of Congress, and it is unthinkable that we shall be able to reduce or even to readjust our tax burdens if we commit the Treasury to this additional obligation.

I have noted, Mr. President, the various expedients of taxation with which it has been sought to burden adjusted compensation legislation. I have noted also the engulfing wave of protest which has arisen in every section of the country. And I have wondered at times, sir, whether there might not be in the public mind some confusion of thought as between the unpopularity of the taxation which has been proposed and the unpopularity of the measure itself.

There is but one form of taxation suggested for the purpose of carrying this proposal into effect which seems to me at all in keeping with the purposes of the proposal. The benefits of the proposed legislation, whether they are to be in cash, or in any of the other four proposals, will be spread throughout the States in proportion to their respective populations, because the selective draft law under which our armies of the World War were raised operated upon that basis. Therefore the payment of whatever obligations we shall take on should be in the same manner diffused among all the States in like proportion.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. MOSES. I do.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Does the Senator from New Hampshire see any resemblance between the propaganda now being conducted against the bonus and the propaganda that was conducted in favor of canceling the debt which Europe owes us?

Mr. MOSES. I am not personally familiar with either propaganda, and therefore I can not answer the Senator's question.

The sales tax which the President and the Secretary of the Treasury have proposed for the bearing of this obligation meets the requirement which I have indicated. Under it every citizen of every State will pay his share—a share based upon his ability to pay, which to my mind is one of the surest indications of one's ability to pay. I have hitherto advocated such a tax as an integral feature of our fiscal system, but, Mr. President, I do not wish such a tax to be assessed as an additional burden upon the already too heavy load which our people are carrying, nor would I have it except as a means of relief from the "inequities and unjustifiable exasperations" which high authority has told me abound under the present system of taxation. I hope, Mr. President, that at some time not too far distant we shall again approach the question of tax revision and that we shall then devise a truly simplified and a really productive system of taxation in which the sales tax will have its proper place. That day, however, is not yet here, and we will have an unbalanced budget with an increasing demand for Federal appropriations. These, like the poor, will be always with us until we face the whole question with consistency and courage.

In the meantime, Mr. President, we have no right to attempt still further to destroy the financial equilibrium of the Nation, nor, in my opinion, has anyone the right to ask us to attempt it. I have not enumerated the stupendous sums already voted by Congress for the heroic youth who bore the Nation's burdens in the late war because I begrudge them or because I think any of them unnecessary. It so happens that my service here has run substantially from the date of the armistice, and I have voted with cheerful alacrity for all of the items making up the almost billion and a half of dollars which Congress has authorized for soldier's recognition. In addition I have voted for measures designed to ameliorate the condition of necessitous or disabled veterans of the Civil War and the War with Spain, for enlarged pensions to Civil War widows and to widows and orphans of the Spanish War. It is my hope, therefore, Mr. President, that my hesitation to vote for the legislation now proposed can not be attributed to any feeling of hostility or criticism for any soldier of the Republic. It is because I can not justify such a vote with the economic, industrial, and financial conditions which to-day exist in this country.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I could not keep from thinking about the time these boys were fighting in France, when many of them were going through the city of Washington and looking upon the capital of their Nation for the last time. I remember then how the distinguished Senator from the State of New Hampshire [Mr. Moses] and all of us pointed with patriotic pride to and looked with great admiration upon these stalwart young men who had given up their all in the way of a profession, who had left all of their business pursuits, who had seen their little businesses practically wiped out, and went away thinking perhaps that they would never come back, and thousands of them never did return. I remember when we used to read the casualty lists, how we scanned them each morning. We were looking to see if any of our loved ones and friends had fallen in battle; and I remember how, as those lists grew, our hearts went out to these boys who stood on the firing line in France, going down to death each day; how men in this country of great wealth would say at the time their patriotism was aroused to the highest point: "I would give half I have to end that war in victory to-morrow and bring our boys back home."

We heard that. Senators heard it on every hand. Our people were keyed up to the very highest pitch, and there was not anything then that we would not have done for these dear boys who, 3,000 miles away, were giving their all for their country.

Mr. President, thousands of them fell on the fields of France. Thousands of them died of disease incident to war. Thousands of them are lame and halt for life. I saw one of them in the café in the House one day sitting at a table taking a meal with friends. I did not know that he was crippled. He was a cheerful, brave lad, laughing and talking with his friends; and when the meal was finished I saw the waiter bring in a little truck with low wheels, and I saw the friends of the soldier boy take him out of the chair and place him on the truck. Both of his legs were cut off at the thigh.

I have seen many of these boys at the Walter Reed Hospital. I have gone out there upon their invitation three or four times and have spoken to them. I have talked to fathers and mothers at home who lost sons in battle, and I have seen their sons return, and I have seen them in actual want in the land whose very life their valor had saved.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. In connection with the Senator's remarks, which are so well timed, and which, I hope, will some day have influence upon the Congress and the country, I read this letter, which I received from one of these ex-service men:

Permit me to thank you for your courtesies to me while in Washington. While you and I disagree on some political points, yet my heart is with you in the hope that the citizenship of this country may know that "War is hell." My hearing is defective, my health impaired, I am in debt because I believed my country needed my services. I was just out of my second year in college when the crisis came. Why is it, sir, that those of us who really fought this fight and made the sacrifices are to-day considered as vagabonds and liars? My God! What has come over those thousands of people who cheered us as we went into that abyss of torture and sacrifice? I am loyal to my country; I draw no compensation because I can make my own way, yet I can't see why as an ex-service man I do not have equal social standing with the evader of duty.

Again thanking you for your favors, I am, sir,

Very sincerely, yours,

G. W. YARBOROUGH.

Of Roanoke, Ala., a professor in the schools there.

Mr. HEFLIN. I know him very well, Mr. President. He is a splendid young man.

Mr. President, I would rather have almost anything happen to me than to have these boys who went off to fight to save my country come back and stand before me and say that I had shown myself to be ungrateful to them; that I had denied them simple justice; that I was in position to demand for them fair treatment at the hands of the Government whose life they had saved and that I refused to serve them in that time; that they had offered to die for me and mine; and that I, in the time of peace, representing in the Senate of the United States the richest Government on the globe, refused to have that Government be just to them when sheer want stared them in the face.

Mr. President, I do not care what certain special high-brow interests think about my position. I am not seeking to please them. I am seeking to serve my country's highest and best interests and be just to the men who made my Government's existence at this hour possible. I know that I shall be criticized. I shall be criticized by the yelpers of Wall Street for the speech that I am making now. They do not want anybody in place and power to stand up and dare throw himself across their pathway. They want Senators to bow and smile and follow their dictates and keep their lips sealed unless they will stand up here and be their flunkies and mouthpieces.

Mr. President, it has come to a pitiful pass in a great Republic like ours when those who dare to stand here and plead for justice to the ex-service men are to be referred to as demagogues. Who is the demagogue—the man who asks for justice for men who went out in the open battle field and offered to lay down their lives, offered themselves where danger and death were raining all around? Who is the demagogue—the man who asks for justice to these boys or the man who is the subservient tool of special interests and stands up and cries out against those who want justice for these men?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I will ask the Senator from Alabama if the very men who are fighting the bonus are not the men who took off the ultrarich profiteers of the war period $495,000,000 of taxes?

Mr. HEFLIN. Absolutely, Mr. President. My friend has reminded me of that; and, if my recollection serves me right, the Senator from New Hampshire who has just made his speech, and who has told us that conditions would not warrant fair treatment—that is the substance of it; that is the effect of his speech—to these boys at this time, was one of those who voted to take that tax off the profiteers of the country—profiteers who sat 3,000 miles from the battle front in perfect safety; profiteers who had the ocean rolling between them and the battle front; profiteers who took advantage of their country's distress and misfortune and fed upon its substance and made millions and hundreds of millions; and the Government under the reign of the Democratic Party laid taxes upon them, and we were collecting nearly half a billion dollars to help pay the war expenses, and I saw a Republican Senate strike down that tax and take it off of these men, the only men who profited by the war, and refuse to give a dollar of it to the men, the only men, who went to the battle front and spilled their blood and offered their lives to save the country.

Oh, Mr. President, I would that the whole American people could know what is going on down here!

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

Mr. HEFLIN. I shall be glad to yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Let me remind the Senator from Alabama that the very President who came here to kill the bonus bill came here and asked for $500,000,000 for the railroads.

Mr. HEFLIN. Oh, Mr. President, whenever an outside power wants to get a finger in the pie the leaders of the Republican Party are Johnny on the spot. They are right on the job; but whenever you call for justice to the soldier boys or to somebody out amongst the mass of the people, that is too indefinite for them. They want a concrete proposition. They want a proposition that can come back in the form of campaign funds to the Republican Party.

I want to serve notice on you now that if the ex-service men of this country have the courage that I think they have, that they have shown they have, they will smite you, as they should, at the polls this fall. How could he vote the Republican ticket when a Senator on the other side, from New Hampshire, gets up and reads an essay about the financial conditions of the country and how much of an obligation he feels to the soldier and how he wants to see him treated fairly, but the situation now will not justify it?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

Mr. HEFLIN. Just one moment. Suppose the soldier boys in France, when they saw those shells sweeping the battle plain, when they saw those field guns and machine guns mowing down everything in sight, when not a particle of vegetation could live on an open field, had stood back and said, "The conditions out there do not justify me in advancing"?

What would the writers of these essays think about that? If conditions over there like that were gone into by men who were willing to die for their Government, that Government ought to have the courage to tax the profiteers and collect some of the foreign debt, and the interest on it, and pay off this debt to the American soldiers.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, it is a somewhat insignificant detail, but the Senator from New Hampshire was pledged to the bonus during his canvass for election to the Senate.

Mr. HEFLIN. Little by little we are bringing out important facts. Is not that an interesting disclosure, that the Senator from New Hampshire, when he was running for office, when he wanted to gather the votes all unto himself, was then bowing and smiling? Certainly he was in favor of a bonus, and he sent his kindest regards; but after he was elected, and had gotten himself a six-year term, he forgot the degrees by which he did ascend, and he prepared and read his essay.

Mr. ASHURST and Mr. CARAWAY rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator from Arizona, as he rose first.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I desire to direct the attention of the Senator for a moment to an article from that bible of conservatism, the Boston Transcript, now and for some time past most ably edited by that brilliant young man, James P. Williams, jr. He edited a newspaper in Arizona a few years ago, and edited it with remarkable ability and vigor. He has for some time presided over the Boston Transcript, and one of his articles which recently appeared respecting the bonus was as follows:

The new administration has been very active since it entered into power in adjusting compensation with the war contractors, many of whom grew rich out of their contracts, and very few of whom suffered any loss. The new administration has not hesitated to seek from Congress adjusted compensation for the railroads, despite the fact that the railroad situation itself provided many instances of profiteering and inefficiency during the war period. This is not to find fault with the Government for adjusting compensation with the contractors or with the railroads. It is only to suggest that having made those adjustments it would seem that the time is at hand for the Government to make an adjustment of the compensation due its war-time defenders with the colors. Surely the men who served their country by fighting for its very existence, or by training so to fight, are entitled at least to the same consideration that has been paid so promptly and so generously to others who did not fight or train themselves to fight.

Mr. President, that is not from some demagogue, as they call us, out on the hustings looking for votes; that is an editorial by the brilliant editor of that great conservative journal, the Boston Transcript. That is the view of that editor, and in a previous paragraph he had pointed out that the Republican Party is bound in faith and in honor, so far as men could be bound, to pay this adjusted compensation, if that party were given power.

So the Senator from Alabama is quite right when he adverts to the fact that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Moses] was for a bonus when he thought he could get votes by taking that position, and now, when the day has come to deliver on that promise, he conveniently finds excuses as to why he shall not vote for a bonus.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank my good friend from Arizona for his very timely contribution.

Mr. ASHURST. Let me say, in conclusion, that the article by Mr. Williams, editor of the Boston Transcript, is one of the most luminous and penetrating articles that has been written on either side of the adjusted-compensation question during the whole controversy, and it will pay anybody in this country to reread the article at any time.

Mr. HEFLIN. I now yield to my friend, the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I suggest to the Senator from Alabama that he reread the speech which the President made at the Lincoln dinner the other day in this city, in which he said, in effect, that he thought primaries were a mistake, that he wanted a return to the old convention days. I presume that fore-shadows that the next nominee of the Republican Party will be selected by a convention. That being true, does not the Senator think that the Senator from New Hampshire is wise in not wanting the bonus paid out to the soldiers, if he can go down to Georgia and Alabama and buy niggers with the money for the convention, as he said he did in 1920?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I can see what my good friend from Arkansas is driving at. He reminds us that the Republican President said that he wanted to do away with primaries, so that they can have a convention, where there would be just a few men to reach and control. If they keep up the sort of fight they have made on the bonus and ex-service men which they are carrying on now they will not have enough delegates to wad a shotgun in any convention in the country.

Since my friend from Arkansas has reminded me that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Moses] served on a committee to look after the obtaining of Negro delegates in the South—

Mr. CARAWAY. I think he was the whole committee. He said they selected him because of his thrift, because he could buy more for the same money than anybody else.

Mr. HEFLIN. Anyway, they appointed him to look after the "brothers in black," as he would call them.

Mr. CARAWAY. Brothers in ebony.

Mr. HEFLIN. Ebony-hued. I heard that in a convention up in Chicago when the race was on between Col. Roosevelt and Mr. Taft they bought our Negroes so many times that it was a hard matter to keep the record straight, and that finally some of the Taft leaders gave the Negro leaders a thousand-dollar bill each to support their candidate, and they got to the point where they were afraid to trust them with the thousand, and they cut the thousand-dollar bill in two with scissors, the leader keeping one-half of it and the Negro delegate the other, and when he stood up in the convention and cast his vote he went back and got the other piece and pasted the pieces together, and the deal was finished. So it may well be that they want to get rid of the primary plan.

Mr. CARAWAY. They said so.

Mr. HEFLIN. With the record they are making here I would not blame them, because the folks back home, whose Government this is, are not going to vote to sustain the record you are making here. It is well for them to get to the convention plan, because the folks back home are not with them. I mean the masses.

I want to refer to a point suggested to my mind by what the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] read. I remember when the war was over that men came to Congress and said, "I was working for the Government. You asked me to provide certain supplies. I was providing those supplies, and I have an accumulation of supplies on hand now. I have invested money in this plant which I have constructed, but the war is over and you tell me you do not want any more supplies. I will lose all the money I invested and I have still got this stuff on my hands. I claim that I have been injured by the Government so many thousand dollars, and I want my money," and you paid it to them. The soldier gave up his entire business and went off and offered his life for his country and lost his $30 a month when the war ended.

The soldier who was in a business that paid him $250 a month was plucked out of it and put on the battle front at $30 a month, and he lost all between $30 a month and $250, or $220 a month. He comes back and he does not ask you to give him the difference, but he asks for adjusted compensation, an amount which the Government will say he is entitled to, and you will not even give him a chance to have that done. How are you going to defend that before any judgment bar of honest people in this country? How are you going to defend it, Senators? I want to tell Senators now that this little reading of essays about the financial conditions will not work.

Somebody will ask you just what I asked you a little while ago. Suppose the soldier had said that when the German Army was advancing and sweeping everything before it with its implements of destruction. Suppose the soldier had said, "Conditions do not warrant me in going out there," and he had just kept backing off until Germany had gone into Paris and the Kaiser had cried, "On to America." What would you have done then?

Mr. CARAWAY. Paid an indemnity.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; you would have paid an indemnity, as my friend from Arkansas reminds me. The Kaiser, standing on the battle fields of France, looking into the distance with his field glasses, as his troops commenced to advance, said, "On to Paris and world dominion," and then again he said, "We will make the United States pay $40,000,000,000 indemnity." These boys for whom we ask fair treatment saved every dollar of that indemnity, and now you do not want to give them adjusted compensation when you can pay it without taxing the American people.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, let me remind my friend the Senator from Alabama that partly out of our money England is paying her soldiers a bonus of $141, and partly out of our money France is paying her soldiers a bonus of more than $200.

Mr. HEFLIN. France owes us money, Mr. President, which she could pay to-day. England owes us money which she could pay to-day. Yet we are permitting France and England to keep that money. We have not collected a dollar of interest on it, though the Republicans have had control of Congress for more than three years. Oh, Mr. President, we could collect that interest and some of the principal—a little of the principal—and pay this whole thing off, and not tax the American people one dollar. It is said that the dollars which they owe us belong to the American people. Yes; but you are going to give it to them. You do not intend to collect it. You are going to postpone the payment of the interest in order that Wall Street may collect her $5,000,000,000, which has already been provided for. I discussed that some days ago. Now, they have a commission appointed with five Republicans on it, and not a Democrat on it to watch them. Mr. President, we are not represented on that commission.

I heard President Harding read a message here one day, and I understood him to say that the minority had a great work to do; that it was the duty of the minority to watch out and to have part in legislation; and that it had a great service to perform in the Government.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the reason he left them out—because they had too much to do.

Mr. HEFLIN. That may be so, Mr. President; but when it comes to appointing this commission he named five Republicans. Think of that, the President of a hundred million people, in a country where there are two great political parties, the Democratic and the Republican Parties, both entitled to be represented upon a commission like that, and the President names five members of his own party to take up the matter of settling an indebtedness of $11,000,000,000 to the whole people of America—not to the Republican Party—with interest which has accrued for several years, making an indebtedness of between eleven and twelve billion dollars at this time.

Now, Mr. President, I did not expect to say more than a word or two. I want to keep the record straight. I want the boys in every State to know when they read the essay of my good friend from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] that there is some one here to speak a word for them and that several Senators disagree with the Senator from New Hampshire.

We can pay the adjusted compensation to the soldier boys by levying this tax upon the profiteers. We can get half a billion dollars of it in that way. We can collect the interest on the foreign debt and put that interest with the tax to which I have just referred and pay it all and not tax the American people one cent. But the propaganda is on. They are writing letters now to me and to every Senator and to Members of the House. They have concerted action now going on to beat down the idea of adjusted compensation for our soldiers. I do not know what the result will be. I do not suppose those boys will get anything until after there is a change in the political complexion of things at the Capitol and in the White House; but the signs of the times indicate an early and a sweeping change.

TREATY WITH JAPAN.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty between the United States and Japan with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator, in particular the island of Yap, signed at Washington on February 11, 1922.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the first article of the treaty with Japan.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I hope there will be no effort made to force the treaty to a vote to-day. I have been away to some extent, but no one is to blame for that except myself. I think a treaty of this character requires very careful consideration by the Senate. It has not yet received that consideration. I think the treaty ought to be laid aside to-day. I am not prepared to talk on it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this treaty is before the Senate and has been before it since Monday. I have no desire to press any Senator unduly, but I think it is very important to get the treaties disposed of, and I feel that it will be my duty to keep them before the Senate and try to get a vote as soon as I can after reasonable debate.

Mr. REED. I take it that the reply of the Senator from Massachusetts means that he proposes to insist on going on this afternoon with the treaty. I would like to have had an opportunity to give the treaty some intimate study. It has been reported out of the committee only a short time. It involves primarily the settlement of our rights in the Pacific Ocean, and it may seriously embarrass us for a century of time in the future.

We have gotten along so far in our history without this treaty and we could struggle along a few days more without suffering any disaster.

I know there are several Senators who expect to speak on the treaty, some of whom are not now present. In the face of the positive statement by the Senator from Massachusetts I of course can not proffer any further request, but I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Glass	New	Shortridge
Borah	Harrell	Newberry	Simmons
Brandegee	Harris	Norris	Smith
Bursum	Harrison	Oddie	Spencer
Cameron	Hefflin	Overman	Trammell
Capper	Jones, N. Mex.	Page	Underwood
Caraway	Jones, Wash.	Pepper	Walsh, Mass.
Cole	Kellogg	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
Cummins	Kendrick	Pittman	Warren
Edge	Keyes	Poinceter	Watson, Ga.
Elkins	King	Pomerene	Williams
Fernald	Ladd	Ransdell	Willis
Fletcher	Lodge	Reed
France	McKellar	Robinson
Gerry	Nelson	Sheppard

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was requested to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] are detained at a hearing before the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, events move rapidly in these days, so rapidly that the Senate is required to ratify almost without debate treaties that affect the entire jurisdiction of the Pacific, alliances with foreign powers, a surrender of national rights, and the abandonment of the most ancient and most sacred of our national policies. Overnight the situation changes; but I think of all the startling exhibitions of change to which the country and the world have been treated, the finest example is found in the address of our British ambassador to Great Britain.

America has produced two great Georges—George Washington, the father of his country, and George Harvey, the ambassador to the Court of St. James. I happened to be the only Democrat, if I remember correctly, who made a speech defending the appointment of Mr. Harvey. I withdraw the speech. I adorn myself with the sackcloth of repentance and I put the ashes of contrition upon my brow. Let it never be said hereafter that at least once in my life I have not humbly confessed my wrongs and asked forgiveness for my trespasses.

It is printed in the New York Evening World of February 21 last—and being so written down its verity can not be disputed—that Mr. Harvey said in London at the dinner of the Pilgrims' Society:

To my mind, my lords and gentlemen, the greatest achievement of the Washington conference was no achievement at all. It was revelation—the revelation of Great Britain to America and of America to Great Britain.

All of us here have acclaimed for years what we rejoiced to believe was the natural affinity, the increasing fraternity of our two peoples. To utter a misgiving about that was to pronounce oneself a heretic. If evidences were not wholly manifest at times, emotions were nevertheless felt to be sure and true. They were in the air. They enveloped beings with atmospheric attributes which inspired wistful conviction. I have believed this for years. I believe it now.

Mr. President, I dislike to interrupt the continuity of so lucid a dissertation as that, but I go back to call the attention of less trained minds than that of our diplomat to the language—

They were in the air; they enveloped beings with atmospheric attributes which inspired wistful conviction.

I was at a loss to understand that sentence until I remembered that it was made in the presence of British nobles, amidst British beauties, at a banquet table in London, beneath the union jack; and yet I was not entirely clear until I read a bit of poetry appearing on the same page of the newspaper and in juxtaposition to the speech of our ambassador. I think, perhaps, it will furnish an adequate understanding of the sentence I have just read. The poem is reprinted from the Morning Post; it is stated that Americans in London now sing it. I presume it was sung on the previous evening:

Sing a song of sixpence,
A bottle full of rye,
Four-and-twenty Yankees
Sitting parched and dry,
When the rye was opened
The Yanks began to sing,
"We won't go back to the U. S. A.;
God save the King!"

[Laughter.]

If that be not the true explanation of the sentence I have just read relating to "atmospheric attributes which inspired wistful conviction," then I am at a loss to furnish an adequate explanation.

But I read on. Our ambassador continues amidst the clinking of glasses and the music of laughter and the applause—

But we have to realize all things. Even the strongest feelings are matters of degree; human passions no less than human bodies are subject to influences of heat and cold—

When the rye was opened
The Yanks began to sing,
"We won't go back to the U. S. A.;
God save the King!"

Returning to Mr. Harvey's text:

Whereat at present I rejoice mightily in the belief that the invisible but impelling forces in the air, which have so long sustained us, Britons and Americans, have at last been supplemented and strengthened immeasurably by the discovery of a complete mutuality of interest, self-interest, if you like, upon the face of the earth. We stand now on solid ground.

We stand on solid ground, I take it, Mr. President, because we "rejoice mightily in the belief that the invisible and impelling forces in the air" have put us there.

That sentence requires something in the way of explanation beyond the inspiration which might have come, assuming that the doggerel I have read is a correct history, from mere rye. Something more inspiring and befuddling and bemuddling than rye had to be imbibed before a man could talk about the "invisible and impelling forces in the air" which have at last placed our feet "on solid ground."

The orator continues:

To each blessed country the other has been revealed in all its intelligence, fairness, and honor—

Might he not have added "sobriety"?—

and the sight in the eyes of God and man is good. Ask Mr. Balfour and his associates if, approaching the shores of America a second time, they would feel the slightest trepidation of mistrust or misgiving; ask Mr. Hughes and his associates if in like circumstances there would live in their minds the remotest suspicion of arrogance or narrowness or unworthy subtlety in the hearts of their visitors. As we say in the United States, sense your people, my Lord Chairman; simultaneously, if you can, find a way to sense mine.

Can you question for a moment the truly amazing enhancement of respect, regard, and trust each great controlling multitude has for the other since Mr. Balfour left us here on the night of October 31 to sail for America?

Now, I want to treat this coming sentence with seriousness:

Not liberty alone, not union alone, but "liberty and union, one and inseparable," was the most striking dictum of America's greatest Senator of America's greatest need, and such in fairly accurate parallel is the chief requirement of our two working and trading countries to-day.

Not liberty alone, not union alone, but "liberty and union, one and inseparable," are in fairly accurate parallel the chief requirement of Great Britain and the United States.

That is a fair paraphrase of the declaration of this official representative of the United States Government, who, if his sentiments were expressed in sobriety, does not represent either the spirit of the American Republic officially or the sense and judgment of the people of the United States.

A declaration of this kind can not be passed over lightly. It amounts to nothing less than advocacy of a doctrine which has been whispered about in this country for 20 years, that the United States and Great Britain ought to form part of one empire. It would be treasonable if it were not idiotic.

Not liberty alone, not union alone, but liberty and union, one and inseparable—

Was the sentiment expressed by Daniel Webster as to the American States; and, says George Harvey, American ambassador to the Court of St. James:

Such in fairly accurate parallel is the chief requirement of Great Britain and of the United States.

Mr. President, George Washington said:

It is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance, it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect, or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

George Harvey says:

I rejoice mightily in the belief that the invisible but impelling forces in the air, which have so long sustained us, Britons and Americans, have at last been supplemented and strengthened immeasurably by the discovery of a complete mutuality of interest, self-interest, if you like, upon the face of the earth.

No fair construction of that language is possible, except that he preaches the doctrine that these two nations are united in all of their interests—the complete antithesis of the doctrine taught by Washington.

In 1796 George Washington said:

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalry, interest, humor, or caprice?

But George Harvey says:

Not liberty alone, not union alone, but "liberty and union, one and inseparable," * * * in fairly accurate parallel is the chief requirement of our * * * two countries to-day.

Further on Mr. Harvey declares:

Not pleasing sentiment only, not stern reality only, but the two combined are requisite for that full understanding we have so long been seeking, which now seems attained through the demonstration of the simple fact that whatever benefits one English-speaking people must inevitably be helpful to the other. That is the lesson of the revelation of Washington.

Let us examine that choice bit of nonsense: "Whatever benefits one English-speaking nation benefits the other. Whatever benefits Great Britain benefits us."

Were we united in spirit and interest when at the close of this war England reaffirmed her policy of blood and iron in Ireland?

Were we particularly and specially benefited when at the close of this war England again laid her hand upon the white throat of Persia and took over the suzerainty of that country?

Were we united in spirit and in interest with Great Britain when at the close of this war Egypt sought to send her representatives to the Versailles convention to ask of that tribunal, assembled in the name of humanity and of peace, justice for Egypt? Were we united in interest when those representatives were hurled into prison without warrant and without trial?

Does whatever benefits the British nation benefit us? Was that true when Great Britain seized the oil fields of Asia and exploited them for her own gain?

Were we united in spirit when only a few years ago the imperial war chariot of Great Britain rolled over the bloody corpses of two free Republics in South Africa?

Were we united in interest with Great Britain when, during the days of old Grover Cleveland—when, thank God, we had an American President—Great Britain proposed to invade Venezuela and to disregard the Monroe doctrine, when the British minister with contumely and scorn trampled that instrument under his feet and declared it to be a piece of American impudence?

Were we united in interest and in principle, sir, when during the Civil War England—not because she loved the South but because she hoped to divide this Republic and thus weaken her—opened her ports for the fitting out of piratical craft to prey upon American commerce, and was afterwards convicted and compelled to pay an indemnity?

Were we united in interest when England gave her sanction during the Civil War to a further invasion of the Monroe doctrine by assisting and aiding and abetting France in her invasion and seizure of Mexico?

Were we united in interest when, prior to the Civil War, we had, or thought we had, an opportunity to acquire Cuba, and England imposed her imperious will against us?

Were we united in interest when we contested over the Northwest Territory, and, because England was powerful and we were yet weak, we were compelled to yield to her a vast territory over which the Union Jack of England flies to-day, but over which the flag of the United States ought to float, and which ought to be peopled by citizens of this Republic?

Were we united in interest and in spirit with Great Britain when, just after the Revolutionary War had closed and we were yet a struggling nation, she invaded our rights upon the high seas, plundered our commerce, and impressed our seamen?

Were we united in interest with her when British redcoats were invading our soil?

When did this union of interest come? It is, of course, a doctrine that is extremely pleasing to Britishers, because Great Britain seizes everything within her reach, and, according to the doctrine of Harvey, whatever Britain seizes and takes to herself is equally for the benefit of the United States of America.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. FRANCE. I would suggest to the Senator that the apparent inconsistency is not an inconsistency at all, because there is a group of men, and of very important men, in this country who hold the view that if we acquiesce in Great Britain's enjoying the privileges of all of these territories and of trade with all of the nations of Europe to the exclusion of American interests and of American trade that policy will make Great Britain more able to meet her obligations to us.

They are perfectly logical in their contention, and some of the gentlemen who hold the view that the Mesopotamia oil fields should be given to Great Britain, that Russia, with her vast possibilities of development of trade, should be given to Great Britain, state that it will be to the interests of the United States to do that, for by so doing we will enable Great Britain to be in a stronger financial position to pay her obligations to us, some of which obligations, by the way, are in the strong boxes of the very gentlemen who hold those views.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, this doctrine of Mr. Harvey's has a background. There have been Tories in the United States ever since the days of Washington, just as there were Tories in the days of Washington. There are yet men in the United States who have never been satisfied with the idea of a free and independent Republic. There are parts of the United States where they have imitated the English dialect so long that when you are there you can not tell whether you are listening to Britishers or listening to people born under the American flag.

Let me read:

Let men say what they will, I will say that as surely as the sun in the heavens once shone upon Britain and America united, so surely is it one morning to rise, shine upon and greet again the reunited States of "the British-American union."

National patriotism or pride can not prove a serious obstacle in the way of reunion.

All party divisions sink into nothingness in my thoughts compared with the reunion of our race.

The reunited nation would be prompt to repel any assault upon the soil or the rights of any of its parts. Consider its defensive power. The new nation would dominate the world.

The first step will be taken in the great mission of the English-speaking race, for it will then be so powerful that our race will be the arbiters of the world. Whatever obstructs reunion, I oppose; whatever promotes reunion, I favor.

That was the declaration of Andrew Carnegie, made years ago, printed in a great American magazine, and it was followed shortly thereafter by the organization of the American Peace Society, of Washington, D. C., and other societies, some of which were financed out of the millions Carnegie had illegally made in the United States.

An international union was laid out. It had representatives in nearly every country of Europe. A part of its doctrine was that this union would work for international policies and that it would seek to control the actions of the respective Governments.

Those organizations are still in existence. The annual report of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, as contained in the Yearbook for 1917, page 145, contains a statement of the expenditure of thousands of dollars for international visits of representative men; for work through newspapers and periodicals; for courses in universities on international relations; and for assistance in governmental work. Some of the various publications sent out by these associations are "The Advocate of Peace," "The Message," "The World Court Magazine," and "The International Conciliation Monthly," and, in addition to those, a number of books advocating directly, or by indirection, the doctrine of internationalism.

English statesmen and English publicists have in the last few months frequently given expression to the idea that the United States and Great Britain are united in interest. The hint runs through them all that the day is coming when our Government and the British Government must be one, and of course it will be the British Empire, with the United States as a very independent State.

Consistent with this kind of logic and with this same thought is the open and persistent advocacy of the United States canceling the indebtedness due to her from Great Britain and other countries. It is urged that we are part of the same great family, members of the same brotherhood; that we did not exactly do our share in the war anyway; and that we should not insist upon payment from Great Britain. If we will but graciously cancel the debt of $5,000,000,000 owing to us from Great Britain, Great Britain will graciously cancel $5,000,000,000 of debts due to her by France and Italy, and thus all the debts will be wiped out and nobody will be the poorer in Europe. Obviously the United States would be the only Nation to pay a single dollar of this indebtedness.

That propaganda, sirs, has been carried on by men in high places. It has been indorsed by one member of the American Cabinet, if he is correctly reported in the newspapers. It has been indorsed by a group of American bankers, and only recently, within the last 10 or 15 days, one of those bankers, in a carefully prepared article given to the press of the country, advocated the same policy. Of course, it would not do to insinuate that those bankers have European bonds and securities, and that if the United States, as the principal creditor, were to cancel its debts their securities would rise perhaps 100 per cent the moment the United States had canceled those debts.

All of these arguments are based upon the fundamental thought which you find in Mr. Harvey's speech, that the interest of the United States and the interest of England are identical, and that whatever benefits one benefits the other.

Go and tell that to an Englishman. He will agree with you that what will benefit one will benefit the other, provided Great Britain is the one which gets the direct benefit and the United States gets the indirect benefit.

These thoughts run through the treaties we are now making, and undoubtedly brother Harvey, through the mists and clouds which must have enveloped him on this historic evening, visualized the real spirit of the conferences recently held. He saw that America was about to yield her dominance in the Pacific Ocean; that she was about to confirm the titles of France and of Great Britain to substantially all of the islands of the Pacific Ocean; that she was to confirm by treaty the alleged title of Japan to two belts of islands which lie between our coast and the Philippines. Doubtless he observed that we were about to enter into a treaty by which we agreed to protect all of Japan against assault, and that our statesmen were so stupid and so little advised as to what was going on that when I charged upon the floor of the Senate that the term "insular possessions" would include all of Japan, the President the next morning denied it.

The same afternoon, after having been advised by somebody better informed than himself, the President admitted that the treaty did cover all of Japan, but said that made no difference anyway; if it did not cover it all, then the treaty was without fault, and if it did cover it all, then the treaty was equally without fault. Then, after this secret understanding and the President's had been exposed, a reservation, or an addendum, had to be made to the treaty, in which it is expressly stipulated that only certain islands shall be covered by the treaty.

Why were we making this treaty with Japan and this treaty with Great Britain with reference to the defense of the islands of the Pacific? We have two little groups of islands, perhaps three, in the Pacific. The other nations have all the rest of the islands.

The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge] referred to them in a poetic quotation as: "Sprinkled isles, lily upon lily that o'erlace the sea," but if you lift up the lily pads you will find a Jap or Britisher under each of them. There they are by the thousands.

The United States is in possession of the Philippine group, which we not only gained in war, but paid for after the war, the Hawaiian Islands, Guam, and one or two other islands. All the rest of them are claimed by Great Britain or by Japan. And the title to them is confirmed by these treaties, I presume, upon the theory that we are not only united in interest with the British people, but united in interest with the Japanese people, and that whatever benefits either of them equally benefits us.

It is time to have an American President. It is time to have some American diplomats. It is time to have somebody at the Court of St. James who does not believe everything that benefits Great Britain equally benefits us. It is time to have some one there who knows what Washington knew, what Jefferson knew, what Jackson knew, what Lincoln knew, what every man with common sense knows—that America must take care of her own affairs, and that American statesmen must stand guard over American interests.

This is not the first toady we have had over there. I dislike to speak about the dead. Let the dead speak for himself. I am reading from the war letters of Walter H. Page:

By George, it is a fine game!—

Runs one of his postscripts to Col. House—

This Government and ours are standing together all right, especially since the President has taken hold of our foreign relations himself.

Meanwhile I've got to be more or less at home. The prime minister dines with me, the foreign secretary, the archbishop, the colonial secretary—all the rest of 'em; the King talks very freely; Mr. Asquith tells me some of his troubles; Sir Edward has become a good personal friend; Lord Bryce warms up; the lord chancellor is chummy.

And so it goes.

Think of a representative of the greatest Nation on earth, with a few weeks' residence in Great Britain, feeling himself intensely flattered because he has been received into British society. Coming there with the majesty and power of a mighty people, clothed with their greatness, standing to represent their imperial place in the world, he is pleased as Punch that Lord Somebody is chummy and that the prime minister actually put his imperial legs under the same table with an humble American minister.

Upon what kind of food or drink do they nurture these ambassadors of ours? Imagine Daniel Webster in England tickled to death because some Englishman who could trace his ancestors back to a gentleman who held the stirrup for William the Conqueror had actually invited him to his house to dine. Think of old Hickory Jackson as America's minister to the Court of St. James being pleased beyond words that he had actually got chummy with Lord Tomnoddy.

But think, Mr. President, of an American minister who declares that whatever is to the interest of Great Britain is equally to the interest of the United States. Think of a man standing there to represent us and defend us, a great and sovereign people, telling the world that "not liberty alone, not union alone, but liberty and union" between Great Britain and the United States is a thing desired. Can any other construction be put upon that language by an honest man?

Of course, if we start making treaties on the principle that whatever benefits England or benefits Japan equally benefits the United States, there will be no trouble. All we have to do is to give them whatever they want. They will agree to the proposition provided we do that, but when we will want a little something they will immediately insist that whatever benefits the United States does not necessarily benefit them. Accordingly, we find that their theory is that whatever they have any pretext of title to they will hold and we must acknowledge that title and agree to defend it; that whatever we have any interest in we must yield to them and then agree to defend them in it. Such is the exact result of the Yap treaty.

You may try to disguise what is being done. You can fool the American people with these soft phrases and these disguises for a time, but through the disguise the keen intellect of the American people will ultimately penetrate. They will know that while you pretended to reserve every right of America in Yap, you yielded to Japan the one thing which embraced everything, to wit, the sovereignty of the island, and that we are not in a position of equality with Japan in that island. This is a fact which can be clearly demonstrated, if we would get the Japanese view by simply striking out the word "Japan" where it appears and writing "United States" in the treaty, and putting the word "Japan" where the name "United States" appears. Ask a Japanese statesman to yield the sovereignty of Yap to the United States and to take its rights from the United States, and you will very soon find out that we are not in a position of equality.

Moreover, though I had not intended to discuss this to-day, the island of Yap is of no practical or material use to Japan, except as its dominance by Japan interferes with the power of the United States. It is too far away from her coast. It does not constitute an important link in the chain of her possessions. Its importance to Japan consists in the fact that by wresting it from us she takes away from the United States a point of great military advantage to us.

Every naval authority agrees that while the island of Yap in and of itself would amount to but little, yet as a coaling station and as a point from which messages can be sent—an aerial telegraph point—it is of the utmost importance to the United States, because it is a halfway house for us between the Hawaiian Islands and the Philippine Islands. It is to deprive us of that necessary point of vantage that Japan has insisted upon maintaining the sovereignty over that island. Now, what, I pray, does Japan's agreement amount to that we shall have full access to the island and that we shall have the right to send messages over a Japanese telegraph instrument in case of disturbance between Japan and the United States? The instant disturbance occurs she will, of course, because she is already in possession, exclude us from the benefits of a treaty of this kind. It is because Japanese statesmen, wiser than ours, keener than ours, know these facts that they have carefully stipulated for sovereignty over Yap.

But, of course, it is all right, provided we can agree to the Harvey doctrine that whatever benefits Great Britain equally benefits us. I suppose he would be perfectly willing, if he were at Tokyo, to make the same speech in the presence of the Mikado and the assembled beauties of the capital of Japan.

Mr. President, I say it is the duty of the American Congress to demand the recall of George Harvey. Let us send some red-blooded, 100 per cent American to the Court of St. James, some man who believes in America first, in America last, in America throughout; one who can put his legs under British mahogany and keep his head above British influence; somebody who can talk about the practical affairs of life and not about "beings with atmospheric attributes which inspire wistful conviction"; some one who knows that we have American interests, and that there may be mutuality of interest between two countries and, again, complete diversity of interest. Such a thing as complete mutuality is impossible and absurd. Let us send some one who believes in "liberty and union, one and inseparable," in the sense Daniel Webster employed it—liberty of the American States, union of the American States, with one heart and one soul, and that America; an America always desirous to be on good terms with the world, but an America for Americans.

It is not a pleasure to me to make these remarks about Mr. Harvey. I liked him when he lived here. I wish he would come back here and get rejuvenated. I think we ought to invite him back. I think we are spoiling a good man over there, if he has not been already spoiled. I would almost be willing to repeal the prohibitory law to get him back just now.

Senators will notice that in the course of his remarks he informed the British just what the American Senate was going to do; that we are going very promptly to approve all these treaties; and the brotherhood of man would then, of course, be established—the British lion would lie down and the American lamb could lie down also. It is not necessary to indicate, according to the old joke, what our relative positions would be under those circumstances.

Mr. President, there will come a day possibly in the history of the world when there will be great wars on the Pacific. All of us hope that day will never come, but all of us who have any sense know that it may come; and if ever an American fleet should be engaged in conflict with a Japanese fleet or with a British fleet in the waters of the Pacific, if the navies are anything like equally balanced, that navy which has a large number of bases where it can go for supplies, where it can rest for repairs under the guns of its own nation, will win the fight.

If the World War has demonstrated anything, it has conclusively proven that the mightiest navies afloat can not successfully attack land fortifications. It has also proven the fact that land fortifications to-day are sufficiently invincible when they consist of but little more than earthworks with guns most skillfully planted. If we concede the dominance of the great mass of islands in the Pacific Ocean to foreign powers instead of neutralizing them or taking them for ourselves, then, in the future, if we shall be engaged in a conflict, we shall find that our ships will be limited in their cruises and in their operations by being forced to return long distances to their bases for supplies. We shall find that in case of danger, where our vessels may be outnumbered, they must find their security by traveling hundreds or thousands of miles to a point of protection.

You will find at the same time, sir, that another nation with islands all about over which it has a mandate, and therefore a sovereignty, will be able to fortify those islands and to do it very quickly after a war starts; to place upon them supplies, particularly of fuel for their war fleets; and that a nation thus supplied with bases from which it can operate and where it can secure supplies will have an advantage which may be the determinant of any conflict. But we supinely yield the field of the Pacific and by this treaty confirm the title to those bases of supply of two nations, friendly of course to-day—and we hope they may always be friendly—but the only two nations on the earth that are to-day capable of doing us serious injury.

Read any book you please on naval strategy and you will ascertain that it is the base of supply which is the determining factor if other matters are at all equal. Great Britain knows this; and so her statesmen for 150 or 200 years have been grabbing every outpost they could take, every foot of land they could secure by bargain and sale, by chicanery and treachery, by force and brutality. She holds to-day, and she will not willingly relinquish, the command of the Panama Canal upon the sea through a belt of islands absolutely of no use to her except as potential naval bases, which envelop our shores and menace our country. Beginning at the mainland south of the Gulf she controls a belt of islands that in a vast segment of a circle sweep around to the Florida coast, where they approach within 42 miles of our mainland. Farther north she holds the Bermudas. All of these islands are within striking distance of the United States by submarines; many of them are within striking distance, within two hours' time, by airplane. Some of these islands are already fortified.

France controls a few of the islands. Some of them have been avowedly fortified and some of them secretly fortified; but, whether belonging to one country or the other, each of them practically constitutes potentially a cannon pointed at the heart of the United States. Do you find Great Britain or France yielding any of these possessions to us in this day of brotherhood and amity? Are they saying to us, "Whatever benefits you benefits us, and accordingly these islands lying within your waters and within sight of your coast we will generously yield to you?" Are our American statesmen, as they meet about the council tables, demanding that there shall be any quid pro quo, or that when we relinquish control over islands in the Pacific, the title to which is as much ours as theirs, they shall relinquish the control over islands that envelop our front door and command the paths of our commerce across the sea? There was a day when as much would have been demanded, but the spirit expressed by Mr. Harvey is the spirit of this administration. It is, in my judgment, not the spirit of the American people.

I insist, Mr. President, that this treaty should be kept here under discussion until the Senate understands about it and until the people have an opportunity to inform themselves.

THE FOUR-POWER TREATY.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I should like to add a few words to what I said yesterday on the surrender of American independence. It was won upon the battle field; it should never be surrendered except upon the battle field. If it was worth years of struggle and the lives of thousands of brave men and the sacrifices of thousands of brave women, then, Mr. President, it is worth preservation; and I do not believe that any considerable percentage of the people of this country are willing that our independence should be surrendered by statesmen here in the Senate, and surrendered to the very country from whom we wrested it, and surrendered in part to the most perfidious nation on earth—Japan.

Why do we want to become an accomplice of Japan, and stain ourselves by condoning her criminal record? The crimes which she has committed against Korea still stir the indignation of all intelligent, right-thinking people. Those crimes have been utterly ruthless—crimes against a weak, unoffending people; crimes against schools as well as churches, American schools and American churches, as well as against Korean schools and Korean temples; crimes against China in Shantung and Manchuria; crimes against China in the 21 points, none of which has been withdrawn or canceled. Why should we make ourselves accomplices in the crimes of any nation?

Mr. President, you read in the papers yesterday, no doubt, that in Egypt the English proclaimed that no Egyptian shall bear arms, no Egyptian shall have arms in his dwelling, and that the British shall have the right to search every Egyptian home for arms, and that if that search is resisted, the Egyptian shall be slaughtered on his own threshold. The law, Mr. President, carries us back to the darkest days of feudalism, when the serf was not allowed to have arms.

Are we to be asked to become parties to crimes like those? Is that the way to save civilization? Is that the way to make the world safe for democracy?

Mr. President, we were told that America went into the war in the most unselfish spirit, that she would not share in the loot of the war. Now we are told repeatedly by the senior Senator from Massachusetts that we are entitled to one-fifth of the spoil. If any nation ever was pledged before the whole world and in honor bound not to take any material benefits from the victory, this Nation is bound. It was said by President Wilson, it was said by Congress, it was said by all the newspapers, it was repeatedly stated by the President while he was in France, while he was in Belgium, while he was in Italy, and while he was in England. Are we to dishonor the man who for eight years was the Chief Magistrate of the greatest country on earth, the greatest Republic that history ever knew? Have we no regard for the pledged honor of this Republic?

President Wilson had a right to speak for the Government and for the people. What he said was indorsed by Congress and the people. The press was unanimous, the people were unanimous, that we were going in with clean hands, and we would come out with clean hands. Is it not so? And now we are asked to dishonor President Wilson, dishonor the Government, dishonor the pledges that were made and indorsed by the press and the people.

Mr. President, I think the Senate will hesitate a long while before it goes into a four-power treaty, a quadruple alliance, whose authors dispute what it means and to which they are already attaching reservations.

Mr. President, how can we bind Japan, Great Britain, and France by reservations? They would have to come here again in another conference. Their delegates would have to sign. The tree must lie where it fell. The contract was made, it was executed, it was delivered. We can not change it one jot or tittle. Reservations are idle.

Mr. President, let the American people understand that a few Senators here, forgetting the lessons of the last election, forgetting the snowstorm of ballots which covered President Wilson in defeat, are scorning their judgment, treating it with contempt, surrendering the independence whose monuments stare us in the face every time we look out of a window, virtually desecrating Washington's Monument—the highest monolith that ever stood to the memory of a man—desecrating the cemeteries in which the Revolutionary soldiers sleep under marble slabs; let the American people understand that that is what we are doing, and we will have another storm of ballots under which somebody else will lie in defeat.

TREATY WITH JAPAN.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty between the United States and Japan with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator, in particular the island of Yap, signed at Washington on February 11, 1922.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I merely desire to put certain figures into the Record, because I think the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has not stated them quite correctly.

The Senator referred to the great mass of the islands owned by Great Britain, and to ours as comparatively unimportant.

There are in the Philippine Islands over 3,000 islands, with over 1,600 names; but the area of the American islands in the Pacific is 126,352 square miles, with 10,627,791 population.

Outside of Australia—which is sometimes spoken of as a continent, which is rather large to be described as an island—outside of Australia, the islands of the British Empire are 99,908 square miles, with 1,170,595 people.

The islands of France are 8,588 square miles, with 79,000 people.

The mandated islands which go to Great Britain and her colonies, including German Samoa, are chiefly composed of Papua, New Guinea, and the Bismarck Archipelago, and, with German Samoa, they constitute 92,800 square miles of the mandated islands south of the Equator.

The Japanese mandated islands are 967 square miles, with 54,000 population. They include the Mariana, or Ladrone, Islands, with the exception of Guam; the Carolines and the Marshalls, with the exception of Nauru, a small island which happens to fall south of the Equator, and therefore goes to Great Britain under the mandates.

The Senator, in his very effective description of the island of Yap—and all his descriptions are effective—spoke of it as a halfway house between the United States and the Philippines. The island of Yap lies 700 miles from the northeastern end of Mindanao, which is one of our islands. From the United States to the Philippines is 7,100 miles, so that it is only about one-tenth of the way between the Philippines and the United States.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to make a correction? The statement I made was that Yap was a sort of halfway house between the Hawaiian Islands and the Philippines.

Mr. LODGE. Between the Hawaiian Islands and the Philippines it is 5,000 miles, and 700 miles is not half way.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. LODGE. I did not mean to misrepresent the Senator, but it is not a halfway house to the Philippines.

I am going to take just a few minutes, and then I will give way to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE], who, I know, is ready to speak in regard to the island of Yap. I think I have already stated it.

Yap is one of the Caroline Islands, which, of course, we could have had after the war with Spain, but we rejected all the Spanish islands as worthless and undesirable to us and of no value, with the single exception of Guam, which is a very valuable strategic point. The island of Guam we kept. The island of Yap, which is about 15 miles long, has no value except as a telegraphic station. That was brought to President Wilson's attention at Paris. He made a proposition and discussed it at some length, his desire being to internationalize it for telegraphic purposes—a very sound proposition. He had supposed that after the representations he had made it would appear among the decisions of the "big four" or "big five," whichever it was that was making the treaty at that time; but when the decisions were finally put out, subsequently to May 7, somehow or other his representations with regard to Yap had been lost sight of.

We never owned Yap before the war; we never had a foot of land there; we never had a right there of any kind. The only right we have ever had in Yap is that which would come from our undivided fifth part of the overseas possessions of Germany, of which Yap was one. We have never had a cable line there. The cable which passes through Yap is the Dutch-German cable, and it connects with Guam.

All the German overseas possessions having been turned over to the five powers, of which we were one, Japan received a mandate over four-fifths, covering her fifth and those of the other three powers. What we desired in Yap were certain rights for cables and telegraphs, and those have been given to us under this treaty in the fullest extent. That is the whole story, as far as we are concerned.

As to talk about our hauling down the flag, or yielding independence, we never had the island under our flag; we never owned a foot of it; we never had any right there, as I have already said, of any kind except what we derived from the treaty of Versailles as one of the five powers to which the German overseas possessions were given. We insisted that we have an undivided fifth part; and there is some question about that.

Mr. REED. Did Japan have any rights in this island?

Mr. LODGE. She had an undivided fifth part, and the other three powers gave her their three-fifths, so that she had four undivided fifths when we made this treaty.

Mr. REED. But before the war Japan was in the same position in which we were, was she not?

Mr. LODGE. She had nothing. They were German islands. They came to us because they were German islands.

Mr. REED. And we engaged in the war along with the other powers. At the end of the war these islands became a part of the spoil of the war?

Mr. LODGE. They passed to the five allied and associated powers with all the rest of the German overseas possessions.

Mr. REED. President Wilson desired that the island of Yap should be neutralized. By some sort of means his request was passed over, and at the end we find Japan insisting upon maintaining her dominance there, do we not?

Mr. LODGE. No; Japan took the island through a mandate given her by the other three powers, and, with her own interest, that gave her control of four-fifths.

Mr. REED. That is to say, we call it a mandate, but Japan is in charge of the island?

Mr. LODGE. Those islands were given to her, just as those south of the Equator were given to Great Britain.

Mr. REED. Regardless of how the others were given, just so that it may be perfectly plain—and I do not think there is any difference between the Senator and me—Japan's flag will float over these islands?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I presume it will. The mandate was given on December 17, 1919, I think, and I suppose Japan since then has taken possession of those small groups, and I assume her flag floats over them, replacing the German flag.

Mr. REED. So that Japan is in complete dominion now? Her title—

Mr. LODGE. Except, of course, there are limitations in the mandate.

Mr. REED. But Japan agrees that she will allow America certain rights there. Nevertheless, they are rights granted by her as a sovereign over the island to America as a Nation which has no sovereign rights.

Mr. LODGE. No; in this treaty we recognize Japan's mandate and in return receive—

Mr. REED. When we do that we waive whatever our one-fifth right of sovereignty and control was? We waive that?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; we waive it.

Mr. REED. It appears already, then, that in dealing with these brother nations of ours, although we went into the war and did a thousand times as much as Japan, and although at the end of the war this island came equally to the five powers, all the others immediately, without our consent and without even advising us of their action, proceeded to assign their interests to Japan, although they knew that our President had insisted upon an entirely different policy—to wit, the policy of neutralization.

Mr. LODGE. Unfortunately that did not appear in the treaty. Our only claim, in my judgment, lies under the treaty to the undivided fifth part.

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator think that out of that performance we ought at least to learn the lesson that in dealing with these foreign nations we had better be a little careful what we are doing?

Mr. LODGE. I venture to think that we have been careful; but that is a point about which we would not probably agree.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to article 1 of the treaty.

Mr. REED. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not insist on a vote on this matter to-night.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to go on for a while. I understood that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] desired to speak.

Mr. JOHNSON. That was my understanding. I do not see him present, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LODGE. I think we can stay a while longer. It is not very late.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is 5 o'clock now, and I would wish, although I do not ask it, that we might take an adjournment or a recess now; but if the Senator from Massachusetts does not desire it, very well. Knowing that the Senator from Maryland desires to be heard—

Mr. FRANCE entered the Chamber.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Maryland is here now, and I assume that he desires to speak.

Mr. JOHNSON. I withdraw my suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LODGE. I think we might remain a little longer. A great deal of the day has been taken up with other matters.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I do not care to go on this afternoon.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, so we may get someone here who is going to speak.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandagee	Harrell	Nelson	Spencer
Bursum	Harris	New	Stanfield
Calder	Harrison	Norbeck	Sterling
Cameron	Heflin	Oddie	Sutherland
Capper	Johnson	Overman	Trammell
Colt	Kellogg	Pepper	Wadsworth
Curtis	Keyes	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Edge	King	Poin Dexter	Warren
Ernst	Ladd	Ransdell	Watson, Ga.
France	Lodge	Reed	Watson, Ind.
Gerry	McKinley	Sheppard	Weller
Glass	McNary	Shortridge	Williams
Gooding	Moses	Smith	Willis

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-six Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY MELLON.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, it was reported in the newspapers of this city last March that President Harding, after delivering his inaugural address, came into the Senate Chamber and personally presented the names of his Cabinet officers, and personally requested that they be immediately confirmed. That statement carried in the newspapers was not denied.

In the April, 1921, issue of Current Opinion there appeared an editorial written by Dr. Frank Crane, evidently inspired by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, who had been confirmed by the Senate on the 4th of March. In the editorial, which carries a picture of Mr. Mellon, probably furnished by himself, there is this statement:

The record of the personal activities of Secretary Mellon includes 4 banks, of 1 of which he recently resigned the presidency to enter the Cabinet, 4 insurance companies, 7 educational and philanthropic institutions, and 62 other corporations. Their products—oil, aluminum, railway cars, locomotives, steel, plate glass, radiators, carborundum, bolts and rivets, motor trucks, and one hundred other things—go all over the world.

Therefore, according to this very friendly editorial, which has never been challenged, Mr. Mellon is engaged not only in railway commerce, interstate commerce, but in ocean-going commerce. He resigned from 1 of his 4 banks, but no statement is made about the other 3, nor about his insurance companies, nor his 62 other corporations.

It is further stated:

Andrew W. Mellon is 68 years of age and constitutionally as sound as a dollar, partly because horseback riding has been his lifelong recreation. Recently he has fallen under the spell of golf, for which he is said to have a growing fondness. That a man of his age should be willing to assume the responsibilities of the Treasury Department is not so surprising when the magnitude of his business operations is borne in mind and in view of the fact also that both his parents lived to be 95 years old.

That looks like a statement derived from Mr. Mellon himself, or from some member of his family.

Now, Mr. President, I have called attention to section 243 of the Revised Statutes, a statute adopted at the first session of the First Congress, which organized the Treasury Department, and which provides:

No person appointed to the office of Secretary of the Treasury, or first comptroller, or first auditor, or Treasurer, or register, shall, directly or indirectly, be concerned or interested in carrying on the business of trade or commerce, or be owner, in whole or in part, of any sea vessel, or purchase by himself, or another in trust for him, any public lands or other public property, or be concerned in the purchase or disposal of any public securities of any State or of the United States.

My information is that Secretary Mellon owns a large block of Government bonds.

The law further provides that anyone holding office in violation of these provisions shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, shall pay a penalty of $3,000, shall be removed from office, and forever thereafter be incapable of holding any office under the United States.

Anyone can see the wisdom of that law. The plain intent of it is that no man having the custody of the national funds shall be in position to enrich himself by the use of them, directly or indirectly; no man shall take advantage of that high office, either for himself or his friends; neither, directly nor indirectly, shall he deal in United States bonds or interstate commerce or foreign commerce. He shall not even own a vessel. The man who framed that law was wise as any who ever sat in Congress.

No Congress has ever repealed that law. An attempt was made to modify it at the instance of President Grant when his popularity was at its highest, and the proposition to change it was successfully opposed by Charles Sumner. President Grant was very anxious that A. T. Stewart, the merchant prince of New York, should be his Secretary of the Treasury. He nominated Mr. Stewart. The nomination came to the Senate. The Senate confirmed it. Nobody called attention to this law. However, in a few days the statute was brought to the attention of Mr. Stewart and the President. Congress refusing to repeal any part of it, Mr. Stewart resigned, to escape the penalty of the statute.

Now, Mr. President, a few days after I called attention to the statute there appeared in the newspapers a brief statement, purporting to come from Secretary Mellon, the substance of the statement being that he had resigned from his various corporations before accepting the office of Secretary of the Treasury. The Associated Press sent that message throughout the country, leaving me in the attitude of having made a statement that was untrue. The statement went further and said he had consulted lawyers, but the lawyers were not named.

I again call attention to this inspired editorial, which has never been denied, whose statements stand before the country unchallenged. Is it true, Mr. President, that one of the highest officers of the Government is disqualified to hold his position, and is in the attitude of breaking the law? If so, it is a very serious situation. It seems to me that the Secretary of the Treasury owes it to this body which confirmed him, and owes it to the President, who is said personally to have asked us to confirm him, to make a clear statement as to whether he is still the owner of that aluminum plant in North Carolina, the owner in part of various railroads, the producer and the seller of the various commodities which I have mentioned, taking the statement from the editorial to which I have referred, of products which go all over this country and all over the world.

At the President's request we confirmed him. Does he not owe it to the President, owe it to the Senate, and owe it to the country to make an explicit statement as to whether or not he has resigned from all his banks, all of his insurance companies, all of his oil works, aluminum works, railway car works, locomotive companies, steel companies, plate glass companies, and so on?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the Secretary of the Treasury has resigned from those positions which he held and still holds his interest in those concerns, he would be covered just the same under that statute, would he not?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Most assuredly.

TREATY WITH JAPAN.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty between the United States and Japan with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator, in particular the island of Yap, signed at Washington on February 11, 1922.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the first article of the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I believe I know of no one who wishes to speak on the treaty except the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE]. If he does not care to go on to-night, I shall not press him to do so.

Mr. FRANCE. I prefer not to go on to-night. I prefer that the Senate should take a recess, if agreeable to the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to oblige the Senator and therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in secret executive session.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business with closed doors. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

STATUE OF EDMUND BURKE.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As in legislative session, from the Committee on the Library, I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 165) authorizing the erection on public grounds, in the city of Washington, D. C., of a statue of Edmund Burke. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, and it was read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to select a suitable site and to grant permission to the Sulgrave Institution for the erection, as a gift to the people of the United States, on public grounds of the United States in the city of Washington, D. C., other than those of the Capitol, the Library of Congress, Potomac Park, and the White House, of a monument to the memory of Edmund Burke, champion of American liberty: Provided, That the site chosen and the design of the memorial shall be approved by the Joint Library Committee of Congress, with the advice of the Commission of Fine Arts, and it shall be erected under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, and that the United States shall be put to no expense in or by the erection of said monument.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 24, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O blessed Spirit Divine. With us may life always be sincere and directed by the pure motive and the true spirit. Lead us on in the growing consciousness that it is an eternal quantity and not a mean nor a transient thing. Always lift us to the higher plane and make us capable of the higher service. Come and give to the day its gladness, to the task its wisdom, and to every heart the note of contentment. Enable us to do right where others do wrong, to stand where others waver, and to remain steadfast where others succumb, and open the hidden door and touch, O touch the powers of the soul. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 10329), the Department of the Interior appropriation bill, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 539. An act to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended.

S. 2897. An act to appropriate $5,000,000 for the purchase of seed grain and of feed to be supplied to farmers in the crop-failure areas of the United States, said amount to be expended under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. STERLING and Mr. McKELLAR members of the Joint Select Committee, on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Department of Labor.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 539. An act to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 2897. An act to appropriate $5,000,000 for the purchase of seed grain and of feed to be supplied to farmers in the crop-failure areas of the United States, said amount to be expended under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture; to the Committee on Agriculture.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR DEPARTMENTS OF COMMERCE AND LABOR.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10559), making appropriations for the Departments of Commerce and Labor.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas in the chair.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For rent of buildings in the District of Columbia, $66,500.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, yesterday afternoon just before adjournment I discussed for a short while Senate bill 1565, which passed the Senate on February 21 this week. That bill provides, as I pointed out yesterday, that all officers who served in the World War and who incurred a disability of not less than 30 per cent shall be upon their application placed on the retired list at a retired Army officer's pay.

Now, I have known for several months of the efforts to pass that kind of a bill—of the efforts to get it favorably reported—but I had no idea that it would ever be reported by a committee of either one of the Houses of Congress, much less passed by one of the bodies. Therefore I had never undertaken to address the House upon the subject. But inasmuch as it has now actually received the indorsement of one of the legislative bodies of the Government and has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs of the House I think it is getting time that those who are opposed to this measure get busy and let the Committee on Military Affairs know of their opposition.

Just as my time expired yesterday afternoon I was getting to that place where I was undertaking to point out the discrimination which this bill would not only put into effect as between officers and enlisted men but would put into effect as between officers themselves.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. Has the gentleman ever been able to understand why the Legion, composed in the main of men who served in the ranks, have not taken a position in opposition to a measure like this, which runs contrary to our practice and policy as a people since the beginning of the Government, and which is as unfair as a measure can possibly be? Of the boys who went out to serve their country some were fortunate enough to secure commissions and others served in the trenches in the ranks. I have not been able to understand why we have not heard from the men of the Legion.

Mr. BLACK. I have heard—I do not know whether it is true or not; I hope it is not—that some of the officers of the Legion have expressed themselves in favor of this bill. If it is true, I am amazed that they would champion a bill of this sort. As the gentleman from Wyoming says, it would put into effect a principle which is contrary to the whole historic policy of the Nation. I will say, however, that I have received no communication from the American Legion in favor of the bill, and, in my judgment, those in my district who served as officers do not want it.

Let me give an illustration of what I mean. I have here a bill—H. R. 4097—which is a sample of many similar bills that have been introduced for years which seeks to create in the War Department and the Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as the "Civil War volunteer officers' retired list" and pay them retired Army officers' pay. For 30 years Congress has refused to pass a bill of that sort upon the principle that it would violate our historic policy of equal compensation benefits for officers and privates. But now, to proceed further with my discussion of the Senate bill, I was about to point out, when the gentleman from Wyoming asked me his question, that an Army officer who has incurred a disability of 30 per cent would be placed on the retired list and given the same compensation as an officer who received a total disability and was placed upon the retired list. For example, we have here, we will say, two captains who were disabled in the World War. The disability of one of them has been rated at 30 per cent by the Veterans' Bureau and he is drawing $30 per month for his injuries. The other is rated at total disability, perhaps an arm shot off and an eye out, and is drawing $100 per month. Under this Senate bill both would be put on the retired Army officers' list and would be paid the same, $150 per month. Where is the justice of that, I inquire? To the gentlemen who advocate that kind of a measure I would like to propound this question: We have a very large number of enlisted men who were privates in the war and who incurred a disability of 30 per cent. Are you willing to pay these men the same compensation under the war risk insurance act as you are willing to pay the men who have incurred a total disability of 100 per cent? Are you willing to do that? If you say no, as I am sure you must say no, then how are you going to justify your support of a bill that will place an Army officer upon the retired list who had incurred a disability of only 30 per cent and pay him the same retired officer's pay as you would pay an officer who has incurred a total disability of 100 per cent? Answer me that.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Does the gentleman favor maintaining the retired list for the Regular Army and Navy officers?

Mr. BLACK. I shall answer that by saying to the gentleman that I would not perpetuate one class of favoritism and discrimination by adding to it another one of a more flagrant character.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. BLACK. I am going to answer the question. The gentleman must not get too impatient. Does the gentleman contend that Senate bill 1565 carries into effect the same provisions as the retired Army officers' act? It is not the same by a very long sight. What does the retired Army officers' act provide? It provides that an Army officer shall be retired upon his own application when he has served 40 years in the Army; it provides that he may be retired upon his own application when he has served 30 years in the Army; it provides that he shall be retired when he has reached the age of 64; and then it provides that he may be retired when a board, two-fifths of which, I believe, must be composed of medical officers, shall find that he is incapable of further service. That, in brief, is the retired Army officers' law.

Mr. LITTLE. Is the gentleman in favor of maintaining a retired Army officers' law?

Mr. BLACK. I had nothing to do with framing it. It was the law long before I ever came to Congress. I have not said that I am in favor of it.

Mr. LITTLE. Does the gentleman say that he is against it?

Mr. BLACK. I have pointed out the provisions of the retired Army officers' act and have shown that Senate bill 1565 is not the same as that act by a very great deal.

Mr. LITTLE. That has nothing to do with it. Is the gentleman in favor of maintaining—

Mr. BLACK. I do not yield to the gentleman any further when he says it has nothing to do with it. It has got something to do with it, as I have been endeavoring to point out. The gentleman has never heard me argue for a retired Army officers' list, either for officers of the Regular Army or officers of the Volunteer Army. What I have argued for is equality of compensation, payments for injuries received, both as to officers and privates. That principle I have not varied from and I still emphatically maintain it.

By my attitude of opposition to this bill, I would not want anyone to infer that I am opposed to liberal compensation payments to those who were wounded or disabled in the World War, whether officers or privates. I do favor liberal treatment in such cases and have worked for and supported the necessary legislation to bring it about. I am glad to know that the United States has been open-hearted and generous in this respect, more so than any other nation, and in proof of what has actually been done let me quote some recent figures given by Col. Charles R. Forbes, Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, in a statement to the Associated Press, February 25 last. He said:

A total of $1,259,930,724 has been expended by the Government for its former service men. Up to the present time 1,418,912 claims have been made by veterans, divided as follows: 171,875 for insurance and 760,153 for death and disability compensation. Out of this number—a total of 831,767 claims have been allowed by the bureau, while 472,170 have been disallowed. According to the medical division report, 28,687 veterans were undergoing hospitalization last December 31, and since the creation of the bureau 206,039 veterans have received hospital treatment, and 1,115,259 medical examinations have been given.

Other figures were cited in Mr. Forbes's statement illustrating the work of the Veterans' Bureau, but I will not prolong these remarks to give them now. Suffice it to say that the whole statement shows that a very large number of claims have been handled and a great amount of work done. Senator BOBAH, in an able and well-considered speech in the Senate a few days ago, stated it to be his estimate that the United States Government would spend $75,000,000,000 at least in the future years to come before all the obligations to ex-service men are liquidated. By these figures he meant, of course, that such amounts would be expended during the lifetime of the veterans of the World War. On account of the fact that such expenditures will be spread out over a long period of years, the country will be able to take care of them all right. It is a big task, but the spirit of America is equal to it, and will perform it in no half-hearted manner. They made sacrifices for the Republic and the Republic must, if necessary, make sacrifices for them.

Let us do it in a spirit of equity and without discriminations such as Senate bill 1565 would put into effect.

The Clerk read the paragraph providing for contingent expenses, Department of Commerce.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk correct the spelling of the word "contingent" on line 23, page 3.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For printing and binding for the Department of Commerce, including the Coast and Geodetic Survey and the Bureau of the Census, $425,000: Provided, That an amount not to exceed $2,000 of this allotment may be expended for salaries of persons detailed from the Government Printing Office for service as copy editors.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice in this appropriation that we have increased the amount for printing and binding by $100,000. In most of these appropriations, especially for matters of this character, I have understood that it is the desire of the House and the policy of the House to cut them down rather than to enlarge them. What is the reason for this?

Mr. SHREVE. This increase grows out of the fact that the Census Bureau reverts now to a permanent status, or will on July 1, 1922. The three-year period for the taking of the decennial census has now elapsed, and we go back to the original basis, the same as in 1919.

Mr. SNELL. And the general report that they have put out in regard to crop estimates has not been taken out of this fund during the last three years?

Mr. SHREVE. No. During all of these three years all of the printing has been taken out of the general fund, so that it makes it necessary to reestablish this particular item.

Mr. SNELL. And this is the least possible amount for which they can carry it on?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes; that is the lowest sum we thought we could get along with.

The Clerk read as follows:

To further promote and develop the commerce of the United States with South and Central America, including the employment of experts and special agents in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, purchase of books of reference and periodicals, reports, traveling and subsistence expenses of officers and employees, and all other necessary incidental expenses not included in the foregoing, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce, $170,650: Provided, That not more than two trade commissioners employed under this appropriation may be recalled from their foreign posts and assigned to duty in the Department of Commerce.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The lack of foreign markets for our surplus domestic products has been one of the serious problems of recent years. It has even been stated in the press that the delay in the final enactment of the proposed tariff legislation has been due largely to the effect that it might have upon this situation.

I notice that this paragraph proposes an appropriation which is intended to promote and develop further the commerce of the United States with South and Central America. That is a matter in which the people of my immediate section are and have been very much interested, and a number of honorary consuls have been appointed from some of those countries for the city in which I live. I note from the report that a total increase of $742,020 was requested under this bureau, and that the committee recommends only $304,902. I should like to know what part of this increase is to be devoted to the promotion and development of commerce between the United States and the countries of South and Central America, and, in so far as the committee may be able to give the information, along what lines these expenditures are contemplated. I make this inquiry for the purpose of getting some practical information that may be helpful to those who may wish to engage in trade with Central and South American countries.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, the principal increase is to cover the countries in South America, and for one trade commissioner in Stockholm and some clerks in London and Paris. The principal reduction, the things that we cut out, was more at home. The department wanted to create a number of bureaus in the various cities of the United States. It is a very meritorious proposition, but at the same time we felt that we would better confine ourselves to the real purpose of finding trade in foreign countries rather than building up the offices in the United States that would be in touch with the American manufacturers.

Mr. LANHAM. I think that is very commendable. The real purpose of the appropriation, then, is the promotion of trade of that character with South and Central America, and a part of this increase of $304,000 will be devoted to that purpose?

Mr. SHREVE. Oh, absolutely; a very large sum. We are providing for a new office at Cuba, for instance. I explained yesterday quite in detail regarding the great desirability of having an office located perhaps in Habana for the reason that it is experimental ground for American shippers. The people from the Middle West, along down the Mississippi, desire this. It is an easy place to ship farm products. They are new in the business, and they must learn many things. This is not far away. The opening of this office in Cuba we believe is going to be of great assistance to all of the people desiring export trade.

Mr. LANHAM. The gentleman thinks that this general provision and this increase in the appropriation will give considerable relief to the agricultural classes of our people in providing a market for their surplus products of various kinds?

Mr. SHREVE. Certainly, that is one of the items we considered and for that very reason we put this office at Cuba, because it is a one-crop country, and they must buy a large portion of their agricultural products from some other country, and that place is the United States, and we felt that the encouragement of having an office down there would be of material interest and benefit to the farmers.

Mr. LANHAM. I notice that a total increase of $742,000 was requested in view of the importance of the subject in general. Upon what did the committee predicate its action reducing that increase to $304,900?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LANHAM. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MANN). The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes additional. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHREVE. It is largely in the matter of cutting off home expansion.

Mr. LANHAM. The decrease was in the offices at home and not the foreign?

Mr. SHREVE. No. It was our idea if we could extend the service as far as we could abroad in every place we might pick up more trade for the United States. So we thought that the enlargement of these offices at home might wait. Our manufacturing industry has an organization of its own, boards of trade, chambers of commerce, and all those great organizations that are now occupied in seeking contact with the expansion of trade, and we felt it was better for us to spend the money in foreign countries rather than at home.

Mr. LANHAM. I think that is the better policy that the committee has adopted. I want to say in this regard that perhaps we have been neglecting somewhat this feature of our national life, one of vast importance, one which affects all the people, and especially those who have a surplus of agricultural products on their hands. I apprehend that many of the foreign countries have been more alert to the situation.

I recall that recently we passed an appropriation bill in this House of a million dollars for an American exhibit at the centennial exposition to be held at the city of Rio de Janeiro, in Brazil. I thought that was a very wise appropriation, by reason of the fact that the exposition is to open up the business of foreign trade and let us see the opportunities that exist in that regard. But I fear perhaps some of the European nations have been a little more alive to the situation than we have, and I am glad to see this additional activity, because I think there is in it a hopeful promise to the agricultural people of our country. It was my intention when I arose, if this decrease had been made in the activities of the foreign service, to offer an amendment that the amount be increased, but since the gentleman says it has been on account of the refusal to expand the offices at home, I think the committee acted very wisely.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice in each one of the paragraphs there is carried a provision that not more than four trade commissioners employed under this appropriation may be recalled from their foreign posts and assigned to duty in the Department of Commerce. I was wondering why, after the men had been educated over there and knew the conditions in the various countries, they would be called back home to work here in the department?

Mr. SHREVE. In answer to that, Mr. Chairman, I will say that it is very necessary to keep men in foreign countries closely in touch with the situation on this side. We will take a man representing a manufacturing plant, take one connected with the automobile industry. He must come back to this country and keep in contact with the business and the work of the people at home. There are experienced men connected with this department, but if a man stays in a foreign country too long he becomes sort of rusty and he loses touch with the United States, and he is often a great deal interested in the affairs of the country where he is doing service. We find it of very great advantage to bring them back to Washington, that they may go out and visit manufacturing plants and see the new things that have been made and they are going to make, and carry the information back to the other side. We find that is money very well spent.

Mr. SNELL. Do I understand from what the gentleman says that various of these attachés represent individual industries like the automobile industry?

Mr. SHREVE. We will come to that a little later on. It has been the ambition of the department to build up what is called the operating division; that is, to allow probably a lump-sum appropriation sufficient to take care of about a dozen of these. I think they already have something like eight or ten, in which they employ specialists, men who are thoroughly conversant with one line of industry, and those men are sent to foreign countries to look after that line of industry—take, for instance, the manufacturing of certain machines, cotton machinery—and they travel all over the country. They are men who are specialists in that one line, and that is where we have advantage over some other of the commercial attachés and men representing us in foreign countries, because those men know, and if there is a big contract to be let there will be an engineer on the job who knows that proposition.

If it is a railroad proposition, he has to be a railroad man; if it is something in the line of electric goods, they endeavor to have an electrical engineer whose business it is to look over the proposition. If it is something in which the United States might be interested, he immediately communicates all the information by cable to the Washington office, and the Washington office gets in touch with the electrical people in the United States. And by reason of this close point of contact we find we are able to materially benefit the business men of the Nation.

Mr. SNELL. To what extent do these attachés cooperate with the attachés of the State Department, or do they have anything to do with them?

Mr. SHREVE. They are in very close cooperation. At first there was a feeling in my mind that there was a duplication there—

Mr. SNELL. And that is what I thought.

Mr. SHREVE. And so I started out in the hearings to find if such duplication existed. But I was unable to find it. I find these men are all doing a very valuable work. But the men in the Consular Service have to devote a part of their time to taking care of the business of their office, while our trade commissioner is permitted to ramble around. He is keeping in close touch with that Consular Service, and they are all working in harmony, and, I think, doing a splendid work.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The House a few days ago—namely, February 17, 1922—passed the Department of Interior appropriation bill, H. R. 10329, and the Senate passed it yesterday, with several amendments. There is one amendment that relates to the reconstruction of a new building at an Indian school at Greenville, Calif., and in order that the House may have some little knowledge of the situation when it comes back for consideration of the Senate amendment, I ask unanimous consent to insert a short statement in the Record in regard to it.

The Senate amendment above referred to relates to the reconstruction of the school building at the Greenville Indian School, California. It provides for an appropriation of $60,000. The amendment should be agreed to with an amendment by adding thereto the following: "To be immediately available." This would allow the funds to be used at once. The building could be started by May 1 and completed by September 1, 1922, and the school ready for opening for the fall term.

With the money already invested by the Government in the Greenville Indian School plant it would be nothing less than a crime to now abandon it. The school has been doing good work, achieving real results. The Indians have been benefited. It has relieved the health conditions—made it safer for both the Indians and the white people. The climatic conditions are ideal. The school is located at the most accessible point. It keeps the Indian children nearer their parents and homes; the Indians are all more contented. The school is in the heart of the "old home" of this tribe of Indians. It would be most unfortunate to send these Indian children away to school when they have one near their natural habitation, when the only thing required is to rebuild a school building destroyed by fire. The rest of the equipment is on hand. The State officials of California whose duty it is to look after such matters are unanimous in their request for the reconstruction of this school building. It may be safely said that the people of Plumas County are likewise a unit in their demand for this building, because of its real and imperative necessity, to the end that the Indian children might have proper educational advantages, and so forth.

Do not punish these poor, innocent Indian children and deprive them of proper local school facilities and schooling by reason of and on account of the fire of December 17, 1921, which destroyed "their school building."

The State superintendent of public instruction of California is taking a deep interest in this matter, as is shown by his letter of recent date, which letter is as follows:

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION,
OFFICE OF SUPERINTENDENT OF PUBLIC INSTRUCTION,
February 16, 1922.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. RAKER: Undoubtedly your attention has been called to the situation growing out of the destruction of the main building of the Greenville Indian School, located in Plumas County of this State. For years this school has been maintained by the Federal Government, and 112 Indian children were domiciled at the institution at the time of the conflagration. The Government owns a large acreage here, upon which are situated many buildings. The only building that is lacking is the building which was burned. It seems that the authorities at Washington are desirous of abandoning the school at Greenville and placing most of the Indian children in the public schools of the State. The Indian agent at Greenville has written me urging that I encourage county superintendents to accept Indian children in the public schools and receive the Government stipend therefor.

In view of the fact that in recent years the Federal authorities have been developing the policy of turning the Indian children into the public schools, I wish to make protest through you against any such policy. First of all, the public-school authorities of the State of California do not wish to receive the children now being taken care of in the Indian schools. Such attitude is not based upon any feeling of race prejudice. The fact is that many of the Indian children are not welcome because of their physical condition. Moreover, many of them lack that background of social experience which would make them acceptable children in the public schools. This, however, is not the strongest point. It is unjust to the Indian children themselves to put them in school with the whites. With their lack of intellectual development and their lack of social background they are at a great disadvantage in the public schools and become discouraged. I therefore ask you to lend your influence to the passage of a bill appropriating a sufficient amount to rebuild the Greenville school and that you do what you can to discourage the tendency on the part of the Federal Government to throw back upon the public schools of the State the burden of caring for the Indian children of California. I do this in the interest not only of the white children enrolled in the public schools but also in the interest of the Indian children.

Thanking you, I am,
Very truly, yours,

WILL C. WOOD,
Superintendent of Public Instruction.

The Bureau of Children's Aid of California has likewise made personal investigation of the Greenville Indian School, and Miss Amy D. Steinhart, chief, has made personal investigation and written to the honorable Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Her letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE, STATE OF CALIFORNIA, BUREAU OF CHILDREN'S AID,
Sacramento, January 27, 1922.

Mr. CHARLES H. BURKE,
Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BURKE: May I inform you briefly that the reason for a communication from us is that this department has the supervision of dependent children in the State of California, and for this reason has been greatly interested in the problem of the Indian child.

The recent burning of the Greenville School has greatly complicated the question of the care of Indian children. The State has never directed the admission to the school of any child that might be safely and happily left in the home of its parents, but conditions among the Indians in California are such that a great many of the homes are totally unfit for the proper supervision and safeguarding of growing children, many of them children of promise and responsiveness. Because of the return to relatives of a considerable group of Indian children, reports have come to us of the pitiable condition of affairs under which they are living at the present time. There is a general accord among those interested in Indian children that the supervision and education afforded by the Greenville School has reaped a harvest in a very distinct improvement in the care of its wards, and for this reason we are particularly concerned at the prospect of having all those opportunities lost by even a short stay at home.

Many of these children are at the age when they are extremely susceptible to influence, either good or bad, and the sudden transition from environment at Greenville is bound to produce a very unfavorable reaction. We are endeavoring to cooperate with local agencies to as great an extent as possible in order to relieve the most serious conditions, but sporadic and insufficient plans here and there do not in any means solve our problem. We can see but one truly effective solution, and that is the rebuilding of the Greenville plant. We wish you to realize that we have had a very practical experience in our work with Indians and that our intent is never to separate them from their families unnecessarily. Where the separation is inevitable we are entirely handicapped in our efforts unless institutional care is available.

Trusting that you may be instrumental in the formulation of a plan for this very needy group of children, I am,

Very sincerely,

AMY D. STEINHART, Chief.

We who personally know the facts regarding the Greenville Indian School most strongly urge the House conferees and the House to concur in the Senate amendment as to this school, with an amendment adding "to be immediately available."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the paragraph on page 7, after line 23, by inserting:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for employees in Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas moves to amend, page 7, after line 23, by inserting:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for employees in Mexico.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, on yesterday I submitted some remarks with reference to the subject of the relations between the United States and the Republic of Mexico. I notice that in the pending bill it is proposed to expend $170,000 for work in connection with stimulating trade and commerce with South and Central America. It seems, indeed, a very foolish policy for the United States Government, if it really desires to stimulate trade and commerce with the Republic just to the south of us, to abstain from recognizing that Government, and yet undertake a program of propaganda through commercial agencies seeking to encourage trade with the Republic of Mexico.

I want to call attention to the fact that our competitors have already, some of them, recognized the Republic of Mexico. Germany, that country which we charged with being on terms of intimacy with Mexico during the war; Germany, that great commercial country that sends her salesmen and her manufacturers' agents all over the world; Germany, that great industrial country that is now at work, long ago recognized the existing Government of Mexico. And is it any wonder that there arises in the heart of the Mexican the inclination to believe that Germany is a better friend of his country than the United States, which, though it lies right at his door and wants his trade and wants his dollars, is not just and fair enough to his country to recognize that it has the right, like all sovereign nations, to lay down the fundamental law for the guidance of his country and its interests? Japan, another rival of the United States in certain commercial pursuits, has long ago recognized the Government of Mexico. Is it any wonder that the Mexican sometimes pauses and wonders whether Japan is not, in truth and in fact, a better friend of his Government than the United States, that conditions diplomatic recognition purely upon one question, and that is whether or not Mexico will or will not tax oil companies that are operating within that Republic?

Oh, but they say that is not the question involved in recognition. I say it is the question involved in recognition. The State Department says that it is a question of confiscation. I want to say in reply that not one oil well in Mexico has been confiscated during more than a year and a half of the existence of the present Government. But what has happened? The Mexican Government has undertaken to levy a tax on the production of oil wells in Mexico. And that, gentlemen, is the reason why the Republic of Mexico has not already been recognized by this Government.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Are the oil wells you speak of owned by American capital or Mexican capital?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. My reply is that the oil wells are owned by American capital, or else the United States would not be intervening. I thank the gentleman for that suggestion. American interests, domiciled here in the United States and with their investments in oil wells in Mexico, are preventing the recognition by the United States of the Mexican Government at this time. How can America expect to gain the affection of the Republic of Mexico and its people, how may we expect to extend our trade and our commerce, when we are less generous with Mexico in our political dealings than other Governments of the world?

I hold in my hand a list of the Governments that have already long ago recognized Mexico. The Republics of South and Central America have recognized Mexico. Norway has recognized her; Holland has recognized her; and Italy, though 3,000 miles away—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Italy, though she is 3,000 miles away, has recognized the Government of Mexico and is maintaining diplomatic relations with her. But the United States, that is more affected by the relations of its neighboring Republic than any other country in the world; the United States, whose peace and harmony and prosperity are more nearly affected than any other country in the world; the United States, because Mexico dared in the exercise of its sovereignty to tax oil production in Mexico, refuses to recognize the Government of that country.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. What became of the resolution you introduced some weeks ago with reference to this subject, I will ask the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. In reply to the gentleman from Virginia, I will say that I introduced a resolution about a month ago to investigate the alleged activities and propaganda conducted by the oil interests of the United States with reference to Mexico. That resolution is now pending before the Committee on Rules, where it will slumber peacefully. Of course, it will slumber there; of course, it will go to sleep there.

But if it were a resolution choking off debate and hammering through this House some legislation in favor of a special interest, such as a tariff bill or revenue measure, you would witness the Rules Committee rushing to the floor of this House and urging that the rule be adopted and immediately passed through this House. [Laughter.]

Now, again, Holland. The United States a short time ago was enough concerned with the oil question to take up with the Kingdom of Holland the question of whether or not the American oil interests should have equality of opportunity in the Dutch East Indies. Formal representations were made by the United States Government protesting to Holland that within the Dutch East Indies American interests did not have the same opportunities that the citizens of Holland and the citizens of other countries have. If the oil situation is of enough importance to require that action on the part of the State Department, is it any wonder that it is now so solicitous regarding the gentlemen who happen to own oil wells in the Republic of Mexico?

Gentlemen, we have in the last few days seen in the press many statements regarding uprisings and attempted revolutions in the Republic of Mexico. I do not know whether those stories were inspired by oil interests in order to discredit the present Government of Mexico or not. I do not know whether they were inspired, on the other hand, by interests who are favoring the present Government of Mexico. But I do know this, that it requires money to conduct a revolution; I know that it takes arms to conduct a revolution; and I know that those wild, ragged bands that compose the revolutionary armies of Mexico have neither resources nor money, and if there are revolutions and uprisings along the Texas border the inspiration for those uprisings and revolutions is bound to come from some other source than the revolutionists themselves. It has been openly charged in the press of this country covering a long period of years that American oil interests were interested in fomenting dissension in the Republic of Mexico and were interested in a change in that Government.

My resolution simply proposes to authorize the Committee on Foreign Affairs—not a new committee, not a select committee—but simply to authorize that committee to conduct hearings to look into this question and ascertain its truth or falsity. I do not make it as a charge, because I do not know. But this House ought to know, and the country ought to know whether or not that is true.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MANN in the chair). The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. What is the wish of those gentlemen who oppose the recognition of the present Government of Mexico? What is their secret wish? I read from the Washington Post of the 18th of February an editorial. Now, the Washington Post is credited with occupying a very convenient place under the drippings of the sanctuary. [Laughter.] I do not say that it voices the view of the State Department or the view of any member of the administration, but at the same time here is what the Post says:

There is no desire or intention to interfere in Mexico's affairs—

How does the Post know, unless it pretends to speak by inspiration? Here is what it says:

There is no desire or intention to interfere in Mexico's affairs. Seemingly the fate of the Obregon régime will be like that of its predecessors. It will go down in violence caused by its own corruption. The Mexican people, through the only means at their disposal, will revolt, and notwithstanding their temporary anarchy they will at least put an end to their present tormentors and exploiters. The hope of Mexico's friends—is that out of the tumult will arise a Mexican of strong character who can weld the factions together and impose good order upon the country, and then make it permanent by dealing fairly with foreign nations and individuals.

One of whom the Post is, of course—

The thought here is but the father to the wish. The Post but expresses in that editorial the wish of every interest in the country that is antagonistic to the government of Mexico—that is, that another revolution may be launched in Mexico—and the Post no doubt wants the United States to interpose its strong hand to prevent the exploitation of Mexico by selfish oil interests within the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, in the hearings this question was asked of Mr. Julian Klein, the Director of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, concerning the necessity of a commissioner in Mexico City. I read from the hearings:

Mr. SHREVE. And you are asking for a new commissioner in Mexico City?

Mr. KLEIN. And a trade commissioner as well, because of the increased business in Mexico during the reconstruction now going on. As soon as the Mexican Government is recognized by this Government you will have a flood of inquiries from Mexico, and our present force is barely able to keep up with the current trend of business there now.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania this question: Does not the evidence disclose that as long as Mexico is not recognized there is no use or occasion for this appropriation?

Mr. SHREVE. Absolutely not. We are doing business every day with Mexico. We hope that the day will come soon when we shall have the same friendly relations with Mexico as we have with our Canadian neighbors on the north.

We expect that that condition is going to obtain at some time. We can not exactly fix the date when the change will come. We have no idea, and the gentleman has no idea that conditions are going on forever as they are at present. They are getting better all the time. We are getting together down in Mexico. If we are left alone for a while, we will have this matter settled, and conditions will become satisfactory.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Does not the gentleman think that diplomatic recognition would contribute to the upbuilding of trade and good relationship?

Mr. SHREVE. I believe the men who handle that question are better able to determine it than I am.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I am not asking those gentlemen. I am asking the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SHREVE. I am not prepared to say, because I am not informed.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman is not prepared to say, yet he wants the Government to spend $170,000 on a subject that he does not know about.

Mr. SHREVE. Absolutely. We are spending only a very small part of that sum in Mexico.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I compliment the gentleman on his frankness, if not on his information.

Mr. SHREVE. I thank the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce to investigate and report on domestic as well as foreign problems relating to the production, distribution, and marketing in so far as they relate to the important export industries of the United States, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, and all necessary incidental expenses connected therewith, $385,000.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee whether or not this last paragraph provides for the work of the Division of Foodstuffs in the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce?

Mr. SHREVE. I will say to the gentleman that it does, but not in the way that the Department of Agriculture are studying that proposition. We are considering it here as a commercial proposition, as to where we may find a market for these things, where we may sell the agricultural products of the United States. We have nothing to do with the cultivation of crops, and we are not experimenting in foreign countries to see how we may raise crops.

Mr. STEENERSON. In the organic act which established the Department of Commerce the activities of the department were expressly limited to manufactures. As I am interested in the obtaining of information in regard to farm products, which are not manufactures, I had a conference with the Secretary of Commerce recently on this very point, and he advised me that the Division of Foodstuffs in his department was devoting its attention to farm products as well as manufactured food products, and that he thought subsequent legislation enabled the department to extend their activities so as to include farm products, such as wheat and all grains, and rice, and that it was the purpose of this division to gather complete statistics throughout the whole world, so as to enable those interested in raising wheat, for instance, to know the prospects for next season, or for the next few months, as to supply and demand and as to prices.

I am very glad to note that this service, which will extend throughout the whole world, obtaining information as to the supply and demand of farm products, is to be continued. From the reading of the item I could not tell whether it covered that particular work or not. It is a comparatively new work, and they have put in a new chief of that division, Mr. Montgomery, who is a very able man. I was very anxious to see that the work of that division was taken care of in this bill. As I understand, you have provided for it here.

Mr. SHREVE. Absolutely.

Mr. STEENERSON. I think it is of very great importance to the farmers of the United States; because, although the Department of Agriculture has a great many sources of information, and furnishes a good deal in the way of statistics, this Division of Foodstuffs in the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce is the only service that will obtain certain information that is of vital importance to the man who has grain or other farm products to sell; that is, information as to the supply and demand in foreign countries, and the crop prospects there.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman expect that this particular branch of Government activities will have very much to do if we continue to give away farm products at the rate of $20,000,000 at one clip?

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman alludes to the appropriation of $20,000,000 for the famine sufferers in Russia. The only fault I found with that appropriation was that it was made out of the profits of the Grain Corporation instead of out of the Treasury of the United States. In my estimation the profits of the Grain Corporation were really held by that corporation as a trustee, and should have been used to aid the wheat producers, out of whom this profit was made.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas resumed the chair.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I want to give just one illustration regarding the assistance that the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce is rendering the farmer. In the last year there was a very large overproduction of rice in California and the Southern States. By that I mean that there was much more rice raised in California and the Southern States than could be consumed in the United States. The rice growers of those districts were on the verge of bankruptcy, and something had to be done. The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce began to make investigations all over the world, and they found a place where there was a scarcity of rice. As a result the rice from southern California and from the Southern States was sent to this foreign country, and the price advanced a cent and a half or 2 cents, so that the secretary of the Rice Growers' Association wrote the Department of Foreign and Domestic Commerce a letter and said that the bureau had saved the rice growers from bankruptcy. I mention this as just one kind of work that is being done by that bureau.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think it would have been very much more valuable if we had taught the people of the United States the value of rice as a food than to try to raise it and ship it abroad?

Mr. SHREVE. Possibly there is something in the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. After hearing all the testimony on this subject, does not the gentleman think that in view of the very low prices of the staple farm products, like wheat and corn, there is something wrong with the distribution in foreign countries? The demand seems to be there, and we supply a very large amount of these commodities to foreign countries, and yet they have been sold at a less price than it cost to produce them, and the farmers of the United States, like those who produce rice, are now facing bankruptcy. I have never in all my life heard so many complaints about the agricultural situation as just now, and still the statistics show that we have exported more bushels of wheat to foreign countries than ever before. Either there is a combination among the Governments of the world to depress the price of that staple commodity that is operating, or there must be some explanation made of why the commodities have to be exported and sold at ruinous prices.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman think this is the only product which is being sold at the present time at less than the cost of production?

Mr. STEENERSON. Mainly so.

Mr. SNELL. There are lots of things being sold to-day at less than it cost to produce them.

Mr. STEENERSON. I doubt that.

Mr. SNELL. I know that there are.

Mr. STEENERSON. It may be that there are some things produced at a high cost during the war that are being sold at less than the cost of production, but the manufacturers fix the prices on their products whereas the farmer must take what he can get.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I would like to say to the gentleman from Minnesota that it is fair to take notice of the change of conditions that are going forward at this time; that the prices of all farm products, including wheat, swine, live cattle, mutton, and wool are showing a very satisfactory improvement over what they have been in the past two months. I think it is proper that that fact should be stated.

Mr. STEENERSON. In reply to the gentleman from Kansas, I will say that the price of wheat has not reached the point where it is sufficient to pay the cost of production, even on an average crop.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. I do this for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee if the committee gave any serious consideration to the statement of the Secretary of Commerce found on page 9 in the hearings, to which I desire to call attention:

That necessity to know the economic and financial situation abroad goes even further, perhaps, than appears on the surface, because we have made loans from the United States Treasury to various Governments. Sixteen Governments, I believe, are indebted to our Treasury, and we need constant knowledge of the progress and development of those countries if our Government is to be properly advised in our relationship to that debt.

Will the chairman state whether that important subject was seriously considered and whether he believes these men who are less experienced than the commercial attachés would be called in by the commission appointed to refund the debt of the foreign Governments?

Mr. SHREVE. No; there is no conflict that I can see there. The situation is about like this. These men who are sent out by the department are experts in their line. They are business men, financiers, men who are able to take a look at the country in a general way and decide something about the prospect in the future of their ability to pay for the goods they buy and their ability to pay their debts. Recently one of these men was brought back from China to participate in the Disarmament Conference. They are regarded highly among the business men of the country.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. The gentleman does not seem to understand my question, and possibly I did not make it clear. The Secretary of Commerce comes before your committee and inferentially suggests that these men may be a great help to the commissioners who were appointed and whose duty it is to refund the foreign debt.

Mr. SHREVE. That may be possible; I would not say that it was not. I am sure if the trade commission or the commercial attachés should get possession of information of great value to the commission they would communicate it to them. It would be on the same plan as the man who came from China to assist the Disarmament Conference. But they are not sent out for that purpose, but in a general way to look after the affairs of the United States in the country they represent.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I must say that it is a matter of surprise to me that the Secretary of Commerce so seriously presented a proposition of this kind, when on page 65 I find, according to the statement of Mr. Klein, that the salary of the trade commissioner is not so high and he is not so experienced in the business as the commercial attaché. All of this information could be secured from the commercial attachés.

Now, I want to be understood clearly, gentlemen, as favoring the trade commissioner. I do not understand thoroughly what function he may perform to differentiate him from the commercial attaché, and I should be pleased to understand it better. But I doubt very much, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that we get anything like the benefit from the trade commissioners that the Secretary of Commerce would have us believe from his statements in the hearings. I want to say if there is a country in the world that wants bread, that wants machinery, that wants meat, that wants clothing of any kind, they know where to get it. It is well understood that the International Harvester Co. and the great packing companies, the wheat exporters of this country, and the manufacturers make common knowledge and understanding of their business through modern systematized methods. These matters are regulated by laws that are inexorable, that can not be set aside. If we can cooperate through this department, I am for it, but I am not deeply impressed and have not been at any time with the fact that we are getting any very great benefit from any extension of trade resulting from the activities of our trade commissioners. I hope we may secure benefits, but I know how very natural it is for a man to go around to the farmer, to the merchant, to the banker, and to convince him in 15 minutes that he is in great need of something that he never before felt the need of in all his life.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman is aware of the fact that the United States now has the bulk of the gold supply of the world. In view of that fact, now does the gentleman expect foreign countries to purchase American goods unless we refrain from building up additional tariff walls to keep their goods out? If they have no gold, how are they going to pay for American goods unless we take goods from them?

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, the subject suggested by the gentleman is too comprehensive to be treated in a moment. I should like to answer, as he well knows. I have not now the time. All know my position on the tariff. It was clearly stated in a speech I made in this House, at more length than I usually indulge, something like a year ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. There are certain laws that operate—that have always operated. They are irrevocable, they are inexorable. I doubt if there is any power in the United States artificially organized—that is known—that could have prevented hogs from advancing from 6.30 to 10.15 in the past two months. In Kansas City yesterday they were selling for 10.15 cents, and in Chicago for 10.65. I doubt if there is a man in the United States with the acumen, with the sagacity, to explain all the causes of this advance to the satisfaction of anybody or to the satisfaction of a very small minority of the people. Yet this law is operating. It may indicate that after the surplus sold by this Government to foreign Governments at a price incomparably lower than it cost this Government, or the cost of production, has been exhausted, notwithstanding the fact that the finances of Europe, as suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], are in a chaotic condition, yet now the people in the world are buying and, naturally, will buy the things they feel the greatest need of, and that they are doing it to-day. Those supplies being exhausted in foreign countries, and the surplus of the world being here, the peoples of the world are turning in this direction for their supplies. And we are pleased to note advances in the prices of all agricultural products which, if sustained, will go further than any other one thing to hasten the return of a general condition of prosperity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has again expired. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF THE CENSUS.

Salaries: Director, $6,000; 5 chief statisticians, at $3,000 each; chief clerk, $2,500; geographer, $2,000; stenographer, $1,500; 9 expert chiefs of divisions, at $2,000 each; clerks—20 of class 4, 30 of class 3, 65 of class 2, 265 of class 1, 90 at $1,000 each, 79 at $900 each; skilled laborers—3, at $900 each, 1, $720; 3 messengers, at $840 each; 5 assistant messengers, at $720 each; 4 unskilled laborers, at $720 each; 4 messenger boys, at $480 each; in all, $737,440.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice that this bureau has received the most liberal increases of any bureau whose appropriations are carried in this bill. I notice also from the hearings that there was $1,600,000 of unexpended balance from last year. I want to know what the chairman has to say in regard to that?

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, there was no appropriation made for this specifically during the decennial period, and for that reason it makes this item look large at the present time when, as a matter of fact, it is smaller. We have made reductions in the Census Bureau that amount to about $400,000.

Mr. SNELL. Do I understand that there were no specific appropriations whatever made for the Census Bureau during the decennial period?

Mr. SHREVE. Not during the decennial period.

Mr. SNELL. And that accounts for all this increase?

Mr. SHREVE. It does. Apparently it is an increase, but it is not.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I notice in the RECORD of yesterday, on page 3300, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. WHITE], in colloquy with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE], speaking of molasses as being one of the most common ingredients of stock food, said:

But at the same time I have observed that the gentleman's statement is corroborated by statements in the public press that at the present freight rate the molasses product is absolutely prohibitive. There is a great demand for this as stock food in the West and in my own State.

The reply of the chairman of this committee to that statement was:

I am very thankful to the gentleman for the definite information which he has given. I am inclined to think freight rates enter into the situation. It is a scientific problem that ought to be settled at this time and one that would seem to benefit the farmers.

I am wondering if my colleagues on the other side, who are in the majority, could give us any intimation as to the time when these freight rates will be reduced and when the farmers may receive some benefit?

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Did the gentleman notice in this morning's paper the statement that Mr. Warfield, the chairman of the securities committee of the railroad security holders, is applying now for a loan of $100,000,000 for the railroads through the Interstate Commerce Commission, and does he think they could reduce freight rates as long as we have to loan them money?

Mr. SEARS. I saw that statement. I think the farmers will wait a long time before they get very much benefit. However, Mr. Chairman, my attitude upon the freight proposition is well known. I have fought for a reduction of freight rates, which are prohibitory, and I expect to touch upon that at a later date. The point I wish to call attention to now is information which I have before me.

Reading from the live-stock report which I received yesterday, I notice that while the value of all farm animals was $52,000,000 in 1920, in 1922 the value was only $33,785,000. In 1922 the price of other cattle besides milch cows—that is, beef cattle, and so forth—was $23.78 per head, while in 1920 the price of such cattle was $43.21, notwithstanding the fact that there were more than 2,000,000 head of cattle less in 1922 than in 1920. This report given out by this bureau says that the price of cattle is $16.10 a hundred. I have in my hand a paper from my home State, under date of February 21, giving the Chicago live-stock market report, which is as follows: For cattle, top heavy steers, $9, or 9 cents a pound, while this bureau is quoting the same at 16.10 cents a pound.

I have always understood that the law of supply and demand regulates the price, but evidently when the farmer produces this law does not apply, because, as stated, there are 2,000,000 less cattle on the market to-day or in the country to-day than there were in 1920, and yet the producer is getting only $23.78 for his cattle now, whereas in 1920 he got $43.21. When you go into any place of business, because of prohibitory freight rates and other reasons, you pay almost the price of a cow for a good-sized steak.

If you buy three or four lamb chops, you pay for about a lamb, and it seems to me it is about time the people should wake up and get back to normalcy and let the wave of prosperity, which is being proclaimed through the country by the press daily, return to the people, instead of being a myth. When will the producer get at least a fair return for his labor?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I am unable to answer the gentleman, but perhaps I can give him some information which will be equally valuable. Here is a report from Mr. Robert F. Maddox, the President of the Atlanta National Bank and former president of the American Bankers' Association, the head of 23,000 national banks, and he says:

When the Federal Government has promoted foreign trade to its normal stage, the South will be one of the first sections of the country to emerge from the current business depression. Export business is one of the main factors upon which the South can base hope of its future prosperity.

I am very happy to say the South has grasped the situation properly and is making further strides in export than most any other part of the country.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield right there? I desire to correct the gentleman.

Mr. SHREVE. In just a moment; I thank the gentleman for his suggestion. Now, we have something in the commodity division about packing. We propose to tell the manufacturers of the United States something about packing. Well, now, I found on a trip down South that the people down in the South-land knew all about packing. I was calling on the Gulf States Steel Works—I will say I was at a rotary club meeting and made a little address after the meeting, and I was invited out to see some of the principal manufacturers, one of which was the Gulf States Steel Works—and the manager asked me what I would like to see, and I said I would like to look at some of the work they were doing in the foreign trade. "Well," he said, "we will take you out to the barbed wire mill." He took me out there, and there he showed me bales of barbed wire rolled up on a large spool with elongated parts so that two men could pick up one of these spools and run away with them. "Now," he said, "a spool of barbed wire will occupy almost three times the cargo space of ordinary barbed wire that is used in this country. However, the people of South America want it in that way. We send it exactly in the same way that they want it."

He took me over to the nail mill and I saw them putting nails in bags. That was something new to me. I asked him why they did not use kegs for the nails. "Oh, well," he says, "the reason is that these nails are to be sent to South American ports and from there they are to be sent back into the interior of the country on pack horses or mule trains, and so they have to be packed in that way." Then I happened to think that a great many settle this proposition usually about the first time they make a failure. Now, I take it the situation is not so serious. There is a propaganda of a lot of people who set forth that we do not know how to pack our goods, but the truth is most of the time we are overpacking rather than underpacking. I know of a case where we had a foreign order to go to the people of South American countries of ribbons, and the South Americans wanting the ribbons suggested they be put in a hoghead. They put them in a hoghead instead of packing them in cartons and boxes, because when they got to South America they levied tariff on the weight of the whole package and they would have had to pay a tariff on a lot of pasteboard boxes. We learned a lesson that time.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. SEARS. When the gentleman was stating in regard to our export trade I was thinking about when I sold a hog for $8 which cost me $16, and I would like to call the attention of my good friend to this fact, that you can keep the nails but you can not keep beef and cattle. You can just lay your nails aside awhile, but when you get to farm products, something that the people must have to live, that they have to have, they must be immediately disposed of.

Mr. SHREVE. I am not an expert on that line.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. If the gentleman will permit, why I desired to correct the gentleman was that he said there were 23,000 national banks; there are not that many in the United States.

Mr. SHREVE. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Tabulating machines: For constructing tabulating machines, and for experimental work in developing, improving, and constructing an integrating counter for use in statistical work, and repairs to such machinery and other mechanical appliances, including technical and mechanical service in connection therewith, whether performed in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, and purchase of necessary machinery and supplies, $40,340.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee relative to the census of the manufacturing industries of the United States. I noticed in the hearings that they are from six months to a year late before we get them, and I wondered just how much real value was to be obtained from those statistics?

Mr. SHREVE. Replying to the gentleman from New York, I will say that was one thing the committee gave some thought to. We tried to ascertain just what the value of those statistics are. Most people seem to think they are ancient history, and we tried and will try further to find some way to reduce that great expense.

The law provides, however, that this census shall be taken, and until the legislative committee acts upon the subject and repeals the law or modifies it we can see nothing else to do than to go on with the work, which will cost us from now on about $800,000.

Mr. SNELL. I thought some one said it cost about $3,000,000.

Mr. SHREVE. The first cost is $1,200,000, and they have finished up considerable work. They will spend $800,000 more.

Mr. SNELL. As long as they are in trouble about the value received from this appropriation, would it not be all right for the committee to cut that appropriation right in two?

Mr. SHREVE. The Secretary came before us, and we entered into an agreement with him whereby he makes a cut of $400,000, and in that cut it is contemplated a large portion may be saved in this very work. For instance, the census is collected by sending a questionnaire to the manufacturer. If he fills it out, well and good. If he does not do so an agent is sent to the plant to secure the information. Oftentimes the information is not available and oftentimes it is not reliable. I think the manufacturers of the United States are not aware of that fact, because I have received several telegrams asking us not to cut that item. The Secretary says that he might secure this information through the chambers of commerce throughout the country. For instance, he might place one man with the association in Philadelphia, whose business it would be to collect the information from that city and the surrounding towns. At least there is that objection made to the proposition, and we hope to make a reduction. However, we had to make that appropriation in order to cover other items as well.

Mr. SNELL. It is the promise of the committee unless there will be greater results from the service it will be reduced or cut out?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. SEARS. The gentleman said some of these reports were six months old. I have received reports over a year old.

Mr. SNELL. Six months to a year old.

Mr. SEARS. I can not understand the value they would be to us, because conditions may entirely change.

Mr. SNELL. The chairman of the committee does not think they are of much value.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant inspectors, as authorized by law, for the following ports: New York, 34 at $2,500 each; New Orleans, 6 at $2,350 each; Baltimore, 8 at $2,350 each; Providence, 4 at $2,350 each; Boston, 6 at $2,350 each; Philadelphia, 14 at $2,350 each; San Francisco, 12 at $2,350 each; Buffalo, 6 at $2,100 each; Cleveland, 6 at $2,100 each; Milwaukee, 4 at $2,100 each; Chicago, 4 at $2,100 each; Grand Haven, 2 at $2,100 each; Detroit, 4 at $2,100 each; Norfolk, 8 at $2,100 each; Seattle, 12 at $2,100 each; Portland (Oreg.), 4 at $2,100 each; Albany (N. Y.), 2 at $2,100 each; Duluth, 2 at $2,100 each; Portland (Me.), 2 at $2,100 each; Los Angeles, 2 at $2,100 each; Savannah, 2 at $2,100 each; Toledo, 2 at $2,100 each; Galveston, 2 at $2,100 each; Mobile, 2 at $2,100 each; 3 traveling inspectors, at $3,000 each; in all, $350,100.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman a question. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] a moment ago referred to statistics that are furnished by the Bureau of the Census on the question of manufacture. I rise to inquire concerning another series of figures in which I am greatly interested, namely, those that show the value of all the property of the United States. In the course of a little investigation I made, and the summaries of which I presented yesterday, I found these figures are likewise gathered about a year or two after the ordinary figures of the census are gathered. I am wondering if there is not something that can be done to secure these figures that relate to the value of all the property of the United States at the same time. Because, as everyone knows, by the time they are secured they are so far out of line with values that appear in the census tables that they almost lose their value for comparative purposes.

Mr. SHREVE. I will say to the gentleman, that the system I have described regarding the manufacturing census applies to almost all of the other various kinds of census. And that is the very condition that the Secretary is now endeavoring to cure. We want to bring the statistics up to the present, so that they may be of some value now, and not way in the future sometime. They are all working to that end, not only in the manufacturing census, but in the one the gentleman referred to.

Mr. KETCHAM. I am very glad to have that information, because these figures are of very great value, but their value is made much greater by comparison. That can only be made possible if they are produced at about the same time and under the same conditions as other figures are obtained.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

What is the reason for these cuts in assistant inspectors all along the line?

Mr. SHREVE. I will say that the reason for these cuts is as follows: It appears that there is no one filling those positions. Take the city of Boston, for instance, there is an authorization there for 10. There are only 6 men employed. And so we have taken them off the corps and we have done the same thing in all the cities of the United States. We are making quite a material reduction, for no other reason than that we were informed they were not employed. I will say, too, that it met with the approval of the men in charge of the bureau.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman mean to say that there are four Federal positions in Boston that are not filled?

Mr. SHREVE. I was rather surprised at that myself; but, however, it seems to be the fact.

Mr. WALSH. It is probably because the Republican Members representing Boston could not find some Democrats to fill the positions and that the Republicans who had been mentioned would not be appointed. That is usually what happens under this particular department. The persons applying for appointment who happen to be Republicans are looked upon with a little suspicion.

Mr. GARNER. If I understand the chairman, he says that there were 10 employees allowed for the city of Boston, and that only 6 were doing the work. They all being Democrats, and being efficient, they can do the work of 10 Republicans.

Mr. WALSH. Well, the gentleman from Texas is assuming, of course, that the 10 gentlemen there are Democrats, and, if that is so, it may be that the kind of Democrats they have there can do the work of 10 of the kind of Republicans that are being appointed under this particular department, but not 10 real Republicans, men who are not of the fair-weather type, and who are Republicans when they are in the minority as well as when they are in the majority.

Now, I would like to ask the gentleman about the city of New York. Have they reduced the number there?

Mr. SHREVE. In reply to the question of the gentleman, they say that there are 40 men authorized in New York, and they are only employing 34; so we have made a reduction of 6 there.

Mr. WALSH. Where are we going to be in all these various ports in case there is that revival of shipping which the Shipping Board and the distinguished publicity agent of the chairman of that board are predicting, when we shall have ships running in and out of these ports loaded to the scuppers with commodities bound to all the various ports of the world? Will we not be hampered by this drastic cut in assistant inspectors?

Mr. SHREVE. We certainly would be very seriously handicapped unless Congress were in session. If Congress were in session we might take care of the items in a deficiency bill.

Mr. WALSH. That is some hope.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Commissioner of Navigation to secure uniformity in the admeasurement of vessels, including the employment of an adjuster of admeasurements at not to exceed $2,260, purchase and exchange of admeasuring instruments, traveling and incidental expenses, $3,760.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HICKS. I do so for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee just what work is being done by the Commissioner of Navigation in regard to these admeasurements? Does that mean that we are getting into a uniform method of measuring ships for tonnage, or applying a new system of tonnage? What does it mean?

Mr. SHREVE. It is not a new system. We are simply carrying on the old system. The work is being done just as it has been done for a long time. We did not make any very careful analysis of it because it was the same as before.

Mr. HICKS. Have we not a uniform method?

Mr. SHREVE. It is the same method as was covered in this bill last year and the year before.

Mr. HICKS. That hardly answers my question, because the wording here would rather give one the impression that there are several systems of measurement in vogue, and that this proviso is put in the law so that the various systems should be made uniform. I was wondering what the system was at the present time.

Mr. SHREVE. They are endeavoring to work out a uniform system. The study is going on all the time. How nearly they have arrived at a final conclusion I do not know, but it is the purpose to arrive at a uniform system.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase and repair of instruments for counting passengers, $250.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. TILSON. What kind of an instrument is this for counting passengers?

Mr. SHREVE. I will say that is connected largely with the excursion boats; for instance, the boats going up and down the Hudson, leaving New York City and going up to Bear Lake and Palisades Park. It is necessary under the law that the number of passengers shall be counted, and when there is a sufficient number, the number allowed by law, the officers refuse to permit any more to enter the ship. It is of very great importance to see that the ships are not overloaded. We found a little duplication in this service and in another service, and we took off $5,000 because there was a duplication. It is necessary that these passengers be counted to prevent the overloading of the ships.

Mr. TILSON. Do they not use a little hand machine?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Such as the base ball umpire uses?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. It is called the "comptometer."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of Commerce to employ, temporarily, such persons as may be necessary, of whom not more than two at any one time may be employed in the District of Columbia, to enforce the laws to prevent overcrowding of passenger and excursion vessels, and all necessary expenses in connection therewith, $10,000.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HICKS. I do so for the purpose of asking our genial friend another question. This item authorizes the temporary employment of inspectors to prevent the overloading of steamboats and steamships. Nearly all this excursion work goes on in the summer time. What do these inspectors do in the winter-time? Are they employed only by the day, or month, or week, or how are they employed?

Mr. SHREVE. In reply to the gentleman from New York State, I will say that the men who do the work on excursion boats are employed for three or four or five months, and then they go out of the service of the Government. They are employed at the small salary of $4 a day.

Mr. HICKS. This says "temporary employment."

Mr. SHREVE. Yes. That means they are temporarily employed for the purpose of counting the passengers during the summer season.

Mr. HICKS. Do we have regular employees in addition to the temporary employees?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. What do they do at other times?

Mr. SHREVE. They do office work, and they have charge of a multitude of things that the Bureau of Navigation has to take care of.

Mr. HICKS. Then we have two classes, the regular employees, who do various sorts of work in addition to the inspection work, and the temporary employees, whose work lasts only a few months a year?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes; and as we do not find employment for the temporary men throughout the whole year, in order to save money to the Government we employ these men only during the excursion period.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Shipping commissioners: For salaries of shipping commissioners in amounts not exceeding the following: Baltimore, $2,000; Boston, $3,000; New Orleans, $2,500; Newport News, $1,500; New York, $5,000; Norfolk, $1,800; Philadelphia, $2,400; Portland, Me., $1,300; Seattle, $3,500; Providence, $1,800; Galveston, $1,800; San Francisco, $4,000; in all, $30,600.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. WALSH. I notice that there have been two or three ports which heretofore have had shipping commissioners that have been dropped in this item; and glancing through the hearings I see that the department has dropped a number of shipping commissioners, because they had been found to have been violating the law by accepting gratuities. Is that the reason why these ports are deprived of these shipping commissioners?

Mr. SHREVE. I am very happy to inform the gentleman that that is not the case. I regret to say, however, that these ports were closed by reason of the fact that there was so little business there that it did not warrant the continuing of the shipping service.

Mr. WALSH. Now, with respect to the port of New Bedford, which in years past has had the honor of being probably the most important Atlantic port—

Mr. HICKS. What State is that in?

Mr. WALSH. In the country, and is to-day a very important commercial center—

Mr. HICKS. Is that in America?

Mr. WALSH. That port, New Bedford, Mass., according to the figures, has been up to the standard or a little beyond in the past year. Yet I notice that the shipping commissioner there has been dropped. What was the reason for that?

Mr. SHREVE. It is very unfortunate that this became necessary. I recognize the fact that New Bedford has long been one of our principal ports. Away back in the early days it was noted for the men who sailed from New Bedford. However, it seems that possibly the change from the sailing ship to the steamship has made some difference to the importance of that famous port. Mr. Tyrer, the shipping commissioner who came before our committee, said this:

We do not consider the work in New Bedford, Bath, Me.; Rockland, Me.; and Charleston, S. C., justifies support of a shipping commissioner's office. In fact, the work is not sufficient to pay a man under the present law. The shipping commissioner's clerks can not be paid any more than they could have earned if the old fee system had been in existence. The fee system was abolished in 1886, but we still keep a record of the work done in the shipping commissioners' offices, and the pay is based on the fees which would have been collected.

Mr. WALSH. Yet they shipped over a thousand men from there last year, and they state that the standard which they set for the maintenance of an office is 1,000 men. New Bedford went over that number last year, did it not?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes. I regret to say that the cost—

Mr. WALSH. New Bedford's cost was $1.13 per man. What is the reason that the cost was so much higher there than at other ports? Is it because of the superior quality of the men that they invariably ship there?

Mr. SHREVE. Possibly that may be true, although the information that comes before the committee is that it is caused by lack of business.

Mr. WALSH. They had more men shipped there than from various other ports. Just the other day a ship sailed from New Bedford on a whaling voyage, with very appropriate ceremonies attending its departure from the port. Seriously, I should like to know if the gentleman has any information as to why the cost of this particular office there is so much higher than that of others?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. I ask for five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks an additional five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHREVE. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that there is nothing in the record that would answer his question. The matter was thoroughly and carefully considered by the Director of the Budget, and these items were left out of the recommendations which came to the committee. It has been the fixed policy of the committee that we have not considered any items not recommended by the Bureau of the Budget; that we would not consider any items coming to us in any other way. It becomes necessary for us to adhere to that rule unless the House should take action to change our rules.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is satisfied with reference to this particular port that the business there does not warrant retaining and maintaining this office?

Mr. SHREVE. That was so stated in the hearings.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HICKS. Now that we have given New Bedford a proper burial and, I hope, have forgotten it for some time, I should like to ask the genial chairman of the subcommittee just what these commissioners do or fail to do. What are their functions?

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman certainly needs information after the statement he made preceding his question. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHREVE. The law provides that the general duties of the shipping commissioner shall be—

1. To afford facilities for engaging seamen by keeping a register of their names and character.
2. To superintend their engagement and discharge in the manner prescribed by law.
3. To provide means for securing the presence on board at the proper time of men who are engaged.
4. To facilitate the making of apprenticeships to the sea service.
5. To perform such other duties relating to the merchant seamen and merchant ships as are now or may hereafter be required by law.

Mr. HICKS. I thank the gentleman. The gentleman from New Bedford has told me that, but he is so inaccurate about many things that I wanted to get the information from the proper source in order to set my mind at rest. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For apparatus, machinery, tools, and appliances used in connection with buildings or work of the bureau, laboratory supplies, materials, and supplies used in the construction of apparatus, machinery, or other appliances, including their exchange; piping, wiring, and construction incident to the installation of apparatus, machinery, or appliances; furniture for laboratories and offices, cases for apparatus, $75,000.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I presume when this item was before the committee for consideration there were a number of applications made by Dr. Stratton for increased salaries for certain of these experts?

Mr. SHREVE. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. HICKS. Did the committee take into consideration not only the work that they are doing but the demands that are made by outside concerns to secure the services of these experts?

Mr. SHREVE. I will say to the gentleman from New York that the committee did take these matters into consideration, and it is a matter of deep regret that we could not afford the Bureau of Standards the assistance that they require. I want to say to the gentleman, however, that the Committee on Appropriations is not a legislative committee, and we do not intend to initiate legislation concerning any of these matters, and we so told Dr. Stratton. I am pleased to say that the Bureau of Standards is now bringing in a bill which will cover all of these items, and I urgently request all of the legislative committees to take up these matters, because there are many things not only in this department but in other departments where there should be legislation. However, it is not our function to legislate, and we do not intend to do so.

Mr. HICKS. It seems to me that in many cases these men are underpaid, because they could get employment outside at much higher salaries and it is only their loyalty and interest in their work that keeps them in the department. I want to say that I believe Dr. Stratton and those with him are performing a most magnificent service for the Government in the Bureau of Standards.

I know that if we have any great problems in aviation matters which we want to solve we take them to the Bureau of Standards, and in many cases they have solved them. They are doing a magnificent service, and I commend Dr. Stratton and all the employees with him, who are probably working at a low wage. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

To develop methods of testing and standardizing machines, motors, tools, measuring instruments, and other apparatus and devices used in mechanical, hydraulic, and aeronautic engineering; for the comparative study of types of apparatus and methods of operation, and for the establishment of standards of performance; for the accurate determination of fundamental physical constants involved in the proper execution of this work; and for the scientific experiments and investigations needed in solving the problems which may arise in connection therewith, especially in response to the requirements of aeronautics and aviation for information of a purely scientific nature, including personal services in the District of Columbia and in the field, $15,000.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to correct the spelling in line 17, page 19, of the word "personal."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction will be made.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigation and testing of railroad track scales, elevator scales, and other scales used in weighing commodities for interstate shipments and to secure equipment and assistance for testing the scales used by the Government in its transactions with the public, such as post office, navy yard, and customhouse scales, and for the purpose of cooperating with the State in securing uniformity in the weights and measures laws and in the methods of inspection, including personal services in the District of Columbia and in the field, $40,000.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to correct the spelling in line 13, page 22, where the word "State" should be "States."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction will be made.

The Clerk read as follows:

For establishing new aids to navigation and for improvements to existing aids in Alaska, $125,000.

Mr. DEAL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, line 4, after the figures "$125,000," insert "for enlarging and improving the lighthouse depot at Portsmouth, Va., in the fifth lighthouse district, $275,000."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. DEAL. Mr. Chairman, on June 20, 1918, the President approved an authorization of $275,000 for the improvement and enlargement of the lighthouse station at Portsmouth, Va. I will read from the report of the Commissioner of Lighthouses with reference to it:

No. 2. Depot for fifth lighthouse district: Enlarging and improving the lighthouse depot at Portsmouth, Va., in the fifth lighthouse district, or establishing a new depot, $275,000.

(NOTE.—The act of June 20, 1918 (40 Stat., 607), authorized this work at $275,000, but no appropriation was made therefor. The present lighthouse depot at Portsmouth, Va., is entirely inadequate to the needs of the fifth district, both in area and in water front. This depot is the principal supply station for the lighthouse work of Chesapeake Bay and the coast from Maryland to North Carolina, with the sounds and rivers. The increasing maritime and naval importance of the vicinity of Norfolk makes it urgent that a suitable depot be established promptly. It is the principal depot of one of the largest lighthouse districts and is the headquarters for six tenders and two light vessels during the greater part of the year. The aggregate length of these vessels is over 1,400 feet; the total wharf frontage is only 240 feet. The operation of tenders is much hampered by this limited frontage, the delay caused by waiting to discharge or receive cargo being estimated to cost the Lighthouse Service not less than $35,000 a year. The very small area available for buoy storage necessitates much otherwise unnecessary handling of heavy buoys and appendages at a large cost of time and money. The available wharf frontage of this depot should be doubled and the area increased by several acres. This may be done by purchase of a new and larger site or by purchase of adjacent property. The present buildings are mainly antiquated wooden structures. They constitute a fire menace and should be replaced by modern fireproof buildings. While the detailed estimate given below shows a total estimated cost of $400,000, in view of the possibility that a Government-owned site may be obtained, thus reducing the cost, appropriation is asked at this time for only the amount heretofore authorized by Congress.)

I will say that owing to the inadequacy of the wharf frontage that for a number of years the adjacent wharf property and lands were used by the Commissioner of Lighthouses. It was owned by private individuals, and they have received no compensation for the use of their property. In view of this, they have not felt that they were justified in keeping these docks in repair, and consequently they have deteriorated to such an extent that they are not serviceable for dockage, even for Government vessels. Therefore we are asking that this appropriation be made in order to take care of this property in the fifth naval district, covering, as it does, this large area of territory, which is now a menace incident to the navigation of these waters.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the committee's attention to the fact that this item, as far as we know, has not been investigated by the Budget, at least there is no report to the Committee on Appropriations covering a Budget estimate, and there has been no investigation by the committee covering the appropriation, and I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For establishing and improving aids to navigation and lights in Princess Bay dredged channel, Raritan Bay, Arthur Kills, South Amboy dredged channel, and Raritan River, N. Y. and N. J., $100,000.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph, lines 16 to 19. I would like to ask the gentleman what authority is there for establishing aids to navigation in these new dredged channels?

Mr. DICKINSON. In the supplemental estimate filed by the Budget—I do not know whether the gentleman from Massachusetts has a copy of it—

Mr. WALSH. I have at my office but not here.

Mr. DICKINSON. The project contemplates an improvement of aids to navigation and lights in Princess Bay dredged channel; and as far as I know I am not certain that there is any specific provision in the Federal law for this improvement unless you can interpret the general law for aids to navigation broad enough to cover it.

Mr. WALSH. I think the gentleman will find that the general law can not be interpreted in that way. I do not recall the language, but it seems to imply here that these are new channels which have been opened up in these waters, and it is now sought to establish there aids to navigation and lights.

I think it would require some authorization from a legislative committee.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. Does the gentleman think, for instance, if we are going to put a light or a buoy somewhere where the demands of commerce warrant its being placed, that we have to get a special act of Congress authorizing that to be placed there?

Mr. WALSH. I did not say anything like that.

Mr. HICKS. I am asking for information. This channel has been dredged and commerce is ready to use it. Has not the bureau authority to put those lights there without having special authority from Congress so to do? It would seem to me that the organic law would cover a point like that. It would certainly cover it for one light or two lights, and why not for a series of lights?

Mr. WALSH. I do not think the organic law authorizes establishing new lights or new aid without authority.

Mr. DICKINSON. It is my understanding that the Army engineers have done a great deal of dredging in this river to facilitate marine transportation. If the authority which authorizes such dredging is not broad enough and does not include an improvement which seeks to perfect it by making it fit for navigation, then I think the point of order would be well taken against this provision. It was our thought that the authority authorizing this improvement would be broad enough to authorize the perfection of the improvement by making it safe for navigation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the point of order will be withdrawn, because this, possibly, is a needed improvement. I think there is a bill now pending on the calendar providing for this improvement coming from the legislative committee. There is no question but that the point of order is well taken. The Committee on Appropriations has no jurisdiction to include in an appropriation bill items of this character which are not authorized by legislation. The practice has always been for the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to bring in legislative bills for improvements or additional aids to navigation contemplated by this item. I have no doubt, I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], that all of the preceding items on this page of the pending bill were also subject to the point of order. One of them is in my district. I did not make the point of order against it, because I knew the value of it. They are all included in the legislative bill, I think, now pending. In fact, there are two legislative bills, each of them carrying these items. As long as the rest of them have gone in in this way, I am inclined to think it is economy to let this item go in the bill and thereby present a very good reason for the consideration of a legislative bill, which has some very bad propositions in it, but which, however, will probably pass if it be considered.

Mr. APPLEBY. Mr. Chairman, I can explain to the gentleman from Massachusetts that this is not a new project. The Raritan Bay and other waters here mentioned have had dredged channels for many years, and have been used very extensively for day business for a long time. The object of this appropriation is to provide for the lighting of these channels for night water traffic. The Committee on the Budget thoroughly investigated the matter, and in order to be assured of the correctness of its position in recommending the appropriation, referred the item to the Bureau of Lighthouses of the Department of Commerce. This bureau, in turn, asked for a recommendation from the United States Coast Guard Service of the Treasury Department. Both the Bureau of Lighthouses and the Coast Guard Service, after investigation of the traffic and tonnage, reported that there was sufficient business to demand a 24-hour service, and recommended the establishment of these additional aids to navigation. In addition to other tonnage, these additional lights are badly needed to aid the many coal barges being towed out from Port Reading and South Amboy, which is the terminal of the Pennsylvania Railroad. There are large coal docks at these terminals; many industrial plants are located at Carteret, Roosevelt, and other points along the Arthur Kill. The Appropriations Committee, after reviewing these reports, decided that there was sufficient transportation at night to warrant lighting these waters. In passing I might say that Raritan Bay and Arthur Kill have a channel of 30-foot depth to accommodate very large vessels. That channel takes care of ocean-going steamers, as well as other deep-water craft.

The people at Perth Amboy and New Brunswick are very anxious that this item be included in this year's appropriation bill in order that these transportation facilities may be improved to meet the needs of traffic.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, further reserving the point of order, I would ask whether this appropriation was recommended by the department and also by Gen. Dawes.

Mr. DICKINSON. It was, in a supplemental estimate.

Mr. SEARS. I am not protesting, but I would like to know why it is that $100,000 is given to these projects and only $50,000 to the 1,200 or more miles of seacoast in Florida and Key West, and about four or five or six thousand miles of rivers. Could we by our genial smile reach the Director of the Budget or the committee?

Mr. DICKINSON. All that is recommended by the Budget to the committee is $50,000.

Mr. SEARS. I am wondering why the director had his eyes northward instead of southward.

Mr. DICKINSON. The gentleman will have to interview the director on that rather than the committee.

Mr. SEARS. I hope the committee will take that into consideration the next time they meet. I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Coast Pilot: For compilation of the Coast Pilot, including the employment of such pilots and nautical experts in the field and office as may be necessary for the same, $5,600.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order to ask about the publication known as the Coast Pilot. This item carries $5,600. Is that the cost of the compilation of the book? I want to know about what the publication costs a year.

Mr. DICKINSON. We have not the total cost of the publication, but the publication is sold by the superintendent of the document room, and the proceeds therefrom are covered into the Treasury.

Mr. HICKS. Is that enough to take care of the amount that is distributed free to various Members of Congress? Is it a self-sustaining publication, including what is given to the Members of Congress?

Mr. DICKINSON. My understanding is that it is.

Mr. HICKS. And this is the total net amount it cost the Government—$5,600 a year?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Watchmen, firemen, messengers, and laborers: Three at $880 each, 6 at $840 each, 4 at $820 each, 3 at $720 each, 4 at $700 each; plumber and steamfitter, $1,200; plumbers and steamfitters—1 $1,600, 1 $1,200.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

Page 33, line 4, strike out the language "plumbers and steamfitters—1 $1,600, 1 $1,200."

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, these items were left in the bill through inadvertence. They were not estimated in the final totals.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office expenses: For purchase of new instruments (except surveying instruments), including their exchange, materials, equipment, and supplies required in the instrument shop, carpenter shop, and drawing division; books, scientific and technical books, journals, books of reference, maps, charts, and subscriptions; copper plates, chart paper, printer's ink, copper, zinc, and chemicals for electrotyping and photographing; engraving, printing, photographing, and electrotyping supplies; photolithographing charts and printing from stone and copper for immediate use; including the employment in the District of Columbia of such personal services other than clerical as may be necessary for the prompt preparation of charts, not to exceed $7,000; stationery for office and field parties; transportation of instruments and supplies when not charged to party expenses; office wagon and horses or automobile truck; heating, lighting, and power; telephones, including operation of switchboard; telegrams, ice, and washing; office furniture, repairs, traveling expenses of officers and others employed in the office sent on special duty in the service of the office; miscellaneous expenses, contingencies of all kinds, and not exceeding $4,000 for extra labor, $100,000.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. On page 20 of the report of the committee I find a summary. I would like to ask my colleague, who has this bill in charge, if the estimate for 1923, $29,638,687.75, was the estimate of the Director of the Budget, or was that the estimate of the head of the various bureaus?

Mr. SHREVE. It was the estimate of the Director of the Budget coming to us from the Budget.

Mr. SEARS. Can the gentleman give me the estimate requested by the various bureaus?

Mr. SHREVE. No; we have not that information.

Mr. SEARS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I find this bill carries, if I am correct, and if not correct I trust that the gentleman will correct me—the present bill carries an appropriation of $22,288,188.25 more than the bill for last year, and yet you have reduced the estimate of the Director of the Budget $4,308,603.75.

Mr. SHREVE. The difference comes in by reason of the appropriation of $1,250,000 for the Maternity Bureau or the Women's Bureau, and also the additional appropriation for the Census Bureau.

Mr. SEARS. I was not objecting to that. I simply wanted to get it clear in my mind. Much has been said about Congress saving money for the people because we cut down estimates. We had hoped that when we got the Director of the Budget—and I voted for the Budget system—it would not be necessary to cut down these estimates very materially. I want to congratulate the committee on their economy, although this is not a saving. So far as I recall nearly all bureaus have estimated for more than we have given them ever since I have been in Congress, and perhaps will continue to do so, so the claim of a saving to the people because we cut down estimates is not a saving as a matter of fact except on paper.

Mr. SHREVE. But there would have been a saving if we had not been obliged to appropriate for the items to which I have referred.

Mr. SEARS. The committee saving would have been very nice, but if you had appropriated what the Director of the Budget requested, $29,638,687.75, it would have been a material increase.

Mr. SHREVE. That is right.

Mr. SEARS. So we still have bureaus and the Director of the Budget asking for more than we believe they are entitled to.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS. Yes.

Mr. DUNBAR. The gentleman said that ever since he had been in Congress the bureaus had made greater estimates than were appropriated by Congress. How long has the gentleman been in Congress?

Mr. SEARS. Oh, not long enough, I trust; only about seven years.

Mr. DUNBAR. The longer the gentleman continues to serve as Congressman the better equipped he will become, and I hope his constituents will have the good judgment to have him for many years more to continue a Member of this body. But I wish to say to the gentleman that from the year 1896 to 1916, a period of 20 years, the estimates made by the President and the heads of the departments were but 3 per cent in excess of the appropriations, and that previous to 1916 it was not the practice of Congress to reduce greatly the appropriations from the estimates made by the departments.

Mr. SEARS. But they were in excess?

Mr. DUNBAR. About 3 per cent, and that amount is practically nil.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF FISHERIES.

Commissioner's office: Commissioner, $6,000; deputy commissioner, $3,500; assistants in charge of divisions—fish culture, $2,700; inquiry respecting food fishes, $2,700; fishery industries, $2,500; assistants—1 in charge of office, $2,500, 1 $2,500, 1 $2,400, 1 for developing fisheries and for saving and use of fishery products $2,400, 1 $2,220, 1 for fishery food laboratory $2,000, 1 $2,000, 1 $1,800, 1 $1,600, 2 at $1,200 each; fish pathologist, $2,500; architect and engineer, $2,200; assistant architect, $1,600; draftsman, $1,200; accountant, $2,100; librarian, $1,500; superintendent of fish distribution, $1,600; clerks—4 of class 4, 6 of class 3, 1 to commissioner, $1,600, 7 of class 2, 12 of class 1, 2 at $900 each (including 1 for Seattle office); statistical agents—1 $1,600, 2 at $1,400 each, 2 at $1,000 each; local agents—1 at Boston $600, 1 at Gloucester $600, 1 at Seattle $600; engineer, $1,080; 3 firemen, at $720 each; 2 watchmen, at $720 each; 5 janitors and messengers, at $720 each; janitress, $480; messenger boy, $360; 5 charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $114,840.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the language in line 11, page 34, "commissioner, $6,000," and I will state that the organic law, which has not been amended by any legislative act, provides a salary of $5,000. This salary has been carried in various appropriation bills for a number of years at $6,000. There is a vacancy in that office now. I believe the commissioner has resigned, and in view of that situation I think we might just as well have it understood that his successor is to get the salary that is allowed by law. I make the point of order against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that the salary of $6,000 provided for is not authorized by law.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. SHREVE. I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 34, line 11, after the word "commissioner," insert "$5,000."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Inquiry respecting food fishes: For inquiry into the causes of the decrease of food fishes in the waters of the United States, and for investigation and experiments in respect to the aquatic animals, plants, and waters, in the interests of fish culture and the fishery industries, including expenses of travel and preparation of reports, $45,000.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice that with reference to this bureau that the appropriation for the propagation of food fishes and for the maintenance of vessels have been cut quite materially, but when it comes to the scientific inquiry, which employs a number of scientists employed during the summer season, you have not reduced their appropriation at all. Now, of course, the work of the propagation of food fishes is a very valuable work for various sections of the country. Its value has been proven. I do not know whether that can be said in reference to some of these increases that are being made for the scientific bureaus. I just wondered how it was that in slicing the item for inquiry respecting food fishes was not also reduced somewhat?

Mr. SHREVE. I will say to the gentleman we had a considerable talk with the director regarding this subject, and I will say it was the policy of the committee more particularly to get more fish in the creeks. We wanted to raise fish. We are not so much interested in the research work and we are not so much interested in the propagation of food fishes. We were not interested in teaching women how to cook fish, because we thought they already understand it. These items came to us recommended by the Bureau of the Budget, and we feel that there will be some large saving in this item during next year.

Mr. WALSH. Apparently there is not going to be any saving on this item because you have given the same amount they had last year. Yet you have cut these other items.

Mr. SHREVE. There were a number of reasons they assigned for that. However, upon more serious consideration I think they will not use all the money.

Mr. WALSH. If they are not going to use all the money, why not reduce the item?

Mr. SHREVE. The trouble is I would not know just how to reduce it. It means the elimination of some certain things, and at the present time I would not like to do it.

Mr. WALSH. I would say to the gentleman it would mean the elimination of the employment of some scientific gentlemen who conduct experiments and inquiries that have been made over and over again for the last 25 years. They have just about time to undertake this inquiry and bring it up to a point where previous investigators have brought it, when it is time for them to quit and return to their school or college for the fall term. Now, if they are going to make any cut in this work, I think that that particular appropriation could be very well reduced, whereas the appropriation for the propagation of food fishes could be very well kept at the amount hitherto carried in the bill. I was wondering if the gentleman would have any objection, in view of the fact that they have reduced these other items, to reducing this by $5,000?

Mr. SHREVE. We have already cut, I will say, under the current law, and we would rather this appropriation should stand for the present. It is not a very large item.

Mr. WALSH. You have not cut any on this item.

Mr. SHREVE. Not on this item, but $25,000 under the current law.

Mr. WALSH. The sundry civil bill last year carried $45,000 for inquiry respecting food fishes and for investigation and experiments in respect to aquatic animals and plants. That is the same amount.

Mr. SHREVE. I thought you were talking about the propagation part.

Mr. WALSH. No, sir. The propagation, as I stated, has been cut $25,000, but the scientific inquiry, referred to on page 43, lines 3 to 8, has not been reduced at all, and I believe if you are going to get practical work in propagating and replenishing fish supplies you might cut the scientific work. A lot of men are just running around in circles at a lot of scientific institutions maintained by this department and they are not progressing with these inquiries to any extent at all. Now, a few of them are doing very valuable work, but if you are to cut down on the appropriation for replenishing the supply of fish and lobsters, shellfish, and other fish, I think it is only fair that you should also cut down on scientific work. It has been my observation that since the days when our distinguished colleague [Mr. BOWERS] was fish commissioner the work of this bureau has been diverted more along scientific inquiry and that the actual fish-hatching operations and replenishing of the supply of fish by these various hatcheries throughout the country has been sacrificed in order that a lot of scientific pamphlets and works might be compiled and distributed. And I would like to see, as long as we are reducing this bureau, that we make a cut in the scientific branch as well.

Mr. SHREVE. In reply to the gentleman I will say that we made a cut of $5,000. The estimate for 1923 was $50,000, and the appropriation for 1922 was $45,000. And it seems to have run along at $45,000 for a number of years. However, with the gentleman's knowledge of conditions of this department, if he feels we ought to make a slight cut we will consent to it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out "$45,000" and insert "$40,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WALSH: Page 43, line 8, strike out "$45,000" and insert "$40,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may be authorized to correct the totals.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Expenses of advisory committee: For expenses of an advisory committee of not to exceed two members from the Atlantic coast, two members from the Pacific coast, and four members from the inland waters, Great Lakes, and Alaskan sections of the United States, to be designated from time to time by the Secretary of Commerce, to consist of men prominently identified with the various branches of the fishery industry, qualified in aquatic research, and experienced in fish culture, who shall visit the Bureau of Fisheries at such times as the Secretary of Commerce may deem necessary and report to the Secretary of Commerce on the condition and needs of the service, the members to serve without compensation, but to be paid the actual expenses incurred in attending the meetings, $2,500.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. What authority is there for carrying such an item as this?

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, this item was first carried in the appropriation for the deficiency, approved June 16, 1921.

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. SHREVE. And they ask to have it continued.

Mr. WALSH. This is another one of those activities for which the present Secretary of Commerce is noted; that of having conferences or advisory committees or commissions, gatherings of people who get together and discuss and talk over matters, and issue a report and go home and forget all about it until some Government publication is printed, sometimes out of the congressional printing fund, telling of the wonderful accomplishments of such meetings.

Now, I do not quite understand why it is necessary to have a few members from various coast and inland waters designated from time to time to visit the Bureau of Fisheries and report on the conditions and needs of the service. If the Secretary of Commerce and the men who are being paid a salary are not competent and qualified to tell what the service needs, then we ought to displace them. I will venture the assertion that they know as much about it as people who have never visited the bureau before, and who come down here with some ideas which, after they get here, will not be of any particular benefit. The fact that these members serve without compensation is no justification. I do not think there is any need now, while we are proceeding along the pathway back to normalcy, we hope, of continuing in this bureau this advisory committee. If we have it here, why not have it for the Lighthouse Bureau or the Coast and Geodetic Service, which we recently put in uniform, with commissioned officers, salaries, and retirement pay?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. In view of the suggestion which has been made by somebody to the effect that the Commissioner of Fisheries does not know a great deal about the subject, does not the gentleman think it advisable to have the advisory committee come and inform him?

Mr. WALSH. Well, if we could be sure that we would get an advisory committee that would know something about it, that might be a good suggestion. But the chances are that this advisory committee will consist of two either near Democrats or real Democrats from the Pacific coast, and four almost Democrats or very nearly Democrats from the inland waters, the Great Lakes and Alaska, and two fair-weather Republicans or once-in-a-while Republicans from the Atlantic coast to tell the Commissioner of Fisheries how to run his bureau.

Now, I feel that the indications are, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] indicates, that there may be a new commissioner appointed. Strenuous efforts are being made by certain interests, I will say, to have a Commissioner of Fisheries appointed who will be subservient to the requirements of those interests, and I fear that if the person who will be responsible for recommending the appointment shall also be permitted to recommend the advisory commission, you might find the whole shooting match turned over to those people who are so interested in getting that appointment. I therefore feel constrained to make the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman reserve it for a moment?

Mr. WALSH. I will reserve it in order to permit the distinguished member of the committee from Wisconsin to propound an inquiry, and attempt to answer.

Mr. STAFFORD. I accept the invitation following the last "and."

Mr. Chairman, the department in its activities calls together from time to time the heads of divisions and field officers, as in the Lighthouse Service, from year to year, to pass upon the needs of the service in the field. The National Government maintains a great number of fish-hatching stations throughout the country, supplementing in many instances those of the States. It is impossible for the Commissioner of Fisheries to be acquainted with the details concerning the activities of the various hatcheries throughout the country. Here is a small amount of $2,500. The maximum payment to each of these persons would be only $310, including car fare, which can not be considered a large expense, whereby the Commissioner of Fisheries would become acquainted officially with the actual conditions of the fish industry throughout the country.

I wish to propound this question to the gentleman: Whether he does not believe, when we are spending hundreds of thousands of dollars in the maintenance of fish hatcheries throughout the country, that the expenditure of $2,500 should not be continued, when the Commissioner of Fisheries will be able to get the first-hand information, perhaps from men connected with State fish hatchery establishments, to determine the policy as to what should be done throughout the country?

In connection with this question, I recall a visit last summer to the United States fish hatchery at Lake Orchard, in the vicinity of Detroit. There was no activity at all there that could be seen in the propagation of fishes; certainly nothing in comparison with the activity of a State fish hatchery located 25 miles from my home city.

That fact certainly can be brought to the attention of the Commissioner of Fisheries. There is no field inspectional force now provided to acquaint the commissioner here of conditions in the field generally. Could not $2,500 be well expended when we are spending hundreds of thousands of dollars for the maintenance of these fish hatcheries under Government control?

Mr. WALSH. I dislike to delay the proceedings, but I find it particularly difficult to know where the gentleman's inquiry left off and his somewhat rambling observations began. [Laughter.] However, I will state that $38,200 is carried in this bill for the Alaska service, and $22,820 for employees at large, and adequate sums for assistants and station superintendents and scientific experts and fish culturists and various other field officers, and this item of $2,500 is to call in a lot of men not connected with the Government, and just as likely as not they will be the heads of some fish-canning or fish-packing establishments who will come down here and tell the commissioner what he ought to do in Alaska with reference to the hatching of salmon up there, and how they should be canned and put upon the market.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield in that particular?

Mr. WALSH. While this is only $2,500, it is true, nevertheless it will establish a precedent so that probably we shall have recommendations from another department that there shall be a committee of two or four or six or eight citizens to come to Washington to tell the head of the Children's Bureau how she should expend the $1,240,000 for maternity welfare work, and we might want to spend $2,500 to provide traveling expenses for people to suggest how the Bureau of Navigation or the Bureau of Standards should conduct its work. I make the point of order. I am not convinced by the appealing suggestions of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes a point of order. The Chair believes that it is conceded that there is no authorization for the item in question. The point of order is sustained. The item goes out. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY.

Salaries: Secretary of Labor, $12,000; Assistant Secretary, $5,000; chief clerk, $3,000; disbursing clerk, $3,000; private secretary to the Secretary, $2,500; clerk to the Secretary, $1,800; private secretary to the Assistant Secretary, $2,100; chief of division of publications and supplies, $2,500; appointment clerk, $2,100; deputy disbursing clerk, $2,100; assistant chief, division of publications and supplies, $2,000; librarian, $2,000; clerks—4 of class 4, 11 of class 3, 9 of class 2, 13 of class 1, 9 at $1,000 each, 4 at $900 each; 3 telephone switchboard operators, at $720 each; 2 messengers, at $840 each; 5 assistant messengers, at $720 each; 5 messenger boys, at $480 each; carpenter, $1,200; engineer, $1,100; 2 skilled laborers, at $840 each; electrician, $1,000; 3 firemen, at $720 each; 11 laborers, at $660 each (1 of whom, when necessary, shall assist and relieve the elevator conductor); Lieutenant of the watch, $840; 6 watchmen, at $720 each; 13 charwomen, at $240 each; 3 elevator conductors, at $720 each; in all, $140,380.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I would like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee a question in reference to the paragraph. There appears to be no provision for the Solicitor of the Department of Labor who, under the law, acts as Acting Secretary. I am wondering just where that position is carried. There is certainly a Solicitor of the Department of Labor who acts as the Acting Secretary in the absence of the Secretary.

Mr. SHREVE. I had a little talk this morning with the Secretary of Labor over some legislation that he desired in the appropriation bill. I explained to him very carefully that we could not legislate, and suggested that he take the matter up with the lawyers of his department, stating that I would be very glad to assist in the preparation of a bill in accordance with their recommendations. The Secretary informed me that they did not have a lawyer. I find in the Department of Labor, however, a solicitor and a law clerk and several subordinate clerks, and they are appropriated for under the Department of Justice.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. That is what I can not understand. Under the new system under which we are supposed to be operating it was supposed that all appropriations for each department would come to the House in one bill, so that we would know what each department would cost.

Mr. SHREVE. I will say to the gentleman that that is the intention of the Budget law. But there are a few odds and ends that have not been picked up yet. It is a big proposition. It is something that is taxing the ingenuity of all the men who are interested, and we are bringing these things to a focus, and I think next year we will find this in our bill where it properly belongs.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I am glad to hear that, because it does seem to me that the law clerks and law officers who spend all of their time in a department, and the solicitor who acts as Acting Secretary in the absence of the Secretary, that their salaries certainly should be charged up against the Department of Labor and not carried in the Department of Justice.

Mr. SHREVE. I think the gentleman is entirely correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. What authority has the gentleman for saying that the Solicitor for the Department of Labor acts for the Secretary of Labor in the absence of the Secretary from his office?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. That is my understanding of the way the law reads, that the solicitor of the department shall be the Acting Secretary in the absence of the Secretary.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was under the impression and had been told by Assistant Secretaries of the departments that in the absence of the Secretary the Assistant Secretary was the Acting Secretary.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. That has not been my experience, because under the previous administration I was down there on several different occasions, and talked with Mr. Abercrombie, who was the solicitor, and who signed documents as the Acting Secretary, while the Assistant Secretary was in the city and in the building.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Printing and binding: For printing and binding for Department of Labor, $200,000.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making an inquiry in reference to the appropriation for the printing and binding for the Department of Labor, $200,000. I have looked over the hearings on this matter and it seems to me that the department did not make out a very strong case for continuation of the same amount this year that they had last year. As a general proposition, we are trying to decrease most of these appropriations, and it seemed to me that this was an item that could have been pared down a certain amount and still have met all the necessary requirements of the department.

Mr. SHREVE. I will say, in reply to the gentleman, that the estimate made by the Bureau of the Budget for printing and binding for the Department of Labor was $250,000. That was the same amount that they had in 1921. For the year 1922 the appropriation was reduced to $200,000, and we thought conditions were possibly about the same as during this fiscal year, so we allowed them the same amount of money.

I should like to add that the Department of Labor seems to be struggling along and doing as good work as it can on limited appropriations. There is need for another Assistant Secretary. The Secretary should be given another man who can do the same work that he is doing. There is a mountain of work piled up on his desk. All these deportation matters, all the appeals from Ellis Island, are stacked up, and it seems that nobody has authority to sign except the Secretary and the Assistant Secretary. There is a great deal of legislation that should be enacted in order to clear up this whole situation. Possibly when that is done we may take into consideration this question of printing; but they assured us that they needed the money, and, inasmuch as it was the same amount that they had in the last appropriation, we concluded to give it to them.

Mr. SNELL. I appreciate the fact that it is the same amount that they had last year; but when the policy of Congress has been, as far as possible, to decrease all these appropriations for printing and binding for the different departments, it seemed to me that they did not make out a very strong case, and that it would not have done any harm to have cut this appropriation a certain amount at this time.

Mr. SHREVE. They assured us that they had reached about the bottom level. There is a necessity for certain publications that they are sending out now. There is a feeling that there are better employment conditions just ahead of us. Manufacturers and laboring men are making use of these various activities, and they felt that it would be a great mistake to retard their work by limiting this appropriation at this time.

Mr. SNELL. On page 898 of the hearings there is a statement about a request for 10,000,000 dodgers to be spread about the country in connection with the child-welfare campaign. Is there any real necessity for that? Is there any real good coming from it?

Mr. SHREVE. I am unable to inform the gentleman. That is just simply a statement made in the hearings.

Mr. SNELL. I noticed that they did not make out very much of a case, and I was wondering if they could not get along if we cut out those things. The fact that they have had them is no reason for continuing them forever, when we are trying as a general proposition to cut down Government expenditures. Does not the gentleman think we could cut this item for printing and binding $25,000 this year, and that it would have a beneficial effect on the general printing and binding proposition in the various departments?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. I want to say that the receipts of the Department of Labor are about $7,000,000, and as a business proposition I think it is a good thing to encourage them; that is, the amount of receipts turned over to the Treasury—about $7,000,000.

Mr. SNELL. Has that anything to do with the printing and binding?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Some of it; yes.

Mr. MANN. It is the Immigration Service that turns in that money.

Mr. SNELL. I do not see why we should spend any more money than is necessary just because the department is turning some money into the Treasury. That does not appeal to me from that standpoint.

Mr. SHREVE. We feel that we should appropriate a sufficient sum so that they can get along, so that it will not be necessary to come in with a deficiency. By referring back the gentleman will see that they had a deficiency of $50,000, and we feel that we ought not to cripple the department.

Mr. SNELL. I agree with the gentleman that we ought not to cripple the department, but it does not seem to me that they made a very strong case before the committee in regard to the absolute necessity of having this amount of money. They refer to various pamphlets, but they do not show any real necessity for them. What would be the effect if we cut it down to $175,000?

Mr. SHREVE. It might seriously cripple the department, and I should rather not do it. I feel that they are entitled to this amount, and it is the same amount that they had last year.

Mr. SNELL. But we are trying to decrease and cut down these appropriations, and this is a good place to begin.

Mr. SHREVE. The gentleman knows that oftentimes the hearings do not disclose the whole situation.

Mr. SNELL. I appreciate that, and that is why I am willing to yield to the chairman's judgment.

Mr. SHREVE. I really feel that it would be a serious mistake to interfere with the work of the Department of Labor. They are crippled enough now; they are in a serious condition; and I wish there was some way that we could relieve them under this appropriation bill. We can not increase salaries and we can not create new statutory provisions. Then, I think it would further embarrass them if we should cut down this appropriation, and I hope the gentleman will not press it.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Per diem in lieu of subsistence not exceeding $4 of special agents, and employees, and for their transportation; experts and temporary assistance for field service outside of the District of Columbia, to be paid at the rate of not exceeding $8 per day; temporary statistical clerks, stenographers, and typewriters in the District of Columbia, to be selected from civil-service registers and to be paid at the rate of not exceeding $100 per month, the same person to be employed for not more than six consecutive months, the total expenditure for such temporary clerical assistance in the District of Columbia not to exceed $60,000; traveling expenses of officers and employees, purchase of reports and materials for reports and bulletins of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, $60,000.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the subcommittee what is the meaning of this prohibition contained in lines 17 and 18 that certain employees are not to be employed for more than six consecutive months?

Mr. DICKINSON. These are temporary employees taken into the service.

Mr. LONDON. But they have been in the service six months now?

Mr. DICKINSON. Oh, no; this is where they are employed under an authorization for six months. We have only the right to employ them six months, and by that time they get over the peak of the load.

Mr. LONDON. What are their duties; what do they do?

Mr. DICKINSON. It is in the matter of the compilation of statistics and getting out different data which the Labor Bureau collects.

Mr. LONDON. And they are employed at only certain periods of the year?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes; during the peak periods of the year.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Regulating immigration: For enforcement of the laws regulating immigration of aliens into the United States, including the contract labor laws; cost of reports of decisions of the Federal courts, and digests thereof, for the use of the Commissioner General of Immigration; salaries and expenses of all officers, clerks, and employees appointed to enforce said laws, including per diem in lieu of subsistence when allowed pursuant to section 13 of the sundry civil appropriation act approved August 1, 1914; enforcement of the provisions of the act of February 5, 1917, entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States," and acts amendatory thereof; necessary supplies, including exchange of typewriting machines, alterations and repairs, and for all other expenses authorized by said act; preventing the unlawful entry of Chinese into the United States, by the appointment of suitable officers to enforce the laws in relation thereto; expenses of returning to China all Chinese persons found to be unlawfully in the United States, including the cost of imprisonment and actual expenses of conveyance of Chinese persons to the frontier or seaboard for deportation; refunding of head tax and maintenance bills upon presentation of evidence showing conclusively that collection was made through error of Government officers; all to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of Labor, $3,300,000: Provided, That the purchase, exchange, use, maintenance, and operation of horse and motor vehicles required in the enforcement of the immigration and Chinese exclusion laws outside of the District of Columbia may be contracted for and the cost thereof paid from the appropriation for the enforcement of those laws, under such terms and conditions as the Secretary of Labor may prescribe: Provided further, That not more than $12,000 of the sum appropriated herein may be expended in the purchase and maintenance of such motor vehicles: Provided further, That the appropriation herein made for the enforcement of the immigration laws shall be available for carrying out the provisions of the act entitled "An act to exclude and expel from the United States aliens who are members of the anarchistic and similar classes," approved October 16, 1918, and acts amendatory thereof.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In connection with this appropriation I would like to ask the chairman how it compares with the amount requested by the Immigration Service at the hearing before the committee.

Mr. SHREVE. I will say that the estimate was $4,055,632.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Where were the substantial cuts made?

Mr. SHREVE. The bureau made the cut itself. They cut it to $3,300,000. It is in the deportation service mainly, and at present the Chinese seamen are giving the bureau a great deal of trouble; they come in with a seaman's card, and they are entitled to 60 days, and after being here they shortly disappear. I do not think this is in excess of what it should be.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I feel certain of that. Is the gentleman of the opinion that the Immigration Bureau feels that with the extension of the 3 per cent law that this will properly care for their needs during this year?

Mr. SHREVE. I will quote from Mr. Husband at the hearing:

Mr. HUSBAND. I will explain why the estimates may be reduced. When these estimates were made it was impossible to forecast what immigration in 1923 would be, as the quota law expires on June 30. The present indications are that the laws will be continued along substantially the same lines. That being the case, it seemed unfair to come here and ask for money on any other basis.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. That answers the question. But does the gentleman know whether the Department of Labor has made any request or recommendation to Congress for the repeal of the provision of the La Follette Seaman's Act, which makes it possible for the entry into the country of seamen who stay 60 days, and then, in some way, remain the rest of the time?

Mr. SHREVE. No; I think the Department of Labor has not considered that item, although there was much legislation that they wanted in this appropriation bill. There was so much that they are entitled to and that the committee wanted to give them, but we were powerless, our hands were tied, and we have recommended them to employ a lawyer to draft a bill and then come into the House with the bill taking care of these needs. I presume the matter that the gentleman mentions will come with it.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. It is my understanding that the La Follette Seaman's Act was placed on the statute book largely through the instrumentality and backing of the Department of Labor. Now, we find the department in this situation: Some years back they proposed a law which at the present time is handicapping them in the enforcement of the immigration law, which is under their jurisdiction.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the department charged with the enforcement of the immigration service ought to go before Congress, or a committee of Congress, and request a modification of this La Follette Seaman's Act. It certainly is a strange situation if we are to have a law on the statute books which permits 2,000 Chinese seamen every year to come into this country when we are spending thousands of dollars to keep them out.

The Clerk read as follows:

For traveling expenses and per diem in lieu of subsistence at not exceeding $4 of officers, special agents, and other employees of the Children's Bureau; experts and temporary assistants, to be paid at a rate not exceeding $6 a day, and interpreters to be paid at a rate not exceeding $4 a day when actually employed; purchase of reports and material for the publications of the Children's Bureau, newspapers and clippings to enable the Children's Bureau to secure data regarding the progress of legislation affecting children and the activities of public and private organizations dealing with children, and for reprints from State, city, and private publications for distribution when said reprints can be procured more cheaply than they can be printed by the Government, $85,000.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word to ask the committee a question. I notice in line 4, on page 54, a provision for newspapers and clippings to enable the Children's Bureau to secure data, and so forth. There does not seem to be any limitation upon the amount that might be expended there.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the inquiry I would say that under their estimate of 1922 they have spent $850 for that item, and in view of the fact that we have allowed the same amount of appropriation for this year, the item will be the same amount for this year. To the committee it seemed that that was a reasonable amount for the collection of these data and clippings, and for that reason we have not put any limitation upon that.

Mr. FESS. I agree that if they are not spending more than that, that is very reasonable. I thought that was a blanket authority, and that it might be abused, but the past experience is that it has not been abused.

Mr. DICKINSON. It has not been abused.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in view of the ability of my friend from Iowa to give the amount expended on particular items in this paragraph, I am going to ask him if he can give another. How much is expended, or has been, for the purchase of private prints or documents to circulate among the people?

Mr. DICKINSON. Here are two items which might be included in that. One is reprints, $150, and periodicals, $850. Those are the only items, it seems to me, that could possibly be included.

Mr. MANN. That would be the reprints.

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That I am asking about.

The Clerk read as follows:

Promotion of the welfare and hygiene of maternity and infancy: For carrying out the provisions of the act entitled "An act for the promotion of the welfare and hygiene of maternity and infancy, and for other purposes," approved November 23, 1921, $1,240,000.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 54, by striking out all of lines 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15, being the provisions for carrying out the so-called maternity act.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Delaware offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LAYTON: Page 54, line 11, strike out all of lines 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including therein an address by Gov. Nathan Miller, of New York, recently made before the New York Bar Association, together with certain extracts from newspapers published in Boston and New York City.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Delaware asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I am fully aware of the fact that the motion I have just made will not prevail. I do not delude myself with the belief that any word I may utter will break the bonds that bind this Ephraim to his idol.

My purpose is to call attention again in this most public way to my opposition to this measure and to protest as earnestly as I can against the iniquity of appropriating for a wholly unnecessary purpose more than a million and a half of dollars at a time when the whole country is crying out against the prostrating burden of taxation. I feel it my duty as a Republican, but equally as much as a citizen, to do all I can against this and all other appropriations growing solely out of socialistic purposes.

I ask you again to consider not alone your assault upon the Constitution, but your own security in the coming campaign.

The propaganda that induced you to vote for the maternity bill was not the call of the people. That propaganda was composed of those who were selfishly seeking a new bureau under the Government, openly socialistic in character, for the purpose of making possible innumerable places under the Government, accompanied by salaries, and club women inspired more by tender sentiment than by good hard sense and the realization of the effect of the bill upon the future of our country.

In my judgment you will find that not all of the women are for this measure, nor even a considerable part of them, when they have the opportunity, as they will have between this and November, to consult with their husbands, their fathers, and brothers. You will find that not all of the fine womanhood of America is in the women's club. As I have said before, while speaking upon this measure, the wife of America is a loyal, loving partner of her husband, and is equally interested in and concerned with his welfare. What he suffers she suffers. His burdens are her burdens. If he is borne down with hard and unnecessary taxation, she feels it, and knows that it will affect not only her husband and herself but her children also. This is true as well of the daughter, the sister, everywhere in the land. They are crying out with the same loud voice for relief from unnecessary burden as is the husband, the father, and the brother. When voting time comes watch out for the silent vote of both men and women who will condemn you for the one mission with which they clothed you, the one plain mandate with which they charged you—to reduce taxation by cutting out every penny of useless expenditure.

Already the passage of this bill is arousing the greatest apprehension throughout the country as an open and deadly attack upon constitutional rights. Ever since the bill was passed I have been in receipt of widespread commendation from all parts of the country for my attitude upon this measure. Thousands of copies of my speech have been asked for way beyond any means that I possess to supply them. These commendations have come from all sorts and conditions of men and women representing all sorts of associations and societies as well as of individuals of a high and low degree. But I will not take more time upon the subject. I have already spoken at length upon the matter on two separate occasions, in such a way to leave at least no doubt about my attitude upon it. But in order to emphasize what I have before said I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Record as a part of my remarks some excerpts taken from an address recently delivered before the State Bar Association of New York on this subject by the eminent governor of that State, Nathan L. Miller; and also excerpts from five editorials on the subject of bureaucracy taken, respectively, from the New York Tribune, January 16, 1922; the Boston Herald, January 21, 1922; and the New York Times, January 24, 1922; the Boston Herald, February 3, 1922; the Fall River News, February 18, 1922.

GOV. MILLER ATTACKS FEDERAL "WELFARE" PROGRAM—NEW YORK EXECUTIVE TELLS STATE BAR ASSOCIATION THAT SHEPPARD-TOWNER BABY ACT VIOLATES CONSTITUTION.

Another distinguished statesman has added the weight of his courage and leadership to the people's fight to maintain local self-government against bureaucratic despotism. Gov. Nathan L. Miller, of New York, in his speech January 21 to the New York State Bar Association, condemned the Sheppard-Towner baby act as a violation of the United States Constitution. He declared that the enumerated powers of Congress under the authority of article 1, section 8, "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," did not include the practice of medicine or midwifery. He said that Congress under the guise of "Federal aid" might seek to control education and gradually extend Federal supervision over every State activity, destroying local initiative, self-reliance, and capacity for self-government. His address, in part, follows:

"With the power to collect three-fourths of the Federal revenue from 10 States, as is now done," the governor said, "it requires no imagination to foresee the riot of extravagance into which the Federal Government will be plunged if Congress has the power to appropriate the public money for whatever it considers to be in the public interest."

"Our system of government is built upon the bedrock of local self-government. Whatever impairs the energy, the initiative, the effectiveness, if you please, of State and local government of purely State and local affairs tends to destroy the capacity of our people for self-government and to undermine our governmental structure."

The governor said he did not criticize the expansion of the Federal power in connection with the regulation of foreign and interstate commerce and did not challenge the power conferred by Congress upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to regulate intrastate rates, because he considered this method more effective. He also said that he had no quarrel with the virtual repeal of the constitutional provision relating to the laying of direct taxes only in proportion to the population because necessity might have compelled that course.

"Now," he continued, "a discovery appears to have been made by Congress of a new and hitherto undreamed of power to legislate on any subject which it deems to involve the general welfare, and under that interpretation it has recently passed the so-called Sheppard-Towner law 'to promote the welfare and hygiene of maternity and infancy.' Under that law the health department of every State may be brought under the supervision of a Federal department of health."

"Under the guise of extending Federal aid to education, it is next proposed to subject the educational systems of the States to similar Federal supervision, and if that tendency is not checked we may expect the gradual extension of Federal supervision over every State activity, for the passion to regulate and the appetite for place and power will grow by what they feed on, and just as rapidly as we build up a bureaucratic system at Washington and accustom our people to lean on the Federal Government, just so rapidly shall we destroy local enterprise, local initiative, individual self-reliance, and our capacity for self-government."

"This extension of Federal power will be urged, as it has been begun for worthy objects, at the insistence of worthy people, and will result as similar efforts already tried have resulted—in the great waste of public funds and in the creation of expensive and well-nigh useless governmental agencies, both State and Federal."

"I have no quarrel with the object sought by the sponsors of the Sheppard-Towner bill. We passed an act in this State last winter empowering localities to provide prenatal and maternity care. That work can only be done effectively and economically by local agencies, public or private, and the will to do it, if it is to accomplish any good, must spring from local spirit and enterprise, which can not be created by a Federal bureau."

"It is to my mind a cause for misgiving that the exercise of such power appears to pass with little or no effective challenge, either within or without the Congress. The time has arrived to call a halt, to ask every patriotic citizen who loves our country and cherishes its institutions to take note of the goal to which the course upon which we have entered will inevitably lead."

Since Gov. Miller's speech a number of great newspapers have come out editorially against Federal encroachments. To those who, for more than a year, the fight for "home rule" and local self-government has been an uphill struggle against entrenched Federal bureaus, thoroughly organized propaganda in newspapers and magazines, and constant distortion or suppression of the facts and principles involved, Gov. Miller's revival of the greatest political issue in America to-day—the survival or destruction of individual and local rights—will be at once an encouragement and an inspiration to further effort.

[From the New York Tribune, Jan. 16.]

IMITATING RUSSIA.

That the United States is in danger of becoming another Russia of the czars through the multiplication and extension of governmental bureaus, with hordes of officials, is the opinion of Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University, contained in the annual report of that institution for 1921.

This view is expressed in discussing the proposed Federal standardization of education.

"One of the most noteworthy of recent developments in American life," said Dr. Butler, "is the zeal with which machinery is designed and built ostensibly to serve various public interests and undertakings, but in reality to control them. Perhaps in no other way is the decline of faith in liberty so clearly marked. An academic wit once defined good administration as 'the doing extremely well of that which should not be done at all.' If this clever phrase is to be applied to public administration, it would have to be altered so as to read, 'the doing ill of that which should not be done at all'; for public administration, administration by collective authority, is almost uniformly inefficient and for an obvious reason. In such case artificial choice takes the place of natural selection in the designation of agents, and since nature is wiser than man, particularly political man, efficiency at once declines."

DEFIANCE OF IDEALS.

"In the United States we are, in that defiance of all our proclaimed principles and ideals, building a series of bureaucracies that will put to shame the best efforts of the Government of the Czar of all Russias when in the heyday of its glory."

"We are surrounded by agents, special agents, inspectors, and spies, and the people are called upon to support through their taxes in harmful and un-American activities whole armies of individuals who should be engaged in productive industry. When anything appears to go wrong, or when any desirable movement seems to lag, a cry goes up for the creation of some new board or commission and for an appropriation of public funds to maintain it in reasonable comfort."

"An infinite number of blank forms must be filled out and an infinite number of records must be kept, classified, and audited at steadily mounting cost."

"For a long time the excellent limitations of the American form of Federal Government held these movements in check, so far as the National Government itself was concerned. When, however, the ingenious discovery was made that the National Government might aid the States to do what lay within their province but was denied to the National Government itself, the door was opened to a host of schemes. These have followed each other in rapid succession, all urged with a certain amount of plausibility and with an appeal to kindly sentiment, usually supported by vigorous propaganda and zealous paid agents."

TOO MANY PRECISE LAWS.

"So far as education is concerned, there has been overorganization for a long time past. Too many persons are engaged in supervising, in inspecting, and in recording the work of other persons. There is too much machinery, and in consequence a steady temptation to lay more stress upon the form of education than upon its content. Statistics displace scholarship. There are, in addition, too many laws and too precise laws, and not enough opportunity for those mistakes and failures, due to individual initiative and experiment, which are the foundation for great and lasting success."

"It is now proposed to bureaucratize and bring into uniformity the educational system of the whole United States, while making the most solemn assurance that nothing of the kind is intended. The glory and the successes of education in the United States are due to its freedom, to its unevenness, to its reflection of the needs and ambitions and capacities of local communities, and to its being kept in close and constant touch with the people themselves."

STOP—LOOK—LISTEN!

The Massachusetts Legislature is asked to hurry through a bill accepting the terms of the Sheppard-Towner law entitled "An act for the promotion of the welfare and hygiene of maternity and infancy, and for other purposes."

The legislature ought to go very slow in giving its adherence to that law. There are two distinct problems involved in this legislation.

The real question is not one with regard to the protection of maternity—that is a question which may very well be left with the mothers, the nurses, and the physicians of the Commonwealth. It is ufficiently comprehensive in itself. Let the State of Massachusetts in its wisdom after full consideration and deliberation determine it, without regard to anything that Congress may have done.

But when it comes to the State of Massachusetts accepting the Sheppard-Towner bill in any form, then those who still believe in our constitutional form of government should stop and look and listen—for this is a question involving the very perpetuity of our American form of government. Whatever its merits may be as a measure for the bettering of citizenship, the bill as it stands finds its justification only in a strained construction of the general welfare clause of the Constitution contained in the first paragraph of section 8 of article 1—a paragraph which by every consideration of common sense relates solely to the purpose for which "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises." The other powers of Congress as distinct from the powers reserved to the States are enumerated in following paragraphs, showing the plain intention of the constitutional convention and the States which accepted the Constitution to differentiate between these functions.

If the interpretation of the general welfare clause under which the Sheppard-Towner bill is assumed to be constitutional and by which alone it can be excused, then there is no legislation whatever which Congress does not have the power to enact without regard to the reserved rights of the States and without regard to the rights of individual citizens of the State. If such an interpretation is to be given to this clause, then it would not have been necessary to say anything whatever in the Constitution about the powers of Congress as differentiated from the powers reserved to the legislatures of the States. Congress would be a law unto itself, and whatever at any particular moment might be regarded by a majority in Congress as conducive to the general welfare would be permissible. It would not be necessary to go through the slow process of constitutional amendment in order to give the Federal Government additional power.

Under such an interpretation of the clause it is quite conceivable that Congress, in a burst of welfare enthusiasm, might enact a law determining how many times on Sunday every citizen of the United States should go to church. It might enact a law prohibiting football, baseball, or tennis in any State; could regulate the height of buildings or church spires in Boston or Great Barrington; prescribe what business is lawful or unlawful; what any man or woman shall eat, or wear; regulate dancing, music, and the theater. It might enact a law deciding how much rent a landlord could properly ask of his tenant, or whether a citizen who happened to have a town house and a country house should live in one or the other and turn the vacant house over to public use. We have gone so far along these lines now that it is almost impossible to conceive any length to which we may not be driven. If the tendency is to be stopped, it must be stopped now.

If the voice of Massachusetts is ever to be heard in opposition to this socialistic and paternalistic tendency, now is the time for her to speak, and she can speak effectively just now by a refusal to accept the Sheppard-Towner Act. The question of the constitutionality of this act is still to come before the Supreme Court. It will be argued there by able lawyers, who have a profound love for the American form of government, with its system of checks and balances and its preservation of the individuality of the States. Should Massachusetts, simply because the act has passed Congress under pressure, even though in emasculated form, accept the act as an accomplished thing without regard to its constitutionality—or unconstitutionality—and simply for the purpose of obtaining the small Government appropriation involved, enact legislation along the Federal lines, subjecting to Federal approval the regulations it must adopt, it will be a hard blow at the men and women who are trying to neutralize the insidious trend toward socialism which is now sedulously working through Russian and German bolshevistic channels—and there is plenty of evidence that the Sheppard-Towner bill, with its intimations of birth control, was inspired originally by Russian propaganda.

If every other State in the Union were to accept the Sheppard-Towner bill—and apparently New York and other States will repudiate it—then at least Massachusetts should stand out until after the constitutionality of the law shall have been tested in the Federal Supreme Court. There is no reason why she should blindly rush along with the crowd. Let us take time to think.

FEDERAL MIDWIFERY.

Gov. Miller can't find among the enumerated powers of Congress "to provide for the common defense and general welfare" the power to engage in the "practice of medicine or midwifery." The sociologists and Socialists, the sentimentalists, universal meddlers, and place hunters who forced the passage of the Sheppard-Towner law "to promote the welfare and hygiene of maternity and infancy" successfully maintained the highly modern and expensive theory that Congress has the power to legislate in regard to anything which a minority can persuade or bulldoze it into believing to involve the general welfare. Well, if the Constitution is illimitably elastic, let us look at some of the "benefits" that this particular application of its elasticity would confer upon the happy citizens of New York.

This law authorizes a total appropriation of $1,480,000 for the current fiscal year and an appropriation of $1,240,000 for each of the five years thereafter. So insistent is Congress on economy, Senator BORAH said, in his rude reactionary way, that "very little of the appropriation will get further than to take care of the additional officers and salaries which it will require." That is a bilious and unworthy view. Shall we reject the blessings proffered us? States that cooperate with the Federal Government in promoting the welfare and hygiene of maternity and infancy will get $10,000 the first year and $5,000 a year subsequently. An additional $5,000 will be paid to States appropriating the same sum, and $710,000 a year will be distributed among the States on the basis of population, provided the amounts thus allotted are "matched" by State appropriation.

The State of New York pays nearly 25 per cent of all the internal-revenue tax collected. If each of the 48 States accepts the invitation to cooperate with the Federal Government at $10,000 a State, New York will have to pay something over $117,000 of the $480,000. Of the $1,000,000 appropriated under the maternity bill New York will have to pay nearly $245,000. That makes New York's bill something over $362,000. But suppose that she tries to "match" appropriations with a benevolent paternal-maternal Government? Her Federal allotment on the basis of population would be $75,000; but to get it she must "match" it with $75,000 out of her own pocket. Add this to $362,000 and you have the pleasing total of $437,000.

Attractive scheme, isn't it? Bureaucrats must live and travel. What hospitals, what institutions, what new means and machinery for the care of infancy and maternity would the State get from the Federal "aid" that is to cost it so dear? Whatever work needs to be done will be and must be done in the sole, the cheapest, the most effectual way by local initiative and agency. The last legislature enacted a statute authorizing localities to furnish prenatal and maternity care. This State will be bled more than copiously by the Sheppard-Towner law. It should refuse Federal cooperation and the false and highly expensive "benefit" offered it.

[Editorial from Boston Herald, Feb. 3, 1922.]

IN A NUTSHELL.

Last Sunday's Herald carried an Associated Press dispatch from Niles, Ohio, giving a summary of the address of Frank O. Lowden, former governor of Illinois, which in hardly 200 words set forth more effectively than we have seen it anywhere else the situation which now confronts our Republic. Every one of his sentences means business. We venture to repeat some of them. The italics are his words; the roman our own.

Federal aid, generally speaking, is a bribe offered to State governments to surrender their own proper functions. See the maternity project now awaiting the attention of our own legislature.

There is scarce a domain in the field of government properly belonging to the municipality or the State which the Federal Government is not seeking to invade by the use of the specious phrase "Federal aid." Look at the huge road-building projects in which we, in Massachusetts, get back $1 every time we pay $4 or $5 into the fund out of which this one comes.

The bureaus in Washington tasted the delights of power over fields which before had been exclusively occupied by the States. Propaganda, that new-found weapon of all causes, good and bad, was employed to perpetuate these new powers. What a wealth of truth in this statement. How the desk of every editor in the country is flooded with arguments in behalf of all public causes. How steadily such phrases as "reactionary," "capitalistic," "hard-hearted" are thrown at the lawmaker or editor who ventures to challenge any of the glib assertions.

If the number of public employees continues to increase as rapidly as it has in late years we will, within a reasonable time, witness the phenomenon of our population divided into two classes, those holding public office, a minority, and all others working to support the minority in office. From that condition to the soviet form of government is but a single step. We believe we are much nearer that division of the public than Gov. Lowden claims.

The local municipality should be required to provide its own revenue for its own needs and should not be given aid by the State. Likewise, the State should be compelled to provide its own funds for purely State needs. The Federal Government should appropriate only for those interests which are purely of national concern and clearly within the purposes for which the Federal Union was established. No more expensive phrases have been invented in recent years than "State aid and Federal aid." This is all fundamental in common sense. When are we likely to get it done? How should we put our shoulders to the wheel to bring that result to pass?

[Editorial from Fall River News, Feb. 18, 1922.]

THE SHEPPARD-TOWNER ACT.

We are nearing the time when Massachusetts is to decide whether our State shall accept the provisions of the Sheppard-Towner Maternity Act. The title of the act is misleading. It is "An act for the preservation of the welfare and hygiene of maternity and infancy, and for other purposes." It is the "other purposes" that are cared for. We have looked in vain in the act for any provision for the care of mothers and babies. It is the Children's Bureau and its paid employees that are to be taken care of. Section 12 of the act says:

"No portion of any moneys apportioned under this act for the benefit of the States shall be applied, directly or indirectly, to the purchase, erection, preservation, or repair of any building or buildings, or equipment, or for the purchase or rental of any building or lands, nor shall any such money or moneys required to be appropriated by any State for the purposes and in accordance with the provisions of this act be used for the payment of any maternity or infancy pension, stipend, or gratuity."

The title is captivating but misleading. We challenge the women advocates of the bill to show how it provides for anything except the support of the Children's Bureau and its appointees and for traveling and office expenses.

Massachusetts has two or three times refused to enter upon this scheme. At its last session this very legislature refused to indorse the scheme. Why should it now go back on its repeated record? The Congress offers the appropriation as a bribe, provided any State will match the bribe with an equal sum.

Do our taxpayers realize how much it will cost us to get this and other Federal aid? There are 10 States which put up 73.96 per cent of the collections, by report of the Federal collector of internal revenue. The other 38 States pay the balance. But these 10 looted States, which pay three-quarters of the internal revenue, get only 34.9 per cent of the Federal aid—on condition that they match it, and spend it in the way a Federal board orders. That is, the taxpayers in these States pay $2.12 in Federal taxes and another dollar to match it, to get hold of each "Federal" dollar. If these 10 States stay out of the Sheppard-Towner game they still lose $597,700 in the Federal tax, but they save the remaining $893,544 by refusing to accept and match the Federal aid.

This is not a bill in which men and women are on opposite sides. It is not men against women. There are many women against this measure and active in opposing it. It is not what it purports to be. It is intended to promote the welfare of the Children's Bureau. Socialists, salaried uplifters, paid welfare and social workers, who want Government jobs minding other people's business, want to swarm the country at the expense of the taxpayers to promote what they call "public welfare." Some of the childless social workers in Denver recently wanted a healthy mother of five children operated upon so she could bear no more children, because she did not run her home to suit these social workers. One can not be sure how far these workers will go when they get the authority. Let us protect our homes and our pocketbooks by keeping them out of our State. We do not know to what the provision of instruction in the hygiene of maternity and infancy through public-health nurses, consultation centers by "qualified lecturers," may lead. Sixty per cent of the appropriations for the Children's Bureau are now spent in salaries.

The real question is not one with regard to the protection of our children and their mothers. That is a question which may well be left with the mothers, the nurses, and the physicians of the Commonwealth. It is a question involving the very perpetuity of our American form of government. This Federal act, whose provisions we are asked to accept, finds its justification only in a strained construction of the "general welfare" clause of the Constitution. If the interpretation of this clause, which is supposed to warrant the Sheppard-Towner Act, is correct, then there is no legislation which Congress does not have the power to enact without regard to the reserved rights of the States and without regard to the rights of individual citizens of the States. If the voice of Massachusetts is ever to be heard in opposition to this socialistic and paternalistic tendency, now is the time for her to speak, and she can now speak effectively by refusing to accept the Sheppard-Towner Act. Massachusetts should stand out against it at least till its constitutionality has been affirmed by the United States Supreme Court. The Sterling-Towner bill comes next with its appropriation of a hundred millions, more or less. Now is the time to stop this "Federal aid" bribery of the States. Let this excessive Federal bureaucracy be stopped.

This whole thing has been traced back to Russian propaganda in this and other countries. It may be a part of the free family relations which the Russian soviet government holds. Children are for the State to rear and direct. Let us beware. The legislature should refuse to accept the Sheppard-Towner Act.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For carrying out the provisions of the act entitled "An act to establish in the Department of Labor a bureau to be known as the Women's Bureau," approved June 5, 1920, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, purchase of material for reports and educational exhibits, and traveling expenses, $75,000: Provided, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,800 per annum except the following: One at $5,000, 1 at $3,500, and 3 at $2,000 each.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. OLIVER: Page 54, line 26, after the word "and," strike out "3 at $2,000 each" and insert in lieu thereof "1 at $2,500 and 3 at $2,240 each."

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, I think the chairman of the subcommittee is to be congratulated on having followed lines of economy in the preparation of this bill. If there be ground for criticism, it is that we may not have allowed a sufficient amount for some of the important services provided for herein. I think a mistake was made in the limitation placed on the compensation for employees in the Women's Bureau, and the amendment which I offer seeks to correct this mistake. The amendment does not increase the total appropriation carried for the bureau, but permits a limited increase for four important positions in the bureau. The director of the bureau, in the hearings before the subcommittee, emphasized the importance of permitting a limited increase in compensation for these positions. The House will recall that the employees of this bureau do not draw the bonus. You will note that the amendment provides an increase only of $240 each for three employees, this increase representing the amount of the bonus.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER. I will.

Mr. DUNBAR. The employees of the Department of Labor heretofore received no bonus?

Mr. OLIVER. I understand that some of the employees of the Department of Labor received a bonus, but this particular bureau of the department does not receive the bonus. This bureau was created in June, 1920, after the bonus legislation was passed, and this may account for the fact that they have been denied this additional temporary compensation.

Mr. CRANTON. If the gentleman will yield, is it not due to the fact they are paid out of a lump-sum appropriation, so up to the amount fixed by the limitation they might put the salary where they choose, whereas those on the statutory rolls would not be changed?

Mr. OLIVER. That is probably correct, and the limitation prevents it.

Mr. DICKINSON. I would like to make an inquiry, and that is whether or not the chief statistician of the Women's Bureau is one of the salaries the gentleman proposes to raise by this amendment?

Mr. OLIVER. I understand so.

Mr. DICKINSON. On page 49 of the bill, Bureau of Immigration, the chief statistician gets $2,000. Why did not the gentleman ask the same increase there?

Mr. OLIVER. I will reply with a question to the gentleman, who was a member of the subcommittee, and who assisted in the preparation of this bill. Turn to page 53, which you have just adopted, and there for the Children's Bureau you direct the disbursement of $80,000, part of which is to be expended in the District of Columbia. This $80,000 is to be expended in paying the compensation of parties making investigations and gathering statistics for the Children's Bureau, and you have provided that eight positions may be paid salaries exceeding

$2,000, and no limitation whatever is placed on what these eight salaries may be. Can the gentleman give me a satisfactory answer why in the expenditure of this $80,000 for the work I have outlined you allow eight parties to draw exceeding $2,000 without fixing any limit and limit the Women's Bureau to three who can not draw more than $2,000?

Mr. DICKINSON. It is a change of existing law, and this committee is committed against such a policy, and the chief statistician of the Bureau of Immigration is undoubtedly one of the most important items in this bill.

Mr. OLIVER. This amendment involves no question of change in existing law, but simply a proper limited increase of pay by raising the limitation from $2,000 to $2,240. The statistician for the Women's Bureau was transferred from the Bureau of Labor, and the Bureau of Labor for some of its statisticians pays salaries in excess of $2,500. The salary of the statistician for the Women's Bureau was first fixed at $2,240, and this amount was paid until the last Congress adopted a limitation fixing it at not exceeding $2,000. The statistician to whom the gentleman from Iowa refers had been getting $2,240 before this limitation was placed in the bill, and no reason has been shown why the party holding that position should now be reduced to $2,000.

The Director of the Women's Bureau, in a very informing statement before the subcommittee, strongly urged an increase for these positions, and I think has clearly shown that they are not paid salaries comparable to that paid for similar work in other bureaus. The holders of the positions, for which increases are asked, must be college graduates and specially trained in important industrial lines of work. The director called attention to the fact that the small compensation was not attracting to the service the most efficient help. She mentioned that a recent civil-service examination showed only two applications. Several of the efficient employees have resigned on account of the small pay.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER. I will.

Mr. BARBOUR. As I understand it, the gentleman's amendment does not increase the amount of the appropriation?

Mr. OLIVER. Not in the slightest, and I will say that there are many employees provided for in this bill, with salaries in excess of $2,000, who are not performing the important and highly technical service that some of the employees of the Women's Bureau are. Certainly no good reason has been shown why the small increase in pay for these four important positions in the bureau should not be allowed. This bureau is engaged in carrying on most important work, and its activities are strongly indorsed by State officials, by Government bureaus, and by the several national women's organizations. The bureau can not, however, perform its work in the most efficient way, unless permitted to pay fair and just compensation to the trained, technical workers whom they require.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think I may safely say that no one has more regard for the women who are employed in this service than I have, but the Committee on Appropriations, with the accord of the House, has adopted the policy which has been carried out religiously without discrimination to any service connected with the Government to the effect that no salary will be raised in any appropriation reported to this House. No salary has been raised in connection with any activity of the Government. Now the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] proposes to increase the compensation by increasing the number that may be employed at a higher rate than is now being paid.

Mr. OLIVER. If the gentleman will permit an interruption, it does not increase the amount carried in the bill for this service.

Mr. MADDEN. I know that, but it increases the compensation, and it has been the rigid policy of the committee not to violate the law.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am not familiar with the facts at all except as presented on the floor by the gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from Illinois, but the statement of the gentleman from Alabama would make it perfectly plain that there is a very pronounced discrimination as between employees performing substantially the same sort of service to the extent of the bonus.

Mr. MADDEN. What I wish to impress upon the committee is this, that so far as the Appropriation Committee is concerned it has not discriminated against anybody or for anybody. We have lived within the law. The limitation placed on this appropriation was there when we took charge.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption right there?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That may be true, but the statement of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] makes it perfectly clear that we ought to do away with a discrimination which did exist under the law.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, we have no discretion, as far as we are concerned, and we have exercised no discretion. We have lived rigidly within the rules of the House, and within the law, and we have made no attempt to discriminate either in favor of or against anybody. Now, the question arises: Do you want us to discriminate? Do you want to sustain us in our uniform practice of living within the law? That is the question that is before us. The reasons why we adopted the policy of not changing compensation was, first, that it would be legislation; second, it would be a violation of the rules; and, third, we have pending in the Senate, and which has already passed the House, a classification bill which proposes to remodel the salaries of all Government employees. We have done nothing more in this case than has been done in all cases. We believe we have done justice; we believe we ought to be sustained; we believe there ought not to be any discrimination for or against anybody. If these compensations are not just, let us apply the remedy in the only orderly way it can be applied, which is through pending legislation. Why, if we believed that no such legislation would be enacted, it is not unlikely that we might feel that we ought to increase the compensation some place, but we believe sincerely that the legislation will be enacted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. And when enacted, it will apply equally to the case before the House and every other case. Now, what we do not want is for the House to say discrimination shall be practiced.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely.

Mr. OLIVER. The gentleman has stated through the press that in the event the reclassification bill does not pass he will ask for a resolution extending the bonus for another year. So unless we do provide in the way in which I have suggested for these parties, and that reclassification bill does not pass, they would absolutely have no relief whatever.

Mr. MADDEN. We can include them.

Mr. OLIVER. And you are simply placing them on the same basis as the other employees.

Mr. MADDEN. We can include them with all others if there is to be a bonus. I hope it will not be necessary to have a bonus. I hope the end of the bonus has come. But if, perchance, it has not, and the legislation now pending does not pass, I am in favor of doing justice to everybody by giving them such compensation as they ought to have. But I ask, as the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, that the committee here sustain us in the effort we have made by working night and day to see that the rights of the taxpayers of the United States were properly conserved. That is all we ask. I think we are entitled to that much. We invite your confidence. We have nothing to cover up. We are frank in everything we do. We have tried to live within the law. I think the action of the House from time to time indicates that we have lived within it, and I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama will not prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, I recognize that the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has endeavored in the preparation of many of the appropriations bills to economize. He is not accurate, however, in his statement that the Appropriations Committee has uniformly refused to grant increases in compensation to Government employees. The Shipping Board appropriation recently passed by the House will suffice to show the error of the gentleman's statement. The gentleman from Illinois himself took the floor when the appropriation for the Shipping Board was before the House, and strongly urged the removal of the limits forbidding the payment of salaries in excess of $11,000, and the House at the urgent insistence of the gentleman from Illinois enlarged the number of employees in the legal department of the Shipping Board who could be paid salaries in excess of $11,000. In fact, it was stated that the removal of the limitation would involve increasing some of the salaries to as much as $25,000. Certainly the gentleman from Illinois now remembers that fact, and I am sure the Members of the House do. It occurred only a few weeks ago. Am I then the first to violate what the gentleman from Illinois calls a rule of the Appropriations Committee relative to voting for increases in compensation? I am only asking for an increase for four important employees of the Women's Bureau, and fixing the increase at an amount equal to the bonus, to wit, $240; yet the House, at the insistence of the gentleman from Illinois, took off a limitation in the pay of Shipping Board employees, which may result in an increased compensation of more than $10,000 being paid to a single employee. We will do an injustice to the Women's Bureau, if the House now refuses to vote for this amendment, which permits a small increase to four employees, whom, the director of the bureau tells us, are efficient and can probably not be retained on the small pay provided.

You have actually demoted the statistician in the Women's Bureau, whom all admit is efficient, from a salary of $2,240, which she formerly received in this bureau, to $2,000. No bonus is allowed to any employee of this bureau, and I can but feel that the refusal to pass this amendment will be an injustice to the bureau.

It is but fair to the other members of the subcommittee to say that I do not believe they feel that by allowing this reasonable increase to four efficient employees we will do hurt to the Public Treasury.

Mr. MADDEN. Did not the gentleman himself, as a member of the Appropriations Committee, when this matter was passed upon, vote for the item in the bill?

Mr. OLIVER. I did not. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] will recall that I was not present when the full committee acted on this bill. I was present when the committee first met, and mentioned to the chairman of the committee that I would have to be excused, since I wished to attend an important hearing before the House Military Affairs Committee. I excused myself after answering present.

Mr. MADDEN. I recall that.

Mr. OLIVER. I even stated to members of the subcommittee that I would probably offer an amendment asking for an increase for some of the employees of this bureau. The hearings will also disclose what my attitude was in reference to this limitation on the compensation of some of the employees of the bureau. Frankly, I feel that some information communicated to a member of the subcommittee in an unofficial way and which does not appear in the hearings and is really not relevant to the hearings and for which no official of the bureau was responsible may have misled some members of the subcommittee to refuse to grant the reasonable increase requested by the director of this bureau. Let me again add I was not present when the full committee passed on this bill, and I did not vote for the item now under consideration, and I am glad that the gentleman from Illinois now recalls that fact. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the first word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves to strike out the first word.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I did not want to participate in the discussion of the limitation of salary question until this matter was finally settled. But I do want the attention of the committee, now that we have passed over these items of salaries, to call attention to the question of salaries in some other lines of activity.

In looking over this bill I note certain salaries as fixed by law, that for the Secretary of Labor, $12,000; Assistant Secretary, $5,000; chief clerk, $3,000; and so on, in the Department of Labor. Then in the Bureau of Immigration, Commissioner General, $5,000; Assistant Commissioner General, who shall also act as chief clerk and actuary, $3,500; in the Bureau of Naturalization, Commissioner, $4,000; Deputy Commissioner, $3,250, and so on. So much to indicate the scale of salary for this sort of professional and Government work.

I have no objection to the size of these salaries. I do not call attention to them for any such purpose. But I want to call your attention in a comparative way to the salaries given by the Government for such service and the salaries given by outside institutions. I wish to call attention to the remuneration of the trained college man for college work. I think that if we forget, and in our forgetfulness neglect a proper appreciation of the work done in our educational institutions, as suggested by the small salaries paid, our country is not going to find its best interests conserved. [Applause.]

My attention has been called at different times, for example, to a historic institution in Virginia, the second oldest college in America, established in 1693, as I remember, chartered as William and Mary College. It still bears that name. I looked over the catalogue and find that the salaries of the full professors are $2,600; those of associate professors are $2,200; the salaries of instructors only $1,200. Yet that institution, members of the committee, has given to the country four of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, three of our Presidents—Jefferson, Monroe, and Tyler—our greatest Chief Justice, 13 Cabinet officers, 17 United States Senators from Virginia and 12 from other States, 3 out of the 4 Speakers of the National House coming from Virginia, 2 ministers to England and 4 to France and 12 to other countries. In addition to Chief Justice Marshall this college furnished three associate justices of the Supreme Court. In addition, this college furnished 16 Members of the Continental Congress, including its first President, Peyton Randolph, 21 members of Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia, 49 Representatives in Congress from Virginia, 1 from Ohio, 4 from Kentucky, 1 each from Louisiana, Florida, North Carolina, and California.

It gave to the State 18 of her governors and governors to 7 other States. It supplied 3 governors to the State of Florida. It supplied the first Librarian of Congress, besides many leading commanders in the Revolution, War of 1812, War with Mexico, and the Civil War. It conferred degrees upon George Washington and Benjamin Franklin. Such in the past was the famous William and Mary College, an institution with a history and with traditions the richest, it seems to me, of any institution that I know anything about. The study of it is an intensely interesting one, and I have been very greatly charmed in the last few weeks in reading some of its achievements. In the college was established the first Greek letter fraternity, the Phi Beta Kappa. This is the mother fraternity and the great honor society of America's foremost educational institutions of higher learning.

It has often been said that the greatness of an institution can not be measured by either its pretentious plant or even its great endowment. Neither can the mere number of students properly fix its position. That is determined by the type of men it gives to the service of mankind. One of its greatest personalities was George Wythe, the teacher of Thomas Jefferson, John Marshall, and Henry Clay, all of whom had the great legal mind as a law preceptor.

Jefferson said of his great teacher:

I became acquainted with Mr. Wythe when he was about 35 years of age. He directed my studies in the law, led me into business, and continued until his death my most affectionate friend. No man ever left behind him a character more venerated than George Wythe. Of warm patriotism and devoted as he was to liberty and the natural and equal rights of man, he might truly be called the Cato of his country without the avarice of the Roman, for a more disinterested person never lived.

William and Mary's influence on technical education is among her greatest achievements. The first regular courses on physical science ever given in the United States were delivered in her halls. Among the noted scientists who were instructed at William and Mary was William Barton Rogers, who founded, in 1861, Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

As Virginians, we owe him tribute for his earlier services at William and Mary.

So said William Cabell Rives in an address at the University of Virginia, where Rogers once taught. After graduation from William and Mary, Rogers was professor at his alma mater.

"The spot where we first caught the inspiration of science" was the way the founder of Boston Tech described William and Mary to his brother Henry, regius professor at Glasgow University, himself a William and Mary graduate.

It was in the atmosphere of this town and college where the spirit of liberty was so fanned into a consuming flame that caught up all the country. Here was the famous Raleigh

Tavern, immortalized by the direction of such men as Patrick Henry, who frequently led the conversations which grew into heated debates. It was here while Jefferson was attending college he went to the crowded courthouse to hear, if possible, for the first time the prophet of the Revolution. Although he could not get closer than the door, he was so stirred that he left the crowd with the observation, "Gracious God, what an orator." Could some power repeat to-day the wonderful utterances and revive the uncontrolled feelings at various times heard and felt within the range of this historic seat of learning we would live over again the emotions which stirred the Colonies into final resistance in the war for American independence, which declaration of principles was written by a son of William and Mary. We would see anew the workings of a stupendous brain, which gave to the world her greatest modern judicial mind, which early in our national existence became the strong arm of nationality. In fact, a recital of the power and influence of this seat of learning would go far to write the growth and early development of the great Republic.

Unfortunately the college fell in the path of war in the great civil strife, and for years her halls were vacant. It appeared that this illustrious institution was to be remembered only "as once upon a time." However, she lived. It is said it was due to her soldier president, who saw to it that every October when she would enter upon the year's work would see that her morning bell would be rung. In 1886 Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, said:

The stout-hearted old president still rings the morning bell and keeps the charter alive; and I want to salute him to-day from Harvard, and I should value it more than any public honor or private good fortune that could come to me if I might live to see that old historic college of Virginia endowed anew with liberal aid of the sons of Harvard.

In the following year the United States Commissioner of Education, Dr. Dawson, wrote to Col. Ewell:

I am inclined to believe with you that the time will come when your old institution will rise from its ashes, and renew, in the prosperity which seems to be awakening throughout the country, its usefulness in the future.

In the same year the Federal commissioner gave a very good statement of the college as to its past and the then present:

"The College of William and Mary, founded in 1693 by royal grant, and long supported by popular legislation in Virginia, has been suffered to decline almost to ruin since the Civil War, which destroyed the greater part of its property. The oldest college in the South, in fact the oldest in the country with the exception of Harvard University, has been left to decay while the latter institution with which William and Mary College used to share the annual income of the bequest by Robert Boyle, the English philosopher, has lately celebrated its two-hundred and fiftieth anniversary amidst general rejoicing, with the President of the United States and representatives of American and European Universities to do honor to the occasion. The old college at Williamsburg, which gave Washington his first degree as civil engineer, and to which he gave his last public service as chancellor, the college which trained in law and politics Thomas Jefferson, Gov. Randolph, Chief Justice Marshall, and nearly all of the Virginian statesmen of the Revolutionary and formative periods in our Federal history, has not now a single student. Its classic halls are closed and deserted. From a once flourishing faculty, which early and ably represented both history and political science with other liberal arts, only the president, who is also professor of mathematics and physics, now remains. At the opening day of every academic year in October, Dr. Ewell causes the chapel bell to be rung, reminding Williamsburg that the ancient college still lives. To friends of the higher education in all our States, this fact will echo as a note of warning against public neglect and legislative indifference toward higher institutions of learning."

Fortunately these dark days are over. New vigor and spirit are in control, and the old institution can boast of nearly fifteen hundred college students. Her great past has appealed to all devotees of our history. Her rich traditions are attracting men of influence in every activity of life. Only last year the historic institution was honored by the presence of the President of the United States, who spoke words of confidence for historic values as are produced at such historic locations.

Members of the committee, while I listened to the acrimonious debate on items of salaries for governmental administrators who help the already well-oiled machinery of government running, quite naturally my mind dwelt for a time on this institution, the seminary of ideas, the creator of ideals, the training ground of great forces for ours and future times, and I could not overlook the fact that these molders of a better civilization, the conservers of a better life, commanded less money than a mere clerk in the offices over which we are quarreling in this bill. I am not complaining of the salaries we herein provide, but I am now warning the country that a different appraisal must be made of real values. Our country is both too wise and too important to overlook the real producer of worth-while values.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired. Is there objection to his request to extend his remarks in the RECORD?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

EMPLOYMENT SERVICE.

To enable the Secretary of Labor to foster, promote, and develop the welfare of the wage earners of the United States, to improve their working conditions, to advance their opportunities for profitable employment by maintaining a national system of employment offices, and to coordinate the public employment offices throughout the country by furnishing and publishing information as to opportunities for employment and by maintaining a system for clearing labor between the several States, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, and for their actual necessary traveling expenses while absent from their official station, together with their per diem in lieu of subsistence, when allowed pursuant to section 13 of the sundry civil appropriation act approved August 1, 1914; supplies and equipment, telegraph and telephone service, and printing and binding, $225,000.

Total, Department of Labor, $6,826,920.

Mr. LONDON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. LONDON. I wanted to strike out the figures "$225,000" on line 17 and offer an amendment. I move to strike out the figures "$225,000" on line 17 of page 55 and substitute the figures "$100,000,000." [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FESS. Why do you not make it a billion?

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LONDON: Page 55, line 17, strike out the figures "$225,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$100,000,000."

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I know that you are all anxious to adjourn and I am not going to detain you very long. Appropriation bills are dry as dust and exceedingly uninteresting. But I find on the last page of this bill an element of humor. I do not know whether it is humor, irony, or sarcasm. Just let us read over the first few lines:

To enable the Secretary of Labor to foster, promote, and develop the welfare of the wage earners of the United States, to improve their working conditions, to advance their opportunities for profitable employment—

The sum of $225,000 is recommended—less than was carried in ordinary times, and this notwithstanding the fact that there are nearly 6,000,000 unemployed.

What are the Republican administrators thinking of? Are they deaf and blind? Do they not know what is going on? Can an appropriation which might have been sufficient 10 or 12 years ago be adequate to-day, in view of the emergency that confronts the country? They not only do not increase the appropriation for the purpose of improving working conditions and of advancing the opportunities for profitable employment but they actually diminish the appropriation asked by the Department of Labor.

When the law created the Department of Labor it intended to add a new pillar to the temple of American democracy, a new element of strength to the political structure. It was to be a Secretary of Labor who was to be the representative and the voice of the great working masses in the executive branch of the Government. What is to become of the Department of Labor?

The law which created the department is very clear as to the object and scope of that office. It was to foster, promote, and develop the welfare of the wage earners, to improve their working conditions, and to advance their opportunities for profitable employment that the department was to be called into being.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. I will.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman will notice that all that is to be done—by maintaining a national system of employment offices,

Mr. LONDON. I notice the attempt the Committee on Appropriations has made to mutilate the existing law. I have compared the language on page 55 of this bill with the language of the original statute. The language of the original law does not limit the means which the Secretary of Labor is to employ to the maintenance of public employment offices; but this committee, evidently appalled at the magnitude of the task and ashamed of the smallness of the appropriation, limited the powers of the Secretary of Labor to this small branch of the work, to the maintenance of a national system of employment offices, and even that work is curtailed if not destroyed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WALSH. Let the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be reported again by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LONDON: Page 55, line 17, strike out the figures "$225,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$100,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. LONDON) there were—ayes 3, noes 51.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10539) making appropriations for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to the final passage.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put the amendments in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed. On motion of Mr. SHREVE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Interior Department appropriation bill, H. R. 10239, and to disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 10239, with Senate amendments, to disagree to the amendments, and ask for a conference. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 10239) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman whether or not he has consulted with the minority with reference to this request?

Mr. CRAMTON. I have consulted with my colleague, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER], and it is entirely agreeable to him.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, in view of the many increases carried in this bill, I believe it ought to go back to the committee for consideration. I object.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman withhold his objection? I will say to the gentleman that the conferees are quite familiar with the increases and changes proposed, and I feel like saying this: That the gentleman from New York can not be any more strongly opposed to the great number of increases than am I or the other gentlemen who are likely to be conferees.

Mr. SNELL. I think for the present I will continue my objection.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution and bills of the following titles:

S. J. Res. 137. Joint resolution transferring to the custody of the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution certain relics now in the Department of State;

S. 2810. An act to amend and reenact section 113 of chapter 5 of the Judicial Code of the United States as amended and reenacted by an act approved the 22d day of August, 1914;

S. 2774. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes,' approved June 3, 1916, and to establish military justice," approved June 4, 1920.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 7483. An act for the relief of Robert G. Whitfield;

H. R. 8924. An act to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes," approved March 30, 1920; and

H. R. 9060. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to lease a certain tract of land to the city of Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Sunday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Sunday next. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR SUNDAY.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as Speaker pro tempore to preside on Sunday the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TAYLOR].

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. COUGHLIN (at the request of Dr. DARROW), by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence on account of illness.

HOUSE BILL LAID ON THE TABLE.

The SPEAKER. The Senate bill regulating marine insurance in the District of Columbia having been passed, the bill H. R. 6775, identical with it, will, without objection, be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Sunday, February 26, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

I desire to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] are absent attending a hearing before the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-four Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. HARRISON obtained the floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGES.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that immediately after the disposition of the treaty with Japan, or sooner if there shall be an interruption in the consideration of that matter, I shall ask the Senate to take up and consider House bill 9103, which is commonly called the judges' bill. I give this notice because all Senators are interested in that measure, and many Senators are especially interested in it. I think it is due to them that they should have the information I have just given.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am very anxious to have the judges' bill disposed of, but I think the treaty with Japan, which is now before the Senate, has precedence; and I shall ask the Senate to remain in open executive session until that treaty is disposed of.

THE MUSCLE SHOALS PLANT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting an offer for the Muscle Shoals property, submitted by Frederick E. Engstrom, for suggested consideration in connection with investigations now being made relative to the Muscle Shoals project, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, pardon me for saying so, but this is being done as in legislative session. We took a recess in open executive session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is done as in legislative session.

DEFICIENCY ESTIMATE FOR PATENT OFFICE, 1922 (S. DOC. NO. 133).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting estimate of a deficiency appropriation for the Department of the Interior, fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, for salaries in the Patent Office in amount $166,671.16, which, with accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

ALTERNATIVE ESTIMATE FOR PATENT OFFICE, 1923 (S. DOC. NO. 134).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting an alternative estimate for the Department of the Interior, fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, for the Patent Office, in amount $2,273,040, in lieu of the estimate submitted in the Budget for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, making a net increase of $292,690, which, with accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

As in legislative session, a message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhues, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 10559) making appropriations for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 2072. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to make and receive conveyances effecting an exchange of title to the railroad rights of way at Camp Henry Knox, Ky., and for other purposes;

S. 2138. An act providing that the Government property known as the St. Francis Barracks, at St. Augustine, Fla., be donated to the State of Florida for military purposes;

S. 2774. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes,' approved June 3, 1916, and to establish military justice," approved June 4, 1920;

S. 2810. An act to amend and reenact section 113 of chapter 5 of the Judicial Code of the United States, as amended and reenacted by an act approved the 22d day of August, 1914; and

S. J. Res. 137. Joint resolution transferring to the custody of the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution certain relics now in the possession of the Department of State.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

As in legislative session,

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Edwards County, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation reviving the Government Grain Corporation so as to stabilize prices of certain farm products, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented petitions of sundry citizens of Detroit, Mich., praying for prompt acceptance of the proposals of Henry Ford relative to the Muscle Shoals project, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. LADD presented the petition of Ralph A. Moore and 35 others, of Turtle Lake, N. Dak., praying for the enactment of legislation reviving the Government Grain Corporation so as to stabilize prices of certain farm products, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a resolution adopted at a meeting of the Minnesota and North Dakota Fire Underwriters' Association, at Fargo, N. Dak., favoring cooperation of the United States with Canada in the construction of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway project, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SIMMONS presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the Philadelphia Seed Co. (Inc.), of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for a reduction in the proposed duty on seeds as contained in the pending tariff bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also (for himself and for Mr. OVERMAN) presented a memorial of the Ladies' Current Events Club, of Southern Pines, N. C., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called soldiers' bonus bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COLT presented a resolution adopted by the Torino Social Club, of Quindnick, R. I., favoring the enactment of legislation declaring October 12 a legal holiday, to be known as Columbus Day, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE presented a resolution adopted by the Twenty-seventh Annual Convention, Los Angeles Diocese of the Episcopal Church, at Los Angeles, Calif., indorsing the Conference on Limitation of Armament and favoring world peace, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the First Baptist Church of Pasadena, Calif., favoring prompt ratification of the treaties prepared by the Conference on Limitation of Armament, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions and sundry communications in the nature of petitions of Chapters of Daughters of the American Revolution of Willows, Red Bluff, Santa Cruz, Claremont, San Diego, and Needles; the Cosmos Club, of Ukiah; the Wha Nika Club, of Blue Lake; the Woman's Club of King City; the Women's Club of Walnut Creek; the Woman's Civic League of Pasadena; the History Club of Los Catos; the Pleasant Hill P. T. A., of Arcata, Humboldt County, all in the State of California, praying for the enactment of legislation creating a department of education, with its head in the President's Cabinet, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Grain Trade Association of San Francisco, Calif., favoring the enactment of legislation legalizing the manufacture and sale of light wines and beer, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Central Labor Council of Oakland and the Federated Trades and Labor Council of San Diego, favoring the recognition of the Government of Mexico, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of Ventura County Branch of the American Association of University Women, of Santa Barbara, Calif., praying for the enactment of legislation to promote physical education in the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the North Beach Evening High School Alumni Association, of San Francisco, Calif., favoring continuance of the publication School Life, the official organ of the United States Bureau of Education, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a letter in the nature of a petition from the Modesto (Calif.) Chamber of Commerce, praying for the passage of the so-called fourfold adjusted compensation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Church Federation of Riverside, Calif., protesting against the enactment of legislation to modify the so-called Volstead Act relative to the manufacture or sale of light wines and beer, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Yolo County Farm Bureau at its regular meeting held in Woodland, Calif., February 4, 1922, favoring the enactment of legislation to foster the needs and requirements of agriculture and allied industries, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Centerville (Calif.) Chamber of Commerce, favoring a higher protective tariff duty upon sugar than contained in the pending tariff bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS.

As in legislative session.

Mr. BURSUM, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5214) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 514) thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED.

Mr. SUTHERLAND, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on February 23, 1922, they presented to the President of the United States the enrolled bill (S. 621) to amend subdivisions (a) and (c) of section 206 of the transportation act, 1920.

BILL INTRODUCED.

As in legislative session.

Mr. SHEPPARD introduced a bill (S. 3197) to amend an act entitled "An act to reduce and equalize taxation, to provide revenue, and for other purposes," approved November 23, 1921, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

As in legislative session.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that on February 24, 1922, the President approved and signed the act (S. 621) to amend subdivisions (a) and (c) of section 206 of the transportation act, 1920.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

As in legislative session.

The bill (H. R. 10559) making appropriations for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

AMBASSADOR HARVEY'S PILGRIM DINNER SPEECH.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, on yesterday the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] alluded to and elaborated upon certain excerpts from the speech of the American ambassador to the high court of St. James on last Monday night given in honor of Mr. Balfour. I shall not go over the ground traveled by the distinguished Senator from Missouri, nor shall I refer to those passages of the speech which he discussed on yesterday. I would feel abashed to discuss any question which had been discussed by the Senator from Missouri, because he always handles his subject completely and leaves nothing more to be said. There are, however, certain parts of the remarkable speech delivered by the illustrious ambassador representing this Government in London which should receive some consideration at the hands of this body.

I had hoped that some Senator on the other side of the aisle would rise in defense of the characterization given by the ambassador of the distinguished leader of the Republicans in this Chamber, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and of the characterization of the President of the United States. It has now been five or six days since that speech was delivered and none has seen fit to come to their defense. Consequently, as an "amicus curiæ," so to speak, I feel constrained to come to their defense.

Mr. President, we all know that our brilliant yet erratic ambassador at London is very much of an historian. He assumed that rôle the other night. We had been told by the press, and no doubt with authority, that the proposal made by the Secretary of State as the head of the American delegation at the recent Conference on the Limitation of Armament had been conceived by the President as he sailed the placid waters of the Potomac; that as the Mayflower lay serenely in one of the sequestered nooks of that beautiful stream he had penned it with his own hand, but we did not know until the ambassador made his speech on last Monday night that so far as the President was concerned there was another historic incident connected with the conference. Let me read to the Senate this remarkable contribution to the historical literature of the world. Mr. Harvey said:

I could not but recall the inception of the undertaking thus acclaimed. Some 300 years ago the original Mayflower bore the original Pilgrims to the new Plymouth across the turbulent Atlantic. Its arrival marked the beginning of a new era in the development of a great continent.

Then he says, as that historic incident arises before him, with a power of expression peculiarly his own, and an eloquence as soft and entrancing as summer breezes, that—

On a certain Saturday hardly seven months ago a modern Mayflower bore the Chief Magistrate of that new land down the broad Potomac to the open sea. In the morning he directed the anchoring of the yacht in a secluded cove, and disappeared below. Emerging later, he handed the captain a paper for the radio operator. Thereon, written in his own hand, was the announcement of his decision to call a conference at Washington, whose culmination fetches us together to-night.

And thus another chapter adorns our history. This great historian, however, does not tell us why the President sought this secluded nook, this sequestered cove in the Potomac; he does not tell us why the President left the activities of the political life of Washington and sought seclusion and retreat in the Mayflower upon the placid waters of the Potomac and there gave this message to the radio operator. It may be that sometime the President will make his contribution to the literature of the world, and will himself tell us just why it was that he sought the Mayflower, directed its course down the Potomac, and there gave to the world the message that the disarmament conference was to be held. We are entitled to this valuable information, and it is unfortunate that Ambassador Harvey did not add to the other valuable information contained in his remarkable speech this—what is destined to be a most valuable historic contribution. Why, sirs, we are entitled to know the exact spot in which the Mayflower anchored, that a monument might rise majestically above the smooth surface of the Potomac, so strong that its base may securely rest, and so stately that pilgrimages from every port of the world may come, that due observance be made to this historic spot.

However, Mr. President, not only did the ambassador assume the rôle of historian in that speech, but he enshrouded himself in the robes of Elijah and prophesied as to what would happen in the United States Senate. Unless it be the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts or the President of the United States, I doubt whether there are any other persons in the world who know just how the treaties which are soon to come before us are to be acted upon, when they will be acted upon, and when acted upon whether they will be ratified or rejected; but this modern Elijah apparently knows and makes this remarkable statement as to the disposition of those treaties:

When I say "assured," I speak from information the exactness of which is beyond question, that the ratification of those compacts—all of them—by the British Parliament is no more certain than their ratification by the Senate of the United States, and that much sooner than commonly anticipated.

I know not where he got his authority to make that statement, or whether or not it is correct. Let us hope, however, that it will prove more correct than the statement which he made at another dinner, in another remarkable speech some months ago, when he stated that "the United States entered the World War in order to save its own skin, and that we fought because we were afraid not to fight."

But, Mr. President, I pass from that. We all know the literary genius of this man, the facility of his pen, the imagery of his mind; but they sink into insignificance when we realize the knowing qualities of George Harvey as a diagnostician, a depicter of the characteristics of individuals. He stands above all others in discerning their peculiar qualities, their dominant characteristics, their outstanding features. The remarkable thing about him is that he has been in a peculiar position to know the characteristics, the qualities, and peculiarities of the men about whom he spoke on this night.

He discussed some very celebrated American characters. He paid high tribute to Mr. Balfour; he placed him on the highest crag of the highest peak; he put him among the stars and bedecked him with the brightest diadems; and yet when he comes to Elihu Root he does not go quite so far. He was afraid he might hurt the sensibilities of his British audience, and so in speaking of Elihu Root he said:

The statesmen who finally inscribed their names on the various parchments as "citizens of the United States" included Elihu Root, whose place in public esteem there closely approximates—

"Closely approximates"; it does not reach that pinnacle which Mr. Balfour occupies, but "closely approximates"—that of Mr. Balfour as unique in experience and accomplishments.

Then he comes to OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD, the Democratic leader, and pays to Senator UNDERWOOD the highest compliment that is given to any one of them.

Those Senators who know the American ambassador will agree with me that in employing the language he did in characterizing the qualities of the Democratic leader he paid him, and evidently intended to do so, a higher compliment than he paid to any other person. Listen to it. He says:

OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD, a happy blend—of the fine spirit of the old South and the high spirit of the new.

When you understand the tastes and habits and characteristics of the American ambassador, you realize that when he said one of the representatives of the American delegation to the disarmament conference blended "the fine spirit of the old South with the high spirit of the new," he was paying him a great compliment, indeed. And when he said "blended" the "fine spirit" of the old South with the "high spirit" of the new, I doubt not that he inadvertently, or perhaps from force of expression, was thinking of the "fine spirits" of the old South with the "high spirits" of the new. Now, if the ambassador had transformed his language by speaking of Senator UNDERWOOD as "blending" the "high spirits" of the old South with the "fine spirits" of the new, then we might doubt the compliment; but, realizing the authority of the ambassador to speak in such circumstances, we must agree that the characterization of the Senator from Alabama by the ambassador is as complimentary as sincerity could dictate or phrases convey.

Then he proceeds to discuss the Republican leader [Mr. LODGE], and here is what he says about him:

HENRY CABOT LODGE, the nestor of the Senate, erudite in cloistral aloofness—

Whatever that means—"erudite in cloistral aloofness"—but dashing as a knight of old in political fray.

Erudite! We all know that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts is erudite, learned, scholarly, facile in expression, eloquent in speech. Those of us who had the pleasure of listening to him when he presented to the disarmament conference the four-power pact shall never forget how eloquent he grew when he immortalized the words of Browning and referred to the—

Sprinkled isles.
Lily on lily that o'erlace the sea.

If there be one man in public life to-day who should be qualified by training and experience and study to write a treaty that is "hog tight and weatherproof," it is the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts.

I know not whether it is true that he was the dominating force that carved this four-power treaty and wrote its terms. It embraces about 20 lines; and this "erudite" gentleman already has consented with his colleagues and there has been submitted to the Senate another treaty, to explain what the four-power pact was, that is longer and includes more words than the original four-power pact; and if the papers correctly report what the Committee on Foreign Relations have done relative to the four-power pact, they have agreed at least on one reservation, and anticipate agreeing on another and perhaps more. So I am willing to assume that that expression of George Harvey as "erudite" in depicting the Senator from Massachusetts is very apt and true.

But Ambassador Harvey not only speaks of him as being "erudite"; he says he is "erudite in cloistral aloofness"—secluded, immured, desirous of closeting himself behind cells and doors and listening not or paying little attention to what is going on throughout the world, desirous to dwell by himself, to run the Republican Party in the Senate without the close association and cooperation of his fellow Senators. It may be that that expression came to George Harvey when he read of the achievements in the Senate during this Congress of the party with which he is now affiliated.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Does not the Senator think that that expression came to the distinguished ambassador naturally, because just before that he had been speaking of a blend?

Mr. HARRISON. Probably so.

Mr. NORRIS. And at this banquet I presume he had stopped to partake of one of those blends that brought on this expression. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. It may be that he was still inspired by the "blend" of that "fine spirit of the old South with the high spirit of the new."

Mr. NORRIS. That is what he had been talking about.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; it was in his mind, and he was inspired.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that brought on the inspiration. I understand that it usually does that.

Mr. HARRISON. I am glad that the Senator does not speak by the card; but perhaps, too, he had been reading about the policies of Senators here in the Senate, led by this Senator "erudite in cloistral aloofness"; and when he realized that that was a characteristic of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, he thought perhaps it was the best way to excuse the party now in power from its shortcomings.

I wonder what the populace up on Back Bay will think of that characterization of their Senator as "erudite in cloistral aloofness" by one who speaks with authority, and who ought to know better than all others. I wonder what the boys who gather in Maynard Hall will think of that expression?

Surely his friend, the ambassador, did not believe that he could "talk with crowds" and "keep his virtue," or "walk with kings" and retain "the common touch."

But Mr. Harvey does not count him always as "erudite in cloistral aloofness." He changes sometimes. He says:

But dashing as a knight of old in political fray.

And while for five years and nine months out of his term of office he may be "erudite in cloistral aloofness," when he sees arising over the horizon the rays of a political sun he becomes a "dashing knight of old" in that political fray. And so I presume now that he has removed himself from this "cloistral aloofness" since the campaign is coming on in Massachusetts, and he has become a "dashing knight" in that political fray.

I do not know why George Harvey applies to the Senator from Massachusetts the term "dashing knight." A "dashing knight" may mean much. It may be that he knew he was not a very militant knight, a very aggressive knight, a Spartan knight, but he was a dashing knight. Those of us who have seen him perform here are willing to concede that at times he is a "dashing knight." We recall how he dashed from one position to another on so many questions that have confronted the American Senate. We recall how upon one occasion he dashed to Union College and there poured forth his liquid fire of eloquence in behalf of an association of nations to preserve the peace of the world, and then we observed how dashing he became, when a treaty was presented here, in order to incorporate reservations; and then we observed how dashing he was at the convention in Chicago, when he incorporated his association of nations as a plank in the platform of his party and enunciated his principles as the spokesman in that convention. We have observed how dashing he was in this disarmament conference, how quick he was to discern, and how he dashed to the Senator from Nebraska, the Senator from Connecticut, the Senator from California, the Senator from Idaho, and those others who found fault with his handiwork embodied in the four-power pact; when they said, "We will fight you if you present it in that form," he dashed up to the White House and got the President to pen with his own hand, I presume, another treaty explaining about the mainland of Japan. So he is a "dashing knight."

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I hope the Senator from Mississippi will not forget with what a fiery dash the Senator from Massachusetts went from one position to the other on the Colombian question.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and on every other question, I think, that we have discussed here. I do not recall any on which he has not dashed from one position to the other. "Dashing knight!" I have no doubt that when George Harvey employed those words he wanted to anoint the leader of the Republicans in this Chamber the new Don Quixote of this body.

I never heard of a Don Quixote without his Sancho Panza, and so I presume that the Sancho Panza of this episode is the ambassador at the high court of St. James; and so these two knights have charged together—yes; windmills and mirrors and sheep and geese and everything. I recall in that remarkable story that as Don Quixote astride his Rosinante and Sancho on his ass went through the woods in quest of more adventures, once Don Quixote got tired of Sancho's advice and thought he was talking too much, and enjoined him to keep his mouth closed and remain silent. So let us hope, since this new title is to be applied to the Senator from Massachusetts, that he will send word overseas to his squire, the Sancho Panza of the diplomatic corps, and enjoin him to stop talking, and if he knows State secrets to keep them to himself.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to remind the Senator that that will not stop Harvey from talking. You can not send word from a country where the eighteenth amendment is in force to a country that does not have any prohibitory law, and stop Harvey from talking. [Laughter.]

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Let me suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that Don Quixote compounded a miraculous balsam, and Sancho Panza took a dose of it and vomited his insides out. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. Well, I hesitate to express the hope that this Sancho Panza will do likewise.

The worst characterization that was employed by the ambassador in his remarkable speech was that of the President of the United States. All others sink into insignificance compared with it. If there is a man in the United States who should know the President's true worth, his characteristics and habits and peculiarities, it is George Harvey; so hear what he says:

In one respect President Harding bears a striking resemblance to the elephant which symbolizes his political party—

President Harding bears a striking resemblance to the elephant which symbolizes his political party!

He tests with painstaking caution every plank in crossing a bridge, but when convinced of firm footing over he goes.

Ah, it took no strain upon the imagination for George Harvey to see his President as an elephant approaching the water's edge, and seeing beyond the waters the promised land of some election that was coming, and then he beheld across that water a bridge, with planks laid side by side, and then he observed Harding, the elephant, as he came to the bridge, stop as he saw certain signs on the planks.

I suppose that Harvey in his imagination saw the first plank the elephant was to step on. Perhaps it was the promise made to the people of a new tariff law, with the American valuation scheme included, and as soon as this elephant saw how dangerous it was, and heard the cries from every section of the country that it was rotten, this great massive individual of the animal kingdom threw back his ears and stalled. So that plank probably was removed, and they shot another one into its place, and that had printed on it, perhaps, the promise that was made to the soldier boys in the last campaign, telling them what a friend he would be to them; how he, by the force of his great personality, the influence he would wield, would give to them immediately the enactment of a law insuring them adjusted compensation.

So he began to feel this plank with his big toe, and he heard the cries from the chambers of commerce throughout the country, he heard the wails from the money interests of Wall Street, he heard the lamentations of the profiteers who had grown rich out of the war, and he became cautious, threw back his ears, and said, "That plank is rotten."

I can believe that in his imagination George Harvey could see the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] and other Senators on the other side who had promised the boys adjusted compensation legislation going up to the elephant and saying, "Come on back. Let's walk over that plank. It is not rotten. It is a firm foundation. We promised them"; and he started again. But he heard the protests once more, and being a "cautious" elephant, he has contented himself by just standing still, feeling away, and painstakingly observing.

I might enumerate case after case where he has been cautious, afraid to step upon the plank for fear his great weight, as well as his political party, might go down with it.

But to term him an elephant! I had thought, after the avalanche of votes which smothered the Democratic Party in the last campaign, that Harding would not be an elephant, but that he would drive the elephant. I could in my mind's eye fancy a parade down Pennsylvania Avenue, the calliope playing, the clowns and the animals and everything there, and the elephant, bedecked in robes of velvet, with trimmings of golden tinsel, with a Turkish chariot, if you please, on his hairless and thick-skinned back; and I could see Harding there as the ringmaster, driving the elephant along amid the cheers and cries of those who wanted office and those who were holding office.

Yes, Mr. President, following that election we thought that your President—

Had hoped to ride
In pomp and pride
On that elephant down the street;
While the boys would cheer
As he drew near,
And the girls say, "Ain't he sweet?"

But Harvey says he resembles an elephant. Ah, Mr. President, let me read the definition of an elephant, and let us compare and analyze this peculiar characterization which Harvey has given to his President. The dictionary defines an elephant as follows:

ELEPHANT: There are two existing species and a number of extinct ones, among which is the mammoth. In a wider sense the term includes any member of the family Elephantidae. They are the largest existing land animals. The snout is prolonged into a muscular proboscis. * * * There are two incisors in the upper jaw * * * which develop into long tusks, which furnish most of the ivory of commerce. The feet are short and rounded and have five toes. The head is very large, chiefly owing to the amount of diplole tissue. * * * They may live for much more than a century.

Then there is a part of it which had better not be put into the RECORD. It continues:

This is the only species which is often tamed and trained, and is the one most commonly seen in shows.

I had better leave the next out. Then it continues:

The extinction of both species, unless far greater efforts are made to preserve them, is only a matter of time.

Let me read that latter fact again. Listen, you Senators on the other side:

The extinction of both species, unless far greater efforts are made to preserve them, is only a matter of time.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, while the Senator is reading from the testimony in a disconnected way, will he not read the definition of the mule as well?

Mr. HARRISON. No; George Harvey did not apply that term to the President, although the President might have felt that he would have been more complimented if he had called him a mule rather than an elephant. I did not read all of the qualities of an elephant, but we know that the elephant never has been trained to do any trick except to go around in a circle. We know that the elephant can go backwards just as rapidly as he can forwards; that he is the wonder and merriment of children; that no show or menagerie would be complete without him; and there is one peculiar thing, too, about an elephant; it is the only animal in the fore part of whose head you can find "wood," and the only value which has ever been found about an elephant is his solid ivory.

So I resent this vile characterization of my President. I resent him being called an elephant. I have risen to-day as an American, out of the realm of partisanship, to plead with Americans not to believe it.

FEDERAL RESERVE BANK AT ATLANTA.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I shall before I take my seat make a unanimous-consent request. Day before yesterday, when I discussed before the Senate a resolution which I offered touching the activities of Federal officials, who are officers of the Atlanta Federal Reserve Bank, and also the activities of the Federal Reserve Board in that connection, charging them with circulating a speech of one Senator made in this body attacking and criticizing the position of another Senator, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], interrupting me, made the suggestion that members of the Federal Reserve Board who had been writing to Members of Congress, seeking to influence them and cause them to desist from a certain course, should also be investigated.

That reminded me of a letter written some time ago by a member of the board, Mr. Platt, a Republican from the State of New York, to Congressman BRAND, of Georgia. Mr. BRAND had made a speech criticizing the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board, and condemning that policy very severely. Mr. Platt took him to task in a letter directed to Mr. BRAND. I read to the Senate two sentences from that letter:

I want to tell you that you are going to have these things quoted against you in time if you keep them up. You will find a reaction from all this talk in the not very distant future, before the next primaries come at any rate.

This statement is full of meaning and was intended to drive from his position on a public question a Member of Congress. Senators, are you going to refuse us the opportunity of investigating this matter? Are you going to say by your votes that you approve the political activities of Federal Reserve Board members and officials of Federal reserve banks?

I criticized the action of the Federal reserve bank in Atlanta in sending out the speech of one Senator, made in this body, defending the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board, and criticizing the position of another Senator who has criticized and condemned that deflation policy.

Those officials are sending that speech not only into the State of Alabama but into the congressional district of Congressman BRAND of the State of Georgia. They are sending it to merchants, bankers, corporations, and other persons in the territory which that bank was intended to serve. We believe that that bank is paying for the printing of these speeches, that that bank is paying for the letter writing and the postage upon the letters which accompany that speech, and which request the recipient of the speech to write back and tell them how he felt about the deflation policy of the administration of the Federal reserve system during the period in question before he read the speech of the Senator from Virginia, and then to write and say how he feels about it now, since he has read the speech of the Senator from Virginia. They say, "We invite you to write us anything else in connection with this which you feel like writing."

Mr. President, I have taken the position that this banking system, established by the Congress to serve the American people in its business affairs, to be far removed and forever kept out of politics, has gone into politics and a member of the Federal Reserve Board wrote to a Member of Congress and told him that if he did not stop criticizing the board's administration of the law he was going to hear from it, that it would be quoted against him, and not only that but he was going to find that public sentiment will change and that before the primary takes place in which he is a candidate.

Could anything be more plain than that they intended to express the idea that they were going to use influence against him; that they were going to undertake injuriously to affect him; that they were undertaking to control his action in the Congress of the United States? You can not get anything else out of it, Mr. President, and if the Senate permits such a thing to go on it will fail in its duty and discredit itself before the eyes of the American people.

We have got it in our power to require these Government officials to keep that great banking system out of politics.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The other day I mentioned to the Senator from Alabama an insolent letter about the commissioner of agriculture of the State of Idaho. I have the letter, or a quotation from it, now. It relates to the commissioner of agriculture of Idaho, whose name is Miles Cannon. The insolent letter was written by John U. Calkins, governor of the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco, and one sentence in that letter reads as follows:

If Mr. Cannon has no other qualifications than those indicated in his address, his usefulness as commissioner of agriculture of the State of Idaho appears to be doubtful.

Mr. Cannon's offense had been that he had made an address condemning the Federal Reserve Board and its deflation policy.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from Georgia has furnished us additional proof of the political activities of Federal reserve bank officials. Here is a letter seeking to belittle and discredit the commissioner of agriculture—a State official if you please—of the great State of Idaho.

Mr. President, I wish to make this statement to the Senate to-day. If the bankers of the country knew that they could write to the Senate and to the House and give the information as to how they feel toward the administration of the Federal reserve system for the past 18 months or nearly two years, without the Federal Reserve Board knowing their names, it would be a revelation to Congress. I was speaking here a few days ago when the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] rose and asked me why it is that the bankers of the country are afraid to say anything about this board and its deflation policy. I replied, "They are intimidated by the management of the system. They are afraid to come out and appear in an antagonistic attitude toward the board, fearing that they will be punished." As one of them wrote me, "They have so many ways in which they can hurt us and punish us, I do not want my name used."

Mr. President, is the Senate going to permit this mighty political octopus to spring up right here in the Capital of the Nation when both Houses of Congress are in session and the President sits within 100 yards of where it is reaching out its tentacles and wrapping them around the throat of the small bankers, farmers, and business men of the Republic, crushing out the spirit of independence and freedom of action that a banker ought to have. Is that liberty? Is that justice in our Government?

Mr. President, the Federal Reserve Board in order to keep money from the farmer to hold his farm products off the market whispered the word down the line to the local banks to ask borrowers, "What do you want to do with the money you are asking us to lend you?" What sort of Government is this that our boys fought to save? If I want to borrow a thousand dollars to put over a business deal that I think is of advantage to me and mine and I am willing to back my judgment on it, if I have the proper collateral, why should I have to tell the banker what I want with that thousand dollars?

I want to tell of an instance I heard about. The story goes that a couple of young men from the State of Arkansas went to New York. They went to a certain bank and said they wanted to borrow $25,000. They said they had certain collateral. The banker said, "What do you want to do with it?" The collateral was all right. They said, "Well, we do not like to tell what we want to do with it." "We can not let you have it unless you do." "There is a little speculation in it in a sense, but it is all right and proper. It is a matter that we do not want to get out. We might lose our chance to make the deal we have in mind." "Well, what is it? You must tell it to us." "We have an option on some coal lands that we believe will be worth millions of dollars, and if we can get $25,000 now we can clinch the deal this week. We have this report on it and that report on it, and it is a fine proposition." They said, "We do not care to lend money on any such proposition as that." The two young men went out despondent and heavy hearted. The whole thing had gone up in smoke. But the bank officials bought the option on the coal land and made hundreds of thousands of dollars on the deal that they would never have known about but for the information forced out of men applying for a loan.

Is our banking system intended to be a club to beat men over the heads and intimidate them, or is it an instrumentality for good and one that will help and serve them? That is all I am fighting for.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to my friend from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. In a general way I am in sympathy with the Senator in what I think he is striving to do, but I do not want to let go unnoticed the idea that I think he is conveying now, which it seems to me he can not substantiate, and that is that a banker should not inquire as to the use of the money which the borrower expects to make if he gets it at the bank. Of course, in the case the Senator puts, if the bankers did what he says they did they ought to be put out of business; they ought to have their charter taken away from them. They themselves are doing something that no banker ought to do, if they are engaging in speculation.

But we have been contending, the Senator from Alabama, and I in my weak way, that the farmers of the country were deflated. When a farmer goes to the bank and asks for credit, how is the banker going to know what he expects to do with that money unless he asks? If a farmer went to the bank and undertook to borrow money for speculative purposes, the banker ought to turn him down. If he is borrowing money for the purpose of engaging in agriculture, buying stock, improving the land, getting fertilizer, or something of that kind, then there is that proposition involved.

It seems to me we can not assume that the bankers have no right to inquire what the borrower wants to do with the money.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I did not intend to go nearly so far with my statement. I understand that where a bank is supplying farmers and merchants and business men generally with money, and money should be scarce and hard to get, then the banker might tell his customer, "We are not letting anybody have any money except for the purpose of making crops, or a merchant to carry on his business to supply the farmers," and so forth. That sort of business would be all right, and he might ask the man applying for loans about it, in order to keep the very thing the Senator from Nebraska had in mind from happening, the speculative fellows in New York and Chicago trying to get money that ought to go out into the country. I am not talking about cases of that kind. I would not object to their inquiring if those seeking a loan were trying to get money to speculate on the exchange, in stocks, or farm products.

But the case I mentioned was where two men went from their State to get money to put over a deal that sought to buy land and to develop a coal industry within the State, which was a legitimate business as contrasted with speculative deals that take place upon the exchange. I agree with the Senator from Nebraska along the line that the speculative interests ought not to be permitted to have money that should go to the farming sections of the South and West, and I do not object to inquiry along the line suggested by him. I do object to the fellow who is in the speculative business holding up the man who comes from one of the States with good collateral and has a deal to put over that he wants to get in on, and telling the facts about it, and then have the banker turn him down and go and handle the deal for himself. That is crooked business.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. I was not in the Chamber when the Senator from Alabama was first recognized. I heard him mention yesterday that he intended to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of his resolution. May I ask the Senator if he has yet made the unanimous-consent request?

Mr. HEFLIN. No; but I am going to make it in a minute. I shall take only a little more time. I hope my friend from New Jersey has softened his heart and is not going to insist on the motion he made Thursday. I can not see how he can oppose an investigation of this subject, and I hope he will change his attitude upon this very important matter.

It ought to be the desire of every Senator, regardless of his political affiliation, to keep our great Federal reserve banking system out of politics.

Mr. EDGE. If I may answer that in a moment, it appears to me that the Senator's own argument—what I have heard of it in the last few minutes—would seem to make it all the more necessary for immediate action upon the part of the committee. He now introduces other evidence or information in connection with the necessity for an investigation. It would seem to me the Senator would be assisting his object in having a vote upon the pending motion referring the resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which committee it belongs, and let the committee at once take up the subject matter of the resolution.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] on yesterday, in expressing his views on a resolution providing for a visit to Muscle Shoals, stated to the Senate that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry had instructed him to do that. The Committee on the Judiciary instructed a subcommittee to consider the dye industry and charges made concerning the activities of their representatives. In the same way the argument, it seems to me, becomes all the more cogent and emphatic that the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which this subject matter naturally belongs and by which it must be or should be considered, should have the resolution referred to them so that they can without delay take it up. I can say in advance, as to the Senator's suggestion about any softening of my heart, that I shall most certainly object to any unanimous consent that does not provide for a vote on the pending motion.

I might say, and I ask the Chair to inform me if I am in error, that we are now in open executive session and it would be absolutely impossible without unanimous consent to vote on the motion. Is not that the parliamentary situation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the situation.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will make the request in a moment. The difference between the situation suggested by the Senator from New Jersey and this is that the committee instructed the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who is chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, of which committee I am a member, to introduce that resolution and report it to the Senate and get it referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate for action. That was done.

In this instance a Senator introduced a resolution on the floor and asked for its immediate consideration. That was objected to; and then he moved to refer it to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. That motion was defeated by one vote, the vote being 32 yeas and 33 nays. Then the Senator from New Jersey moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, because he says it pertains to banking and currency business. Then I raised the objection, which is quite natural, that a member of that committee is the author of the speech that is being circulated which attacks me and my position, and I submitted to the Senate and to the country that the resolution, because of that situation, ought not to be referred to that committee. I do not believe there is a fair-minded man or woman in the Republic who will say, under the circumstances, that it should go to that committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

Mr. HEFLIN. If I had made a speech attacking the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] and my speech was being circulated in his State, and a resolution to investigate that matter should be introduced and it should be suggested that it go to a committee of which I am a member, I would not permit it to be done if I could help it, because it would not be fair to him.

I gladly yield to my friend from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to say to the Senator from Alabama that I am in favor of his resolution, or, at least, I am in favor of an investigation. I have not heard his resolution read, but, as I understand, it provides for an investigation of the Federal reserve bank at Atlanta and its conduct, which has been brought to the attention of the Senate by the reading of certain letters. I think a full investigation should be made, and, of course, be made by an unbiased committee. I think the Senator from Alabama has shown reasons which are sufficient to warrant such an investigation. I myself am ready to vote for his resolution without referring it to any committee; but if the resolution must go to a committee, I think we will all agree that under our rules the Banking and Currency Committee is the proper committee to which the resolution should be referred.

I should not be willing to say in advance that the members of that committee would not treat the resolution with fairness and would not report it back to the Senate. There are some reasons, perhaps, which the Senator from Alabama has given why the resolution should not be referred to that committee, for we know in advance that certain members of the committee are probably opposed to the resolution. At the same time, no Senator who is a member of that committee has shown a disposition which seems to me to indicate that he would be so prejudiced against the resolution as to take any unfair action in reference to it. At any rate, the resolution must come back to the Senate, and the Senate must act upon it finally. I should be glad, therefore, to see the Senator from Alabama let the resolution be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency; and I wish to say to the Senator that if the committee does not report the resolution back within a reasonable time—and I think two or three days would be a reasonable time in this case—I shall be ready to join with him to move to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the resolution, to bring it back to the Senate, and have it taken up at any time when it may receive consideration.

I desire to say further to the Senator that I think the letters which he has read have shown a condition of affairs which the Senate can not afford to let go unnoticed. Whether we are with the Senator or against him in his attack on the Federal Reserve Board is not involved; the question is away beyond that; and we owe it to ourselves to order, and I believe the Senate will order, the right kind of an investigation. If the committee does not do what is right in the consideration of the resolution, we shall have an opportunity in the Senate to make it right, and I believe we can make it right.

Mr. HEFLIN. There is much force in what has been said by my friend from Nebraska, but, for the reasons which I have previously stated, I do not want the resolution referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me further, I desire to say that I was not in the Senate the other day when the vote was taken on his motion to refer the resolution to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but I think that motion was a proper one, because under the law the resolution must eventually go to that committee, and it would have been all right to have sent it there in the first instance. I should be glad to have the resolution sent to that committee, to have it reported back, and pass on it without sending it to the Committee on Banking and Currency; but, as the Senate has once voted against the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I do not really know whether it would be in order again to make the motion to send it to that committee, at least until after the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency should have been disposed of; but all Senators know that before any investigation can take place the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate must have an opportunity to pass on the resolution.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is true, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. I am sorry the resolution was not referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. Had I been present I should have voted with the Senator to refer the resolution to that committee.

Mr. HEFLIN. I followed the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who was presiding at the time I brought up the resolution. He suggested that it should go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. That is the reason I asked that it be referred to that committee. Then opposition to my suggestion was made by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] and other Senators on the other side of the Chamber who were opposed to it going to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but who desired that it be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. I repeat I was merely following the suggestion of the Presiding Officer, who informed me that the reference to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate was the proper and usual course. Senators on the other side of the Chamber now keep the resolution from taking the usual course and are fighting to have it referred to a committee of which the Senator whose speech was circulated is a member, and the chairman of which committee came over and congratulated that Senator on the day on which he made the speech. I am merely making this statement to show the interest which Senators who oppose my motion have in the matter.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], who is chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, in the beginning opposed the creation of the Federal reserve system, and now he and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] are acting in full accord in defense of the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board. It is to the committee of which one of those Senators is the chairman and the other a member that it is now desired by them that my resolution shall be referred for eternal sleep.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not believe the Senate will let the Senator's resolution sleep eternally; but I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama to permit me to submit a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair. If the Senator does not object, I will submit to the Chair this proposition: Is it not necessary under the law that the resolution of the Senator from Alabama shall be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate; and is it not the duty of the Presiding Officer to send it there without any motion being made? In other words, does not the law provide that the resolution shall go to that committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution would require the expenditure of money from the contingent fund of the Senate, and, consequently, under the rules of the Senate, and in accordance with the statute provided, it would have to be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, that inquiry was made the other day when the Senator from Alabama presented his resolution; and, while everybody agreed that the statute required that such a resolution must at some time be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, the question was whether when submitted the resolution should first go to the committee which had jurisdiction of the subject matter or to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that such a matter is entirely in the control of the Senate. The resolution may be sent first to either committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. There is a motion pending, as I understand, to refer the resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion is in order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understand it is the pending motion.

Mr. MOSES. The motion can not be pending at this time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That motion was made by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE].

Mr. HEFLIN. Such a motion was made; that is true.

Mr. MOSES. The motion will be pending when we take an adjournment and the matter comes up again in regular order, but not before then.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senate has adjourned in the meantime.

Mr. MOSES. The Senate has recessed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not before the Senate at this time, but when the resolution is taken up again the motion of the Senator from New Jersey will then be pending.

Mr. HEFLIN. What I mean is that the motion is still pending—that is, it is before the Senate and has not been voted upon.

Mr. NORRIS. The point is that the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency was made, as I understand—I was not here at the time—when the resolution was properly before the Senate. Of course, nobody contends that it can be taken up now except by unanimous consent, because we are in executive session, but when the Senate resumes its legislative session, as it will at some time, I hope—

Mr. LODGE. I hope so.

Mr. NORRIS. Will this motion automatically come before the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. NORRIS. Will it have to be made over again?

Mr. LODGE. Let me explain to the Senator. The motion of the Senator from Alabama was first made in due course and was voted down. Then the motion of the Senator from New Jersey was pending when the Senate went into executive session, and when we came out of executive session into legislative session we took up the unfinished business, and of course the resolution of the Senator from Alabama went to the table.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I should think.

Mr. LODGE. It can not come up again until we have an adjournment, and then it will be reached again in regular order in connection with the routine morning business automatically; that is, the Senator from Alabama may call it up.

Mr. HEFLIN. Then I ask unanimous consent that we take a vote upon the motion of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] as in legislative session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator is ready to permit the resolution to go to the Committee on Banking and Currency, which was the pending motion when the Senate went into executive session, as that would give rise to no debate, I should not interpose any objection; but I can not consent to taking up any subject which will delay the consideration of the treaty now before the Senate, which on account of discussion on all sorts of questions has been very much delayed already. I should like to have the treaty discussed and voted upon.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am ready for a vote now, Mr. President. I do not want to occupy any more time on the resolution if we can have a vote now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not understand whether the Senator from Massachusetts objects to the request for unanimous consent which the Senator from Alabama has made?

Mr. MOSES. I object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, since the Senator from New Hampshire himself has objected, there is nothing else that I can do until Monday, and then I will ask that the resolution may be considered, and will continue to do so each day thereafter until we may have action upon it.

TREATY WITH JAPAN.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty between the United States and Japan with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator, in particular the island of Yap, signed at Washington on February 11, 1922.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to article 1 of the treaty with Japan.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I was advised that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] desired to address the Senate on this matter before it went to a vote. I see the Senator from Maryland has come into the Chamber, and I rose only to occupy the floor until the Senator from Maryland should be able to be present.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I have not announced that I would speak at this time. I am not disposed to discuss the treaty if anyone else is prepared to go ahead, but if a vote is pending I shall be very glad to submit some observations upon the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on agreeing to article 1 of the treaty.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is upon agreeing to article 1 of the pending treaty.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I was not anxious to discuss this treaty at this time, as I really have had very little opportunity to give the matter my study; but I am most unwilling to see such an important measure as this pass through the Senate with no debate whatever upon it to develop the real significance of the measure.

The ratification of this treaty involves a total change in the whole foreign policy of our Government as it has been established since the foundation of the Republic by the fathers. Not only does it involve an alteration in policy, but it involves a plain violation of the great fundamental doctrines of the Republic. Indeed, it involves taking a long step away from Americanism into a field where the perils are unknown and uncomputed.

The very brilliant and eloquent Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] the other day called attention to the fact that Washington's Birthday had gone with no one to rise to pay reverence to that peerless statesman. He called attention to the fact that there seemed to be a disposition to abandon the policies of Washington; and on Tuesday and on Wednesday I served notice that this treaty should not be ratified with my consent on either of those days. I was resolved that if the time had come when the representatives of the Republican Party were ready to consign the great doctrines of the Father of their Country, wrapped in the winding sheet of oblivion, to a grave where they should lie with the bones and ashes of departed heresies, I would rise here and demand that at least three days should elapse after death before there should be interment. Sirs, if the Republican Party ratifies these treaties, it has to live up to the great traditions of the Republican Party.

It is not pleasant for any member of a party to rise and tell the truth when it shall be so distasteful in such a situation, but I say that I hold myself to be one of the most inconspicuous Members of this body; I have no pride of intellect; I have no boast that my services have had anything to distinguish them; but I have one privilege, sir, which every American has: I have the privilege of being able to rise and say that I, humble citizen of the Republic as I am, stand with Washington, stand with Hamilton, stand with Jefferson, stand with Lincoln; and, sir, I shall stand with those men rather than to stand with the men whose policies in this instance are an utter repudiation of all that those men taught.

The debate of yesterday disclosed some very important facts. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] in a most able address called attention to the danger of ratifying this treaty without an examination of the other policies which necessarily must be linked with it. The great Senator from the State of Missouri [Mr. REED]—and I hope he is returned to the Senate—in his own incomparable way brought forward certain considerations. The Senator from Missouri was answered by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who objected to one part of the Senator's argument. He called the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that the Senator from Missouri had said that Yap was a halfway house, and that as a matter of fact the geography of the Pacific Ocean would disclose the fact that Yap was not exactly halfway between the United States and the Philippines. Thus was the powerful argument of the Senator from Missouri answered; and when the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] called attention to the fact that these islands were not Japanese territory, as had been intimated by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], the reply of the distinguished member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the Senator from Minnesota, to the statement of the Senator from Nevada that the territories were not yet Japanese territories was, "Well, if they are not they will be, because these treaties will be ratified."

That was a most remarkable statement. By what authority does the Senator from Minnesota rise in the Senate, before there has been any debate upon the treaties, and say that these treaties will be ratified? Have we ceased to be a Senate? Have we so far forgotten the great prerogatives of this body that we will permit without protest a Senator to rise here, when a great treaty has been brought in, the proponents of which have not even explained it, when there has been no debate whatever, and say that the treaty will be ratified? Who has polled the votes of the United States Senate on this treaty? Is it a party measure, and must it therefore pass?

I deny it. I deny that this treaty is in harmony with any principle either of Hamiltonian federalism or Jeffersonian democracy. Perhaps some of the interests of Minnesota are for the treaty.

This treaty, and all the treaties with it, while they may subserve the interests of a little, narrow group of international bankers in New York, are in violation of the interests of every business man, every farmer, every merchant, every manufacturer in the country.

I greatly admire the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I recognize his great services to the Republic, his great learning, his great knowledge of international relationships; and, feeling as I do toward him, I must confess that I was not greatly surprised when the Senator from Massachusetts submitted this treaty without any very enthusiastic defense of it. The Senator from Massachusetts is well able to discuss all of the problems involved in this treaty, but he did not do so.

What is the reason? I think I can show, before I am through, that even the great Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], that the great Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and many other Senators who are proponents of this treaty, together with some of the highest officials of this Government, have been caught in a great international policy which was launched before they were fully aware of it and from which they have not been able to entirely escape because of the momentum which such a policy carries.

I feel that the time has come when it is important—indeed, indispensable—for us to consider certain very elemental and fundamental facts with reference to the American system of government and the difference between our system of government and all other systems, which make it impossible for us, even though we might wish to do so as a matter of international policy, to adopt this treaty and the other treaties which are an integral part of it.

What is patriotism? What do we mean when we say we are loyal and patriotic? Do we simply mean that we are loyal to the soil of America? Do we simply mean that we are grateful for all material benefits which have been conferred upon our country, and upon those who have been citizens of it, or do we mean something more than that? It seems to me that patriotism is something more than a mere affection of the soil of our country. American patriotism is the love of an idea, of an ideal, of what I believe to be a great world process and purpose; a love, if you please, for the idea and ideal of liberty, and a love for the process and purpose of liberation and for those peculiar institutions which insure to us the unspeakable blessings of liberty, those institutions by the example and through the instrumentality of which we believe, with the fathers, the unspeakable blessings of liberty are to be extended in widening and ever-widening circles, until they shall at last reach the most distant islands of the seas or the remotest shores where dwell the sons of men. That sounds like a generality, but I think I can prove before I have proceeded far by more specific statement that what I have said is not a generality.

When we entered the Great War, we were exposed to a peculiar danger. We were not exposed to the danger that we might be defeated, for we all know that this Republic is invincible; but we were exposed to the danger which should come after the close of the war, for this war, of course, was, in the last analysis, in the beginning but a conflict between great empires. Until we entered it it was nothing more than that. Empire joined bloody battle with empire for more extensive dominions in the world. But when we entered it it became something more than that. It became a struggle for the preservation of our ideal, an ideal which I shall shortly show you is absolutely different and distinctive from any other idea or ideal of government in all the world.

With the close of the war there arose the danger that, since we had joined in actual combat with the other empires, and, as our purposes had during that time been merged with their purposes, the purposes of victory, there was danger that when peace came there might be an effort made to submerge our American ideal of what a peace should be in the imperial ideas of what a peace should be.

Go back over the history of the world, and you will find that every war has been a war inaugurated by imperial ambition, and that every peace which has been made has been an imperial peace, every such peace containing within it the germs of a new conflict. There was very grave danger, indeed, that the great American idea might be submerged, when it came to the making of the peace, in the deep purposes of the empires, for the creation of a new status quo satisfactory to the empires.

That sounds very much like a generality, but it is not. Ever since the signing of the armistice there has been going on a silent, grim, determined, unyielding conflict between two great systems and ideas of government, what I call the system of Europeanism, or imperialism, and what we all know as the system of Americanism. It was a question, after we achieved victory, whether Americanism or imperialism should prevail in the making of the peace, whether there should be new agreements in harmony with the principles of our Government, or whether there should be old agreements in the form of new alliances, between the empires for the preservation of the territories and of the spoils of war.

Should it be necessary now for anyone to arise in the Senate and explain principles of government so simple and so elemental that every American schoolboy should understand them? Should that be necessary? It should not be; but apparently it is. In order to explain the fatal error of this treaty, in order to show that it is out of harmony with our system, need I explain to Senators that the two systems of government prevailing in the world, the two systems which have prevailed since the writing of the Declaration of Independence, are absolutely, diametrically opposed, inconsistent, irreconcilable, as far removed from each other as sunrise is removed from sunset?

Of course, it is very important to understand the old European system, for it is the system which has drawn the map of the world. The old European system, which is the one under which practically all of the nations of Europe except two are now living, holds that the right of government or the right of kings is divine, and of course it follows from that that if the rights of governments and the rights of kings are of divine origin, the authority of government and the authority of kings over the subjects of that government are absolute, and it also follows that the authority or the sovereignty which one government may exercise over another is limited only by the military strength of the government desiring to exercise that sovereignty.

That philosophy of government leads us, of course, to the whole system of imperialism. Under that doctrine there is no reason why any nation should not assert its sovereignty over every other nation and over any and all the citizens of the other nations, if it has the power to do so. But the American system is the very opposite. It holds not that the right of government and that the right of kings is divine, but that men are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among those rights are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to achieve these ends governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, and that constitutions of government are written, not to give to men these rights but to preserve to men these unalienable rights against invasion by their own or by any other government.

Now, unless we understand—and it is perfectly evident that many of the statesmen of our country do not understand this—the elementary principle that the whole system of imperialism is absolutely irreconcilable with the system of Americanism, we can not see the utter repudiation of all American doctrine which is involved in such schemes as this which has been proposed to us, and which, of course, were involved in the old League of Nations scheme.

President Wilson went to Paris, having enunciated before he went there certain great principles which were in harmony with the American philosophy of government, but when he actually reached Paris he was unable to maintain those principles and to secure their recognition in the great conference of empires in which he participated. The peace as represented by the Paris treaty was the same old kind of an imperial peace. They called it, of course, a League of Nations. Those who were opposed to it were asked whether they did not believe that international association and cooperation should take the place of war, and for a time they had almost persuaded many of the most intelligent of Americans, under the specious argument that it would bring us peace, that we should become part of what was nothing more or less than an imperial alliance.

The Republic of the United States was to be invited under the League of Nations—which, by the way, was favored by most of those who are the proponents of this treaty—to become and was to be a member of the alliance, of course, of all the great imperial powers of the world, Great Britain, Japan, France, and, to a less degree, Italy; France, of course, theoretically being a Republic but in reality being an imperial nation. We were asked to join that alliance, and they desired us to join in order that we might become one of the guarantors of the great territories of these empires, which lay in all parts of the world. They wanted our guaranty that what they had taken might be held.

Now, as I said the other day, these treaties present the old League of Nations in another form. What did they wish us to guarantee under the terms of the peace treaty? They wished us to guarantee the tentative arrangement made by Clemenceau, Lloyd-George, and Mr. Wilson on the 6th day of May, 1919, the arrangement as to the disposition of those great territories, covering a large part of the earth's surface, containing valuable resources. They wished us to guarantee the title to these territories to the powers among which these imperial dominions were to be divided.

I shall place in the Record as a part of my remarks the territories and their disposition as settled at that conference. Japan was to get the islands in the Pacific north of the Equator. Great Britain was to get the islands in the Pacific south of the Equator. France to a very small degree and Great Britain to a much larger degree were to get the territories in Africa, the extent of which I showed the other day by a map which hung upon the wall. They wished us to guarantee not only what they had taken as a result of this war, but also what they had taken as a result of all the other wars. As I said, the pending measure proposes to have us do in part what under the League of Nations we were asked to do in entirety. By this treaty we surrender to the Empire of Japan the islands in the Pacific which had been coveted as the result of the war and which were tentatively given to Japan under the agreements which were made in that informal conference by the three gentlemen of whom I have just spoken.

When we ratify the pending treaty we will guarantee to Japan the islands in the Pacific north of the Equator which the League of Nations gave her—indeed, which it was decided should be given to her before the League of Nations was ever signed by three men acting in their individual capacity; that is to say, acting individually, whether they represented each his own Government or in strictly individual capacity.

The questions which I desire to discuss to-day—and I shall be very happy if my observations shall be considered even worthy of notice by the proponents of the treaties—are as to whether, even if we wished to do so, we could transfer these islands to Japan or assent to Japan acquiring sovereignty over them. If we examine carefully the fundamental doctrines of our Government, and if we act in harmony with those doctrines, I maintain that it is impossible for us to alienate our share in the islands, even if we wished to do so. I will state in a moment the essence of my argument, which, it seems to me, is an unanswerable one, proving that we have no power, even if we wished to do so, to alienate these islands and pass them under the sovereignty of another Government.

The doctrine has been well established that, when the United States acquires territory all of the fundamental rights under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States extend to that territory and that every inhabitant of that territory becomes vested with the right to be protected in the enjoyment of those inalienable human rights guaranteed to every individual under the Constitution of the United States. That, of course, means that when, under the Paris treaty, certain territories were transferred in part to us we became obligated to hold them in trust in such a way that the inalienable rights of the inhabitants should be protected until the peoples should be fitted for liberation, or we were obliged to assume a passive attitude of neither affirming our sovereignty nor denying it, but of simply leaving the matter as it was, not questioning or acquiescing in the sovereignty of any other nation over them, but not asserting our own sovereignty. It is not incumbent upon this country to go out like a knight errant battling through the world until there should be realized to all the citizens of all the countries the inalienable rights of liberty which we believe belong to them, but it is also not for us to assent to the holding of these people, by an affirmative act, under the sway of empires which are denying to their subjects those rights.

I have said that there are certain fundamental principles in our Americanism which distinguish it from every other system and doctrine of government in the world. I wish to read some paragraphs from a most valuable work which expresses, in language much better than any language I could possibly use, the fundamental doctrine of this Americanism which makes it impossible for us to pass any people who have become our wards, under any circumstances, under the sovereignty of any empire or any other Government in the world.

As I have said, the essence of the American doctrine, the fundamental principles of the American system, are to be found in the Declaration of Independence. I am quoting from the book of the late Alpheus Henry Snow, one of our most distinguished writers on international law, the American philosophy of government, some paragraphs which bear upon this statement. On page 40 of that book he said:

Taking the Declaration of Independence, therefore, as the exposition of the fundamental principles on which all American political theory is based, and to which all American policy must conform, let me state briefly the general meaning and purpose of this instrument, as I understand it.

Then he goes on to enunciate that these principles are, as I have indicated, the fundamental principles which teach that every man in the world at the time of his creation is vested with certain inalienable rights which belong to him as an individual, which rights can not be taken away from him by any Government without a violation of the fundamental principles of the laws of nature, of the laws which should govern nations, and of the divine law. Of course, from the doctrine of the inalienable rights of the individual there follows the doctrine of the universal right of free statehood. He says:

The conception of the universal right of free statehood is reached in the Declaration through a series of three propositions, each stated to be self-evident, and yet all forming a sequence. The basal proposition is that "all men are created equal." Rufus Choate and John James Ingalls have declared this proposition and the succeeding one that "all men are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," to be glittering generalities. Abraham Lincoln, on the other hand, in his speech at Gettysburg, at the most solemn and stirring moment in the country's history, declared that the proposition that all men are created equal was the foundation idea of the Nation, to which it was dedicated by the fathers.

There are, it is to be believed, many who will be ready and willing to accept as the true statement, which every student of political history must admit to be true, that the philosophy of the American Revolution was a religious philosophy. It is indeed perhaps not too much to say that the period of the American Revolution was the period in which both political and religious thinking reached the highest point, and that there is no question of government which has since arisen which was not either solved by the revolutionary statesmen or put in the process of solution.

The essence of that (the American) philosophy was that man was essentially a spiritual being; that each man was the direct and immediate creature of a personal God, who was the first cause; that each man as such a spiritual creature was in direct and in immediate relationship with God as his creator; that between men, as spiritual creatures, there was no possibility of comparison by the human mind, the divine spark which is the soul being in essence incapable of measurement and containing possibilities of growth, and perhaps of deterioration, known only to God; that therefore all men as essentially spiritual beings were equal in the sight of all other men.

According to this theory, also, the glaring inequalities of physical strength, of intellectual power and cunning, and of material wealth, which are on a superficial view the determining facts of all social and political life, are merely unequal distributions of the common wealth, and each person is considered to hold and use his strength, his talents, and his property for the development of each and all as being essentially equal.

I do not wish to prolong my quotations beyond the point which is necessary in order that I may develop the idea so ably developed by this author, who is one of the most distinguished of our writers upon the American system.

The declaratory act of 1766 brought clearly into comparison the political system of America opposed to the political system of Europe. It was inevitable from that moment that the American system, based on the principles of the Reformation in their broadest sense and in their most universal application and briefly summed up in the proposition that "all men are created equal," must conquer, or be conquered by, the European system, based either on the principles of medievalism, summed up in the proposition that "all men are created unequal," or on a compromise between the principles of medievalism and the Reformation, summed up in the proposition that "some men are created equal and some unequal."

Again:

From the doctrine of equality arising from the common creation of all men by a personal Creator to whom all were equally related, it is declared by the declaration to follow as a "self-evident" truth that there are certain rights which are attached to all men by endowment of the Creator as being the correlative of the inalienable needs of all men, and which, inasmuch as they arise from the universal limitations which the Creator has imposed, are as unalienable as the needs themselves. These inalienable rights are declared to be the rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Of course, the immediate question is as to the bearing of this fundamental doctrine on international relationships, which is the question which we have confronting us in the form of this treaty. Until this doctrine came into prominence in the relationships of nations to each other, nothing of course was considered except the rights of the nations over against one another. The question of the rights which existed between the nations was a question which was in the last analysis decided by war, but with the coming forward of this fundamental doctrine, which was enunciated with the founding of this Government, there arose a new and a better way of viewing all international questions, and it came to be that in every international question that arose not the question of the nations' rights only, and the rights of the peoples in the nations collectively, but the rights of the individuals themselves in each nation must be considered.

For a long time—

As Mr. Snow says in another portion of his work—

the people of each nation, ignorant of foreign affairs by reason of the difficulties of travel and communication, allowed the executive to control the foreign relations under the advice of a council, in the selection of which they had no voice, and representing privileged classes of persons who used the power of the nation as means to accomplish such ends as they thought desirable.

So long as this condition of things was general, the rights of nations occupied the attention of writers. The rights of man, the rights of peoples, and the rights of society in general were ignored, as were the responsibilities which necessarily accompany all rights. Each nation sought to aggrandize itself by conquering and pillaging others, and the only restraint on one nation trespassing upon another was that all of the so-called civilized nations were gradually forced, by the pressure of circumstances, to enter into the playing of a military game of forcible checks and balances called the "balance of power" or the "political equilibrium."

The principle of this game was very simple, though, like most other games, the rules for playing it were very intricate. When any nation, for the purpose of direct gain by pillage of its neighbors, or by despoilment of the natives of barbarous regions, or for the purpose of indirect gain by destroying its competitors in trade or opening up new trading points, desired to conquer adjacent or distant regions—thereby increasing its military and naval strength and paving the way for further expansion—the surrounding nations combined their military and naval strength by alliances until the proposed expansion was balanced and checked or until the opposing nations, or all the nations concerned, were "compensated" by partitioning between them some weak country which had been crushed in the course of the war.

So long as the people of each nation remained unenlightened and were without full power to express their ideas through representative institutions, the war game "of the balance of power" ruled international politics, and international disputes were disputes concerning the "rights of nations," and particularly on points of "national honor." The citizens of each nation had only partial and indefinite rights at home, and citizens of one nation had no rights in another nation or against a foreign Government.

As the people became more enlightened and obtained an increasing participation in their own government by representation and by compelling their governments to be responsible to them, there gradually arose in each nation a popular philosophy of government, in which the rights of individuals, of peoples, and of human society in general were distinguished from the rights of nations.

As I have indicated, if we are to adhere to this fundamental doctrine that all men are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, and if we are to adhere to the principles of the Constitution and to the doctrines enunciated under the Constitution—that all men who come under the sovereignty of the United States have extended to them the protection of their fundamental rights under the Constitution of the United States—it becomes apparent that there is an important constitutional question involved in this treaty.

Under the treaty of Paris we gained, of course, a one-fifth interest in these Pacific islands north of the Equator. We have already announced through the former Secretary of State, Mr. Colby, and through the present Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, that we did acquire those rights, and that we consider that those rights still adhere to us, and that in no way have we renounced those rights by failing to participate in the League of Nations as a member. If this is true, it is also true that by the transference to the five allied and associated powers of these islands a certain amount of sovereignty, one-fifth of the sovereignty over these territories became vested in the United States, and that when that occurred every one of these Malays, every one of the men in the former British colonies in Africa, became vested with the rights which we, ourselves, have, so far at least as their fundamental and inalienable human rights are concerned.

MR. KING. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator an inquiry?

MR. FRANCE. Yes; I yield.

MR. KING. Concede the rightfulness of the Senator's position as a legal proposition, that there was a transference of an undivided one-fifth interest in and to the German colonies, and that by reason of that fact pro tanto those peoples were entitled to our constitutional guarantees. Suppose that Great Britain or France or Italy or Japan, each of them enjoying a like one-fifth interest, should have institutions entirely at variance with our own. Suppose that their institutions permitted slavery and denied the civil and political rights which our institutions guarantee. I am interested in knowing how there could be a reconciliation of those manifest conflicts between the various grantees of the sovereign title, carrying with it, of course, the control over the people.

MR. FRANCE. There can be no reconciliation. The Senator, with his very able mind, has pointed out again that the system of government of the United States and the systems of other countries are absolutely irreconcilable, because we lay down this doctrine of fundamental, inalienable human rights, and they do not. There is no other nation which does lay down that doctrine of inalienable human rights, and, therefore, as I should have gone on to say, there is an irreconcilable difference between the systems; and I shall quote in a moment something which will express that in a very clear way.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator has stated that under the Versailles treaty the United States acquired an undivided one-fifth interest in the island of Yap. I am unable to reach that sort of a conclusion. The document before us contains this language:

Considering that by article 119 of the treaty of Versailles, signed on June 28, 1919, Germany renounced in favor of the powers described in that treaty as the principal allied and associated powers, to wit, the United States of America, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, all her rights and titles over her overseas possessions.

We have no more interest in the island of Yap under that clause than we have in the overseas possessions of Germany throughout the world. All her overseas possessions passed, in pursuance of that article, to the principal allied and associated powers; but, following that, the treaty provided in the covenant of the League of Nations that these overseas possessions were to be mandated in accordance with a plan and program mapped out by the council of the League of Nations. When the council of the League of Nations met the United States was not present and did not participate, and they proceeded to vest mandatory power as to these islands north of the Equator in Japan. Therefore, in pursuance of the article and in pursuance of the Versailles treaty and the covenant of the League of Nations, Japan now has complete mandatory power over these islands, and the United States has nothing except possibly what she had before and what she may have by reason of the articles expressing the mandatory powers of Japan, like all other nations have. We have no more rights there than any other nation has, it seems to me, under that situation. Now, this treaty proposes to recognize what we at present have not—that is, the rights set forth in the various articles, 1, 2, and so forth, of this proposed treaty. I can not see how the United States acquired an undivided one-fifth interest in the island of Yap under the Versailles treaty and the subsequent actions of the council of the League of Nations vesting the mandatory powers over that island in Japan.

Mr. FRANCE. If we have no rights whatever in these territories, will the Senator explain to me why we should be called upon to acquiesce in Japan's taking them? How do we become a party at interest in any way if the doctrine of the Senator is correct? What is the object of our being here debating this proposition, when I would much rather be debating the policies which look to the reconstruction of this country and the rehabilitation of business generally? Why should we be discussing this question if we are not a party in interest?

Mr. FLETCHER. We have this interest: We are seeking now to express precisely the interest which we desire there, in that we are by this convention having recognized as to the United States and the nationals of the United States all the provisions of articles 3, 4, and 5 "of the aforesaid mandate"—that is, the mandate of Japan. Japan recognizes that those articles apply to the United States and to the nationals of the United States, and we secure that recognition by this covenant. Further, it is agreed that—

Japan shall insure in the islands complete freedom of conscience and the free exercise of all forms of worship which are consonant with public order and morality; American missionaries of all such religions shall be free to enter the islands and to travel and reside therein, to acquire and possess property, to erect religious buildings, and to open schools throughout the islands; it being understood, however, that Japan shall have the right to exercise such control as may be necessary for the maintenance of public order and good government and to take all measures required for such control.

That she has under the mandate vested in her through the council of the League of Nations.

Further:

Vested American property rights in the mandated islands shall be respected and in no way impaired.

Existing treaties between the United States and Japan shall be applicable to the mandated islands.

Japan will address to the United States a duplicate of the annual report on the administration of the mandate to be made by Japan to the council of the League of Nations.

We have no right to that unless we provide some way whereby we may be entitled to a copy of that mandate report. Japan has to report annually, to the satisfaction of the council of the League of Nations, what she does in reference to those islands, under the mandate vested in her.

We also secure the following agreement by this covenant:

Nothing contained in the present convention shall be affected by any modification which may be made in the terms of the mandate as recited in the convention, unless such modification shall have been expressly assented to by the United States.

Without that covenant, Japan would simply make her report as to her administration of this island under the mandate to the council of the League of Nations. We are not a party to that. We have declined to participate in that, and so far as we are concerned that council might change the powers and authority of that mandate from time to time. We secure here a covenant that those mandatory powers shall not change or modify the mandate without our consent, as far as Japan is concerned.

Those are some of the things which we obtain under this treaty, to which, without this treaty, we have no right.

Mr. FRANCE. The Senator has made a very clear statement, and one which is very important. He has again indicated what, in my judgment, is perfectly true—that under the provisions of these treaties, which are now coming before us, we assume the obligations of the league without having any of the protections of the league. In other words, we yield our interest in these islands to Japan; and there has been yielded, of course, to the League of Nations the ultimate authority over these islands. Japan by a mere technicality, of course, holds these islands as a trustee for the league, and as a trustee Japan will report to the league as to the progress of these peoples in various ways; but we, not having membership in the league, will have no control whatever over Japan in the exercise of her authority as trustee over these islands.

Mr. FLETCHER. That seems to me to follow necessarily. One of the provisions in the articles of the mandate is a very important one:

ART. 4. The military training of the natives, otherwise than for purposes of internal police and the local defense of the territory, shall be prohibited. Furthermore, no military or naval bases shall be established or fortifications erected in the territory.

That Japan agrees to when she accepts this mandate; but she agrees to that with Great Britain, France, and Italy, and not with us. She has no contract at all with us to that effect; but under the treaty which is now before us she makes article 4 binding on her as to the United States, and, furthermore, she agrees that that article can not be modified hereafter by the council of the League of Nations without the consent of the United States. That seems to me to be a very important factor.

Mr. FRANCE. It is, I will say to the Senator; and the whole thing seems to me to be an impossible arrangement. Personally, although I was very much opposed to our participation in the League of Nations, I think it would be much more consistent for us to enter the League of Nations than to enter such an arrangement as this.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish the Senator would discuss this phase of it: The nations with whom we are going into a four-power treaty are members of the League of Nations, and we are not. What will be the relationship between the League of Nations and ourselves after we shall have ratified this four-power treaty?

Mr. FRANCE. If I answer that question briefly—and answering it briefly, I would also answer it somewhat imperfectly, and in barest outline—I would say that under the arrangement provided by these treaties we guarantee the territory of the members of the league, but they do not guarantee our territory; in other words, we assume the obligations of the league without any of the possible benefits. I wish neither the obligations nor the benefits. I do not want our boys to go to war to protect the rights of any other nation, nor do any Americans need to ask any other nation to come here and help us to protect our rights.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. As I understand the Senator, he thinks we would become a guarantor for the league, or at least a part of it?

Mr. FRANCE. We become guarantors, it seems to me, so far as these territories are concerned. By assenting to Japan acquiring these islands, we do not, of course, guarantee in a general way the title to all the islands, but it seems to me we do guarantee in reality the title of Japan to these islands. Of course, it is useless to say that the language does not justify that interpretation. The nod of a king is a guaranty, and when the great Republic of the United States says to Japan, "These islands are yours; we assent," that is our guaranty, it seems to me.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, coming back to this question of our interest under the Versailles treaty, to which the Senator has referred, and which he seems to think is the basis for the claim we have to an undivided one-fifth interest in the island of Yap, I would ask the Senator if he holds that the United States has a one-fifth interest in all the overseas possessions formerly held by Germany? That would include possessions in Africa and all over the world.

Mr. FRANCE. I do so hold, I will say to the Senator. This is what occurred, if I might give it in outline: It was determined, even before the war ended, that Germany should be deprived of her colonies, provided the allied countries won a victory. I think that may be assumed. Negotiations went on for the writing of the covenant of the League of Nations, and it was agreed, in the provisions of the treaty of Versailles, that all of Germany's overseas possessions, the territories in Africa, the territories in the Pacific, and the cables should be transferred to the principal allied and associated powers. They should, of course, have said "except the United States," because they never intended that we should have any title to any of those territories; but out of courtesy they said, "to the principal allied and associated powers." But before the signing of the treaty, on the 6th day of May, 1919, Clemenceau, Lloyd-George, and President Wilson met and agreed as to how these territories should be distributed. They did not seem to be willing to have the treaty signed until there was a gentlemen's agreement as to the disposition of these colonies.

The treaty was signed, and automatically the title to these territories became vested in the five principal allied and associated powers, and our State Department, through the doctrine enunciated by Secretary Colby and Secretary Hughes, has announced that we still maintain that we have a right to our share in the overseas possessions of Germany. Of course, they had in mind the island of Yap when they enunciated that doctrine; they did not have in mind the African colonies, the other islands of the seas, and the cables. They had in mind only the island of Yap; but the same doctrine which applies to Yap applies to all of these possessions, and until we in some way renounce our right and title to a one-fifth interest in those territories such an interest will inhere in us, and we will have part sovereignty over the territory. We may not exercise it; we may not assert it, but we have it until we renounce it, and this treaty is the practical renunciation of it, so far as Yap and the islands of the Pacific north of the Equator are concerned.

Mr. FLETCHER. Was it not true that in the conference of which the Senator speaks, if there was such a conference, it was agreed that these overseas possessions of Germany should be mandated under the covenant of the League of Nations, and that the manner in which they were to be mandated should be determined by the council of the League of Nations?

Mr. FRANCE. That is true.

Mr. FLETCHER. The council proceeded to determine that, and we had no part in it, and we are not a party to the agreement and acquire no rights except such as might be recognized by further conventions or agreements. We took no part in the proceedings of the council, and we have no right to object to whatever mandatory power this council gave, and they determined to give Japan the mandate for these islands north of the Equator.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, as a question of constitutional law, from what source do we, the Senate, derive authority to put this Government under the obligations of a guarantor of the foreign possessions of any other Government?

Mr. FRANCE. We have no power to do it. There is also no power inhering in this Government to pass any people under the sovereignty of any other nation.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is not claimed that this treaty does that in any way, I take it.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Of course I meant to be understood as referring to the four-power treaty. I regard this as just a thin edge of the wedge. I regard all of them as being part of the same general scheme. We can discuss but one until we get the others.

Mr. FRANCE. It seems to me quite clear that this treaty does do that. So far as we have rights, we confer them upon Japan. Of course, it was the theory of the league that these territories should be held in trust by the countries exercising mandatory power, but, as a matter of fact, as I indicated on yesterday, they are not being held in trust, for it would seem, from the fact that one of the nations has already ceded a certain portion of the territory, that it believes it holds the territory in fee simple.

I had omitted one quotation which has a bearing upon the question asked me by the Senator from Utah. The distinctive doctrines of this Government, as laid down in the Declaration of Independence and in the Constitution, are such that we are in conflict with the other nations, and it is very well expressed here:

The American philosophy of government also stands in the way of codification of international law. No American can consistently with his own fundamental beliefs subscribe to a code of international law which does not contain constitutional prohibitions forbidding to all peoples, nations, and governments certain forms of action dangerous to or destructive of fundamental rights, and which does not make these constitutional prohibitions fundamental and supreme over all international and national law.

Again:

The United States is therefore at the present time in one sense a disturbing factor in the councils of the nations. Its disturbance is not of a physical kind, but of an intellectual and spiritual kind. It brings to the discussion of all international questions ideas of universal law or fundamental rights of the individual as a creative human being, of practical protection of these rights through constitutional prohibitions on all governments based on popular and national recognition of the fundamental law.

That shows very clearly that it is impossible for us to even join in a codification of international law which does not recognize these fundamental principles of our Government. So we could not join with any other nation* in administering a dependency jointly, unless that other nation were prepared to subscribe to the doctrine that every inhabitant of that country, jointly administered in that way, would be guaranteed his fundamental, unalienable rights which become vested in him when he comes under the protection of the Constitution of the United States.

What does that mean in a practical way? It means simply this, that all of these peoples who were transferred from the sovereignty of Germany under the League of Nations, all of the peoples in Africa, all of the peoples in the islands of the sea, when they learned that they had been transferred to the five principal allied and associated powers, of which the great Republic of the United States, holding these fundamental doctrines, was one, had a right to expect the inauguration of a system which would recognize their unalienable rights, and which would give to them the guaranties which they would have acquired if they had become subjects of the United States alone.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

Mr. FRANCE. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I venture to suggest to the Senator, in view of the very splendid doctrine which, as I understand the author, is being enunciated and for which the Senator is contending, that as I understand the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, wherein they have announced in substance that the Constitution does not follow the flag, and in view of the attitude which we take that we may govern conquered territories such as the Philippine Islands and remote possessions practically as we see fit, that the Senator may have to modify the position which he has taken. In Haiti and San Domingo we are exercising, I will not say unrestricted power, but certainly there has not been that due recognition of the principles of our form of Government in the administration of our foreign affairs—I mean with respect to islands and territories which have come to the United States—for which the Senator is so eloquently pleading.

Mr. FRANCE. I will say to the Senator that I am not familiar with the decision of the Supreme Court on that point, but it seems to me to be out of harmony with all the doctrines which I have enunciated and out of harmony with the doctrines which have been practically operative in reference to the Philippines.

I am glad the Senator brought that point up because it gives me opportunity to refer more particularly to that very question. I do not know to what decision the Senator refers, but, of course, it may be one which does not bear squarely on this question. All I can say with reference to a decision like that is that it is not a sound decision.

Mr. KING. I refer, of course, to the decision dealing with the Philippine Islands and decisions by the Supreme Court dealing with the tariff and cognate questions growing out of our occupation of Porto Rico.

Mr. FRANCE. I question the doctrine. Doctrines of the Supreme Court have been questioned before. These fundamental principles, undeniable, have been laid down with the utmost clarity, and I have sometimes been comforted with the great statement of Abraham Lincoln when he could not subscribe to a doctrine enunciated by the court—intellectually, of course, because it became the law of the land and he obeyed it; when he said—

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, may I refresh the Senator's memory? He will remember, I am sure, on further consideration, that Mr. Lincoln ignored the decision of the Supreme Court and would not obey it.

Mr. FRANCE. Well, Mr. Lincoln said:

The people of these United States are the rightful masters of both Congresses and courts, not to overthrow the Constitution, but to overthrow the men who pervert the Constitution.

If anyone attempts to set up the doctrine that a people may become connected with this Republic without immediately coming into the enjoyment of the protection of the unalienable rights guaranteed to all the people under the dominion of this Republic, he certainly is contending for an impossible position. It is untenable; it is unthinkable.

Indeed, our colonial policy—and it is the first great colonial policy ever formulated in recognition of this doctrine of unalienable rights—with reference to the Philippines distinctly recognizes that the Filipinos do become vested with the rights which others enjoy under our Constitution when they come under our sovereignty. I shall be very glad to read at this point, because it is very pertinent, the preamble to the statement of our policy toward the Philippines:

In all the forms of government administrative provisions which they are authorized to prescribe, the commission should bear in mind that the government which they are establishing is designed not for our Constitution or for the expression of our theoretical views but for the happiness, peace, and prosperity of the people of the Philippine Islands, and the measures adopted should be made to conform to their customs, their habits, and even their prejudices, to the fullest extent consistent with the accomplishment of the indispensable requisites of just and effective government. At the same time the commission should bear in mind that the people of the islands should be made plainly to understand that there are certain great principles of government which have been made the basis of our governmental system which we deem essential to the rule of law and the maintenance of individual freedom, and of which they have unfortunately been denied the experience possessed by us; that there are also certain practical rules of government which we have found to be essential to the preservation of those great principles of liberty and law; and that those principles and that those rules of government must be established and maintained in their islands for the sake of their liberty and happiness, however much they may conflict with the customs or laws or procedures with which they are familiar.

In other words, this doctrine of fundamental unalienable rights superseded the Filipino law wherever that law was in conflict with these unalienable rights.

Upon every division and branch of the government of the Philippines, therefore, must be imposed these inviolable principles:

That no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation; that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted with the witnesses against him, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense; that excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel or unusual punishment inflicted; that no person shall be put twice in jeopardy for the same offense, or be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself; that the right to be secure against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated; that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall exist except as a punishment for crime; that no bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed; that no law shall be passed abridging the freedom of speech or of the press—

Why, the Filipinos even acquired, when they came under the dominion of the United States, freedom of speech, something that we have sometimes been denied, illegally.

That no law shall be passed abridging the freedom of speech or of the press or the rights of the people to peaceably assemble and petition the Government for a redress of grievances; that no law shall be made respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, and that the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship without discrimination or preference shall forever be allowed.

Of course, it was quite a revolutionary step for a Government to announce, with the acquisition of a territory inhabited by subject peoples, that those peoples should be given all the protection of human rights enjoyed by the citizens of the Republic.

Now, what is the practical application of this doctrine? It is simply that with the transference of these peoples to the principal allied and associated powers we became to a certain extent a trustee for these peoples, and to a certain extent they became our wards, and the question is whether we have a right to transfer the wards of this Republic to the trusteeship of Japan. I wonder what the American people would really think of this treaty if they understood it. The people of the United States are a Christian people. In every little church all over the land there is a missionary society collecting funds for the cause of missions—collecting funds to extend the boundaries of Christian civilization. What will the people in those churches think, what will the people in those missionary societies think, when they learn that we have adopted a treaty which transfers about 47,000 helpless Malays in the Pacific islands to the trusteeship of Japan? They will read what the Japanese have done to the Koreans, and they will ask the men who vote for this treaty why they voted to transfer to the sovereignty of Japan these helpless people, in view of the history of the Japanese in Christian Korea.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, the Senator will have to admit that under the treaty of Versailles Japan at least has as much title to and as much share in these islands as we have.

Mr. FRANCE. I admit that. Yes; it is true, legally.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not questioning the Senator because I am disagreeing with him, but it seems to me that under the conditions prevailing and recognizing the fact, whether we want to or not, that from the source from which we get our title, whatever it is, Japan gets the same amount from the same source—

Mr. FRANCE. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, she gets in addition to that a sort of quitclaim deed from all the other persons who have any title, except ourselves, in the mandatory that they gave her; so in one sense she has four-fifths and we have one-fifth.

Suppose we make no treaty to do anything—and I concede, according to my idea, it is of very little importance whether we make one or not so far as these islands are concerned. I am sure I do not want the islands nor do I want my country to have them; but suppose we say we will not make any treaty, is it not just the same? What is the difference?

Mr. FRANCE. The difference is that if we make no treaty we have no responsibility, but if we make a treaty and transfer these people to Japanese sovereignty, we will be accountable to the American people for doing it.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but do we shift the responsibility if we do not make one?

Mr. FRANCE. Yes; we do.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, the rights that we have there amount to nothing, if we had any.

Mr. FRANCE. May I ask the Senator what he means by his question as to whether we shift responsibility?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator says if we ratify this treaty we have assumed a responsibility. To my mind we have the same responsibility, whatever it may be, indefinite though it may be, whether we make the treaty or whether we do not. Then I would like to call the attention of the Senator to the fact—it may be a fiction only, but it is true as a matter of law—that Japan has no title except her undivided interest that she may get by the Versailles treaty. As a mandatory, which involves a sort of mortgage, she is getting the right to look after the islands and to take care of the people who live upon them. In theory, at least, it is intended to be for the benefit of the people who inhabit the islands; and she must report to the other nations every year. I take it that the council of the league, if the report were not satisfactory, could bestow that mandatory upon some other nation, if it could get some other nation to take it.

Mr. FRANCE. The Senator is perfectly correct in the position which he takes. In theory these subject peoples became the wards of the five principal allied powers, of which we were one, and responsibility for these wards was vested in those powers by the treaty of Versailles. As trustees they permitted the administration of the various territories by certain of the powers. The territories in Africa were given to the British to administer as trustees for the league; the territories in the Pacific, north of the Equator, were given to Japan, and those south of the Equator were given to Great Britain. In theory, under the doctrine which has been asserted by our two Secretaries of State—Secretary Colby and Secretary Hughes—those countries hold the territories under their mandatory power for us as well as for the nations in the league; but, as a matter of fact, we did not become a member of the league; as a Senate we have never assented to either Japan or to Great Britain taking those territories and administering them as trustees should administer them. We need neither assent to it nor need we question it; but when we do assent to the transference of these, in part our wards, to Japan, we become accountable to the people for whom we do that act; and I believe that we shall be held responsible.

Mr. NORRIS. I am inclined to agree with the Senator. I think we have some responsibility, and we can not shift it. I think, however, that we are improving the situation a little by agreeing to this treaty in comparison with what it would otherwise be; in other words, it is a little bit better, in my judgment, to have Japan as a mandatory of those islands than to have Japan owning them outright. I am inclined to think that there is a difference of substance there, although it may be that in time, as some people think, the mandatory is only going to be a shield for real ownership; but I am assuming that the nations are acting in good faith.

We were in the war; Japan was one of our allies; and while Japan did not do much, except to acquire some territory for herself, and then stop, at the same time we were her ally; we acquiesced in her actions; we went through with it; and when she came to the peace table Japan was as big as anybody, and a little more powerful than a good many other nations that had sacrificed a great deal more than she had. So, whether we like it or not, we were in a position where Japan had the same interest and the same rights that we had, and we could not take them away from her, even if we had wished to do so, without going to war. We should have to fight the world in order to do it. Those rights, indefinite as they might be, whatever they were, she possessed by reason of the treaty and by reason of her being one of the Allies in the war. That being true, at some place she is going to assert her authority. Either these nations are going to get together and divide these islands and all the other captured territory of Germany and give each other deeds for them outright to govern them as they please or they are going to do as was done, give a mandatory to the various nations, which, I think, is an improvement over giving the islands outright. I believe the Senator from Maryland must agree to that?

Mr. FRANCE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. NORRIS. So that, no matter how anxious we might have been to protect any people from the rule of Japan, we were not in a position where we could prevent it. I think we ought to do the best we can, and it seems to me this is doing the best we can.

Mr. FRANCE. But the Senator from Nebraska knows that there is a vast difference between assenting to the sovereignty of an empire over an oppressed people and our denying it. When an empire exercises sovereignty over a people which is being exploited and oppressed, we may deplore that fact but it is not incumbent upon us to go to war in order to correct the condition; in fact, on the contrary, Washington in his Farewell Address practically counseled against that, but expressed the hope that other nations would be persuaded to the adoption of free institutions by the example of this country. He never advocated, however, going to war in order that we might spread the doctrine of this Government at the point of the sword; that was quite contrary to the spirit of Washington; but, I repeat, he did express the hope that in time all of the nations would be persuaded to the adoption of free institutions. It has been the policy of our Government since its foundation neither to assent to oppression nor to go to war to end it; and it seems to me that that should be the policy in this instance. Certain it is that those who vote to transfer these about 47,000 people to the dominion of a great empire will be held accountable by the people when they know what has been done. Whenever I have suggested to those interested in the problem of protecting the rights of backward peoples and in the cause of missionary endeavor the thought that these people were being transferred by our votes to the Empire of Japan, they have seemed to be very much impressed with the force of my argument that we have no right to do it.

Mr. NORRIS. I am impressed with that also, I will say to the Senator. I believe any thinking man who wants to protect these semicivilized races as much as possible from ill-treatment is impressed with it. At the same time it seems to me that we ought to be practical and take things as we find them and as they are, rather than as we should like to have them. I am not satisfied, but I do not know how I can at all better the situation.

It seems to me that when the Senator says that by our votes we are turning them over to Japan he ought also to say we are getting something even for them which they would not obtain if we did not by our votes approve this treaty. I may refer, for instance, to the provisions in the treaty in regard to the missionaries, and also those which require that Japan shall submit to us a copy of the report which she makes every year about these people and how she is treating them. In reality under the treaty she will have to report to us every year, for it is required that we shall have a copy of the report she sends to the council of the League of Nations. So there is a regulation thrown about the whole matter for the protection of these people that would not be thrown around them if we did not approve the treaty. Our missionaries might be excluded, and the Senator, I think, regardless of his religious belief, must know, as we all do, that the missionaries of the Christian churches do a great deal with these people, not altogether along merely religious lines but along the lines of civilization, and those missionaries are going to have a free field to carry on their good work.

Mr. FRANCE. I will say to the Senator that my argument would, I think, tend to disclose the fact that I most heartily believe in the work which is being carried on by missionaries; in fact, the missionary is the pioneer of civilization in every land; but it is a very sad fact to remember that the real effective work of the missionary is generally impeded by the Empire holding sovereignty over subject and backward peoples because—

Mr. NORRIS. I think that may be said of Japan.

Mr. FRANCE. Because missionary work is repugnant to all of the doctrines of imperialism, and here and there, where it dares to do so, imperialism puts out its hand to crush the endeavors of the missionary.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator entirely. From my study of the Korean question I found that cropping out everywhere; that it seemed the Christian missionary was especially selected by the despotic rulers of Japan for persecution and injury; but in this treaty there is a specific provision, which does not exist in the other cases, by which the missionaries of all Christian churches are guaranteed protection to go into these islands and do the pioneer work of civilization.

Mr. FRANCE. But I will say to the Senator that he is in error, in my judgment, in saying that this treaty gives the subject peoples in those islands any additional protection, because, as the Senator will recall when I refresh his memory—he has not perhaps been thinking about this particular aspect of it—the provisions of this treaty are substantially the same as those carried in the covenant of the League of Nations itself. The provisions of that instrument are such that the work of the missionaries will presumably be protected, regardless of any action on our part.

Mr. NORRIS. Those guaranties have only existed for a very short time. They had no application, for instance, to the treatment of missionaries in Korea by the Japanese Government.

Mr. FRANCE. No. They only apply to the peoples in the territories acquired as a result of the war.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. FRANCE. I will say on that point that very large groups of people in England were making a demand, at the time the peace conference was in session at Paris, for the application of the same principles which were announced with reference to mandated peoples to the peoples of all of the territories held by the Empires; in other words, many Englishmen realized the fact that the peoples in the mandated territories might be given greater privileges and more protection than those in the territories which were held by the Empires as the result of previous wars and acquisitions.

There is the practical question. I have tried to lay a foundation for the presentation of this more practical question by saying that we had no right to transfer to the sovereignty of an empire any peoples who had in any way become our wards, either in whole or in part, and, as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Watson] has already indicated by one of his searching questions, we have no constitutional power to do so. We have no constitutional power to transfer from our sovereignty to any other sovereignty any people. We could not, in my judgment, sell the Philippine Islands to one of the empires without violating the fundamental principle of our Government. There are but two things we can do with the Philippine Islands. We can hold the Philippine Islands as a connected State, the peoples of which enjoy the privileges which we enjoy under our Constitution, or we can liberate them. We can do nothing else. We have no power to sell them without violation of the fundamental principles of our Government. In my judgment we can not sell any territory inhabited by a people subject to us without a violation of the very essence of our theory of government.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senator goes a little too far. I agree with him that I would not vote to do it. I do not think we ought to sell them, but our power to transfer them, I think, is a different proposition. The Senator assumes now, it seems to me, that when we take, as we have taken in the World War, and have coming over to us an undivided interest in a certain number of islands, we have therefore no power to transfer whatever rights we possess. The Senator ignores the principle that runs through all legal proceedings—that we must first accept them—and if they are given to us in fee simple our acceptance must be an acceptance in fee simple.

Mr. FRANCE. I will say to the Senator that we have already done that under the doctrine announced by our two Secretaries of State.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think we have. For instance, we have never had possession of them, or anything of that kind.

Mr. FRANCE. But we have announced that we acquired title, and we have asserted that title.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that, I think, is all right; but, in my judgment, it is not an absolute title. Whether we ought to do it or not, I concede, is an entirely different proposition; but it does not seem to me there is any question but that we have the right to do it.

What I rose to do, however, if the Senator will permit me, was to read some of this treaty with regard to these missionaries. It seems to me it is so applicable here that, if the Senator will permit me, I will read just a sentence or two:

Japan shall insure in the islands complete freedom of conscience and the free exercise of all forms of worship which are consonant with public order and morality; American missionaries of all such religions shall be free to enter the islands and to travel and reside therein, to acquire and possess property, to erect religious buildings, and to open schools throughout the islands.

I think that goes a little further than the mandate does.

Mr. FRANCE. I have not the language of the treaty of Paris before me, but I think that is substantially the language of the treaty of Paris.

Mr. LODGE. It gives an absolutely new right that is not in the mandate, and that is the right to build and open schools. I did not venture to correct the Senator, because I knew he was so familiar with it all.

Mr. FRANCE. That right, I think, is an additional right. Of course, if the Senator from Massachusetts states it, it is true, because he has been making a particular study of this question; but my impression, as the Senator from Nebraska read the language, was that it was substantially the language of the treaty, although I am very happy that schools can be opened; it is quite an important concession.

Mr. LODGE. The part about the schools is new and peculiar to our treaty. It also names our missionaries—American missionaries.

Mr. NORRIS. But even if it were the same, it is at least a concession favorable to the inhabitants of the island. That, I think, would have to be conceded by the Senator.

Mr. FRANCE. I should like to ask the Senator, now, this question: Does he subscribe to the doctrine for which I have been contending, that when the United States purchases islands, like the Virgin Islands, for instance, the peoples of those islands become vested by our mere acquirement of them with their constitutional right to the fundamental guaranties of the Constitution? I do not mean rights of suffrage, but I mean to the right to have their fundamental human rights protected by this Government.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the very way the Senator puts the question shows that he is even in doubt about the full proposition himself. They have not any right to that; the Senator does not claim that. He does not claim that they are citizens of the United States by the fact of our acquisition of the territory unless we make them so by legal procedure or by an act of Congress.

I concede that according to my view it would be wrong for us to dispose of them and pass them about from one to another. According to the principles of international law, however, as they have grown up, unless recent events have modified them, they can be transferred, and have been in a great many instances. I do not agree with the proposition that that is right. I agree with the Senator that no people ought to be transferred from one nationality to another without their consent.

Mr. FRANCE. I think the doctrine is very clear as I have already stated it, and I have supplemented my statement with quotations from an eminent authority, that when a people comes under the sovereignty of the United States the inalienable human rights of those people are then subject to protection by the United States; and not only does that seem to be the case as a matter of principle, but we have actually announced, so far as the Philippine Islands are concerned, that it is our doctrine and that we do hold that the peoples of the Philippine Islands, as I have already shown by quoting the preamble to the proclamation of our policy with reference to the Philippine Islands, did become vested with the right to have these inalienable rights of theirs protected by this Government when they come under our sovereignty.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask the Senator a question about the Philippine Islands. If the Senator's doctrine as I understand him to advocate it is true, how are we going to give the Philippines their independence?

Mr. FRANCE. We can do that; but, if the Senator will allow me to proceed, I will complete my question.

If that doctrine is true, that they do become vested with these rights, we have, then, no power to take away these rights from them. We can set them up as an individual, self-governing, sovereign State if we please, but we have no right to pass them under the sovereignty of an empire which would deny them those inalienable rights. That seems to me to be very apparent. Is not that true in the Senator's judgment?

Mr. NORRIS. I think technically we could do differently. The Senator is entirely right, in my judgment, as a moral proposition. I would not vote for, and I think we would disgrace our nationality, our flag, our Government, if Congress passed an act by which we would turn the Philippines, for instance, over to Japan or any other Government.

Mr. FRANCE. Yes. That is the principle for which I am contending, that we can not do it.

Mr. NORRIS. But I do not believe there is any doubt about the fact that we have the technical right to do it.

Mr. LODGE. There is no doubt whatever of the technical right, but we should not do it. There is nothing whatever in the Constitution about it.

Mr. FRANCE. There is nothing in the Constitution about it; but it would be repugnant to our whole theory of government to hold that these people may become a part of our Government, entitled to the protection of their inalienable rights under our Government, and then, after they have acquired the right to have these inalienable rights protected, we have a right to sell those rights away from them. It is an impossible doctrine, and yet that is exactly what we are doing in this case. We are doing that very thing. We are actually selling under the sovereignty of an empire peoples who technically have become in part our wards; and we are not only doing that, but we are passing them under the sovereignty of a non-Christian empire, which denies all of the fundamental doctrines which have been wrought into the Constitution of this country, which, as I have told you by quotation and by my own words as clearly as I could, are founded upon the principles of religion which the Japanese deny. I say, Senators, that it is a very serious thing for us to be ratifying a treaty which passes a people who have become in part our wards into the sovereignty and charge of an empire which denies not only the doctrine of unalienable rights but the great religious truths which underlie that doctrine.

Mr. President, I am not anxious to proceed further if the Senator from Massachusetts is willing to take a recess or adjourn.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am not anxious to stop. I should like to go on and get something done, and consider, if possible, the article which is now before us. I have no desire to hurry the Senator, but I think it is only fair that he should discuss the treaty, if he will not let us vote on it.

Mr. FRANCE. I will say to the Senator that I am very anxious to get something done—so anxious to get something done that I deplore the bringing of these treaties before the Senate when there are great, vital problems to be settled. I might refer, for example, to the coal miners of Maryland, some of whom are in desperate need, because they are out of work. They are out of work because the mines are closed down, because the industries are closed down. I should like something done with reference to looking after our foreign trade in the interest of our farmers and in the interest of our manufacturers. I have a number of measures which have been before the Foreign Relations Committee which I shall discuss shortly, and which I think might at least have been helpful in this direction. I should very much have preferred to have something helpful done instead of having these treaties come before the Senate; but they are here, and there is a disposition to press them, and I feel that they should not be ratified until these very important questions involved in them have at least been discussed by the committee members.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

Mr. FRANCE. I was not unaware of the remark made by the Senator from Massachusetts to the effect that I knew all about these treaties. I do not. I am not a member of the committee. I should not have thought of questioning the judgment of the committee on these treaties if I had not almost in an instant perceived them to be, in my judgment, in clear violation of the fundamental principles which I am compelled as a Senator here to defend so long as I am a Senator.

I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I will say frankly that I do not like this treaty any more than I like any of the treaties which have come from the Washington conference, one of which, at least, I shall probably vote against; but I want to get the view of the Senator on this aspect of this case:

The islands in the Pacific north of the Equator were mandated to Japan. The treaty of Versailles, as the Senator has stated, contained an article of renunciation of title upon the part of Germany, in behalf of the allied and associated powers, to her overseas possessions. I think I agree with the Senator from Nebraska, if I understood him correctly, that that renunciation of title was to nations to hold in trust, rather than to hold the title in fee simple, unrestricted and unrestrained, and that trust was determined by the provisions of the covenant of the League of Nations and such regulations as might be prescribed by the council pursuant to the authority therein contained.

The allied and associated nations, except the United States, ratified the treaty; we did not. They proceeded to regard the islands as subject to the trust, so Japan was awarded a mandate over those islands; and the other three nations—that is, Great Britain, France, and Italy—have recognized her mandate and have participated in those acts which constitute her mandator.

What are we to do? It is a fait accompli. The islands now are in the possession of Japan. Her possession is recognized by the League of Nations, consisting of 51 nations; it is recognized by Great Britain, by France, and by Italy, and, of course, recognized by Japan. What shall we do? Shall we fight Japan? Shall we assert a title to the islands in hostility to the mandated rights of Japan, to say nothing of any possible rights which she may have by reason of the treaty other than the mandated rights? Shall we keep this sore open and assert that we have some sort of an inchoate title which we may assert at any time in the future; or shall we rather, in the interest of comity and good will, and to avoid any possible controversy, and in our own interest, because we get interests in the island of Yap, settle the controversy once and for all? What would the Senator do? If we reject this treaty, what substitute does the Senator offer? Has he anything better to suggest?

Mr. FRANCE. I will say, in answer to the Senator's question, that we gain nothing under this treaty. We had certain rights which we could continue to exercise in Yap until they were questioned by Japan, and they would not be questioned by Japan until Japan was prepared for war. We gain no rights under this treaty, which I can ascertain, which we did not enjoy before.

Mr. LODGE. We had no rights there, and exercised none of any kind.

Mr. FRANCE. Simply in the cable.

Mr. LODGE. We never had a cable there. There was the Dutch cable there. We had no cable there at all, and never had anything there of any kind, so far as I can discover.

Mr. FRANCE. It is true we had no cable on the island of Yap, but we had a cable on Guam.

Mr. LODGE. Guam was ours, and we have it.

Mr. FRANCE. The German cables, which we use and which are our only way of reaching the Orient, of course land upon the island of Yap.

Mr. LODGE. We have a cable of our own which runs from Guam, thence to the Philippines, thence to China, which is wholly in our own control, and gives us direct communication. The Dutch cable, as it is commonly called, runs to Mindanao, thence to Yap, thence to Guam, and thence to Shanghai, until it was transferred during the war; but we have never exercised any right of any kind over Yap, or had any privileges there of any sort whatever.

Mr. FRANCE. Of course, as the Senator well knows, we have asserted that we did have a right in Yap in the exchanges between the powers.

Mr. LODGE. We claimed that in all the overseas possessions of Germany we had an undivided one-fifth part, and the undivided fifth part of each of the other five powers has been transferred to Japan. Three of them have settled it with Japan, and Japan made it four. We are settling with Japan for the islands north of the Equator by this treaty, which is a recognition of our undivided fifth part. Those islands we could have had for the taking in 1898, and we deliberately refused to touch any of them except Guam. We deliberately returned them to Spain.

Mr. FRANCE. I do not think we wish to acquire full sovereignty over these islands, I will say to the Senator, but a refusal to acquire sovereignty and a recognition of the sovereignty of another nation are two quite separate and distinct things.

Mr. LODGE. We agreed to the sovereignty of Germany.

Mr. FRANCE. Yes; we did, just as we agreed, in a large measure, to the sovereignty of any empire over its territory as long as we did not question it.

Mr. LODGE. We recognized it formally, and corresponded with Germany in regard to certain rights we had there. I do not want to trouble the Senate by going over all that.

Mr. FRANCE. I am very glad to have the Senator contribute that point of information, because I did not know to what extent we had recognized the rights of the Germans in those islands.

Mr. LODGE. I stated it all here.

Mr. FRANCE. One of the purposes of this debate is to bring out points like those to which the Senator has referred. Does the Senator wish further to interrupt me? If so, I should be glad to yield.

Mr. LODGE. No. The correspondence went through Spain, and we received the assurances through Spain when she ceded the islands to Germany.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I will say that I have proceeded with the discussion of this subject hoping that it would arouse a certain amount of debate upon this most important question. I have no desire to unduly delay the consideration of these treaties, but I do ask that they shall be considered fairly and with open minds by the Senate. I would like to have the difficulties which present themselves to my mind explained away, if they can be explained away. There is no reason why I should be in opposition to these treaties, if they are such treaties as I feel we should ratify. I have no personal interest in them whatever. I only wish to see a policy adopted which shall be in conformity with the great doctrines of our Government and with its fundamental principles. If I can stimulate a debate, I shall certainly be very happy.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have no desire to press the treaty unduly, or to press the Senator from Maryland or any other Senator. This treaty, which is an extremely simple one, has been considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations; it has been before the Senate, it has been read, statements have been made in regard to it, and all I desire is to be fair to other Senators, and not hold them here indefinitely over this treaty. I should like to get some agreement to vote upon it at some reasonable time. I know of only two Senators who desire to say anything about it, and they will have an opportunity, of course. They will speak briefly, and then allow us to vote. If the Senator from Maryland would allow us to vote at some time, of course I should be glad.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I have been able to give this treaty enough consideration to be fully persuaded that I shall vote against it, and my only desire was to present to the other Senators some of the difficulties which exist in my own mind with reference to the treaty. It was my thought that perhaps some explanation in defense of the treaty would be presented by its proponents.

Mr. LODGE. I thought I explained everything in it. I evidently have failed even to convey a slight idea of it to the Senator from Maryland, and I can not explain it any better than I have done. That is my misfortune, and not his fault, of course.

All I desire to do now is to get a vote on the treaty. If the Senator will allow us to have a vote some time on Monday, it will save a good deal of time. I do not desire to be unreasonable about it at all, but there are many other matters pressing for decision, and, unless I am greatly mistaken, nine-tenths of the Senators and more would like to dispose of this treaty one way or the other. I am not undertaking to say how they shall dispose of it.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not insist upon proceeding to-night.

Mr. LODGE. I only want to dispose of as much of the debate as I can. I am perfectly willing, if I can get an agreement for a vote on Monday, to have the Senate adjourn or to take a recess at once.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I have not consulted with Senators on this side, and I have no authority to speak for anyone but myself. Therefore, Mr. President, I hardly know what to say to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. We could ask for a time at which to vote.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Would an agreement as to a time for a final vote on the treaty necessitate the calling of a quorum?

Mr. LODGE. The rule applies only to a bill or joint resolution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know the rule provides that a quorum shall be called when an agreement is asked for a final vote on a bill or a joint resolution.

Mr. LODGE. It does not provide for treaties at all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. So it will not be necessary to call for a quorum?

Mr. LODGE. It will not be necessary.

Mr. GERRY. I think we would have a quorum call.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, anyone is at liberty to call for a quorum if he chooses to do so.

Mr. GERRY. I think if such an agreement were offered it would be only proper to call for a quorum.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to any Senator calling for a quorum, but I do not want to have a quorum called and put Senators to the trouble of coming here if the Senator from Maryland is going to object anyway. In that case there is no use going through that form.

Mr. GERRY. Certainly not.

Mr. FRANCE. Certainly it would be useless to call Senators here to consider a treaty if they do not propose to consider it.

Mr. LODGE. I think other Senators can be trusted to make up their own minds about that. It seems to me that that is something which they can determine for themselves. If other Senators are willing to vote, why should not the Senator from Maryland permit them to vote?

Mr. FRANCE. It was my thought that the Senate should consider the treaty. So far there has been very little debate, except debate in opposition to the treaty. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] on yesterday made a most able argument; the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] made a most able argument; the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] has made several most able arguments against the treaty, and not one of those arguments has been met by the proponents of the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. I have explained it, and explained over and over again all the points of importance, because I thought it necessary. It seems to me the explanations in favor of the treaty have been made again and again. If the friends of the treaty are willing to let it go to a vote, it seems to me that is their affair.

Mr. FRANCE. The friends of the treaty would be very glad to have it go to a vote before the people of the country really understand the issues involved in the treaty. I think it very unwise.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, if the Senator declines to let Senators judge for themselves, and declines to allow them to vote, and proposes to delay it as much as possible, I have no choice. Under the rules of the Senate he can do that. All I can do is to keep the Senate in session as long hours as I can, until we reach a vote.

Mr. FRANCE. I feel quite certain, I will say to the Senator, that it will be impossible to get a unanimous consent agreement at this time to vote upon the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. That is what I supposed. That is the reason why I am not going to present the request.

Mr. FRANCE. But I am under the impression, if the Senator will permit the debate to proceed in the ordinary way, without attempting to force the treaty, that he can dispose of it.

Mr. LODGE. What does the Senator mean by suggesting that I am trying to force the treaty? I have no power to force the treaty. I have kept it before the Senate. I propose in the fulfillment of my duty to keep it before the Senate. I am not forcing it. I should be glad if the Senate could be relieved from the waste of time taken in needless debate and if Senators would be allowed to vote. That is all I ask.

I have not tried to stop anyone from speaking on the treaty. I do not propose to do so. I have not the power to do it. But I do propose, which is the only thing I can do, to keep the treaty before the Senate and try to get a vote, as I think I shall eventually.

Mr. FRANCE. Yes; I think there will ultimately be a vote upon the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. I believe so.

Mr. FRANCE. Of course, I think it might possibly be clear to the Senator what I intended to say when I referred to his forcing the treaty. Ordinarily when a treaty of this importance comes before the Senate it is upon the calendar for a reasonable time before it is taken up. The Senator is quite well aware of the fact that he hoped to press the treaty and have it ratified on Tuesday last, and then on Wednesday, and that it would have been ratified before this time if it had not been that some of us felt there should be some discussion of it.

Mr. LODGE. I should have been very glad if that could have been done. I had no power to force it because I knew the views of the Senator from Maryland. He had taken pains to tell me what his intentions were. So I had no hopes of doing it. I merely desire to do what is most convenient for the Senate. I do not care to keep the Senate here late hours and keep Senators up, as I shall be obliged to do next Monday. I shall ask the Senate then to sit in the evening and continue the discussion. I was in hopes that the Senator from Maryland might be willing to let us reach a vote, which I think is the desire of a great majority of the Senate; but if he is not willing to let us reach a vote, we will go on with the debate.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I will say that I had not contemplated discussing the treaty at all. I am not a member of the Foreign Relations Committee. I had expected that those who are much better qualified than I am to discuss it would discuss the treaty fully. I thought we would hear from several members of the Committee on Foreign Relations on the majority side, and that then there would be a counterdebate on the minority side, and that I might be able to form an opinion during the course of that debate as to how I should vote. I have no desire to participate in the debate on a treaty of this character if there can be a discussion by those whose function it is to discuss it.

Mr. LODGE. Senators can not regulate their debate to oblige the Senator from Maryland. If they do not desire to discuss the treaty, they are not bound to discuss it just to gratify him. Each Senator has the same right that he has to decide what he shall do. I can not undertake to get up a debate for that purpose.

Mr. FRANCE. I appreciate the implied expression of friendship on the part of the Senator. He implies that if he could arrange such a debate for my delectation he would do so.

Mr. LODGE. I should be delighted to do so, if it would shorten the time of debate and let the Senate come to a vote and do business.

Mr. FRANCE. I really did not wish to presume on my friendship for the Senator by asking him to arrange a debate for my amusement and interest. However, I do know, as a matter of fact, that quite a number of Senators desire to debate the question.

Mr. LODGE. What has prevented them?

Mr. FRANCE. They have not had time to prepare themselves for the debate. As a matter of fact, the Senator very well knows that I took the floor this afternoon—and I think it must be apparent to all—without having had an opportunity to properly prepare myself for a discussion of the great questions involved in the treaty. I did it merely as a matter of duty in order that other Senators might have an opportunity to prepare themselves for the debate which I am sure will ensue later on.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, while I do not agree with the Senator from Maryland on the treaty, I do not want his statement to go unchallenged that his debate this afternoon has not been enlightening or entertaining and that he is just killing time with it. The Senator says he was not prepared. I do not believe anyone who listened to him would get that idea. I have listened to him, I think with a great deal of edification, and I know with a great deal of satisfaction, although I could not agree with the Senator. I think he has made a very important and illuminating address this afternoon. If the Senator was not prepared and is just killing time, I should like to hear him some time when he is prepared and is not killing time.

Mr. FRANCE. I will say to the Senator that his remarks prove how good it is to have a friend. As a matter of fact, there is very much more in the treaty than appears upon the surface. The whole question of the duties of an advanced nation toward a backward people is involved. The question of how the aboriginal people should be treated, whether they should be treated as wards and whether there should be international cooperation in protecting and advancing the welfare of aboriginal people, is involved. All those questions are involved in this treaty. I have not been able to discuss them, because I have not had an opportunity thoroughly to prepare myself for a discussion of all the questions involved in the treaty.

Personally it is a very great question as to whether or not all of the subject peoples in these territories that formerly belonged to Germany should be treated as international wards of the advanced nations. The question as to whether the policy of establishing mandates is a wise one is involved. There are very many questions involved which I have not been able to discuss.

Then, of course, there is the relationship of this treaty to the four-power treaty, and that is a very important matter. This treaty does not stand by itself. It is a part of a great international policy which is being inaugurated, a policy similar to that which would have been inaugurated by the League of Nations if we had participated in it, a policy which in my judgment has great issues involved in it even though they may not appear on the surface.

I presume the Senator from Massachusetts will be willing to adjourn at about 5 o'clock, the usual hour?

Mr. LODGE. When the Senator from Maryland gets through I shall be willing to take action.

Mr. FRANCE. Of course, it is needless to say that I would feel very much relieved if the Senate would take a recess now. I am quite persuaded that my good friends, the Senators who have done me the honor to remain here and upon whom I have inflicted myself this afternoon, would be very happy to be relieved, and we could all be happy together.

Mr. LODGE. Whether there is to be a recess a few minutes sooner or later, seems to me unimportant. I happen to be charged with a duty which I think I shall fulfill to the best of my ability. I have no desire to be unreasonable with the Senate at all. I am perfectly willing, in fact I have no choice. I only desire to give notice that I shall ask the Senate to sit on Monday evening, and I now give notice to that effect.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Before the Senator moves a recess will he yield to me to make a report?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

STATUE OF GEN. E. KIRBY SMITH.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As in legislative session, from the Committee on the Library I report back favorably with an amendment the concurrent resolution, H. Con. Res. 42, and I call the attention of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] to it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

The amendment was, on line 3, to strike out the word "people" and insert the word "State," so as to make the concurrent resolution read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the thanks of Congress be given to the State of Florida for the statue of Gen. E. Kirby Smith.

Resolved, That the statue be accepted in the name of the United States, to remain in the Statuary Hall in the Capitol of the Nation, and that a copy of these resolutions, suitably engrossed and duly authenticated, be forwarded to his excellency the governor of the State of Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, before the adoption of the concurrent resolution I wish to submit a few remarks on the subject.

Gen. Edmund Kirby Smith was born at St. Augustine, Fla., May 16, 1824, and died at Sewanee, Tenn., March 28, 1893.

His father, Joseph Lee Smith, and mother, who before her marriage was Frances Marvin Kirby, came to Florida from Connecticut, where the father was a prominent lawyer, in 1821, having resigned as colonel of the Third United States Infantry in 1818. He had served as a commissioned officer, major and colonel, in the War of 1812. He was appointed judge of the United States District Court for Florida in 1823, and served in this position until 1837. From 1838 to 1845 he was a Delegate in Congress from the Territory of Florida.

Edmund Kirby Smith graduated from West Point Military Academy with honor in 1845—among the first appointees from Florida. He was given the brevet rank of second lieutenant of Infantry, and saw his first active service in the Mexican War, in which he was twice breveted for gallantry, first at Cerro Gordo and then at Contreras.

He was assistant professor of mathematics, following this war, at West Point Military Academy from 1849 to 1852.

In 1855 he attained the rank of captain and was assigned to the Second United States Cavalry, serving on the then frontier at Fort Atchison, Tex., and was wounded in an engagement with the Comanche Indians. The Legislature of Texas gave him a unanimous vote of thanks for his services and the conspicuous gallantry displayed in that battle.

Early in 1861 he was promoted to the rank of major, but when his native State of Florida withdrew from the Federal Union he resigned his commission.

He was appointed a lieutenant colonel of cavalry in the Confederate Army by President Jefferson Davis April 6, 1861.

In 1862 he was made a lieutenant general, and a full general, the highest rank in the Confederate Army, in 1864.

He was wounded at the first Battle of Manassas, or Bull Run, and was subsequently placed in command of the Department of East Tennessee, to wit, in 1862. He led the eastern wing in advance of the army under Gen. Bragg, which marched into Kentucky in the late summer and early fall of 1862. In August of that year the force under his command gained a signal victory over a much larger force of the Army at Richmond, Ky.

The Congress of the Confederate States on February 7, 1863, unanimously passed a resolution of thanks to Gen. Smith for his matchless display of skill and bravery in conducting his part of that campaign.

In 1863 he was placed in command of the Trans-Mississippi Department, covering Texas, a large portion of Louisiana, Arkansas, New Mexico, and the Indian Territory. He organized and disciplined a fighting force, provided and enforced a system of government over the country, established factories, machine shops, salt works, and other industries, and supplied his army with clothing, rations, and essential munitions of war.

The Legislature of Texas, May 24, 1864, adopted a joint resolution thanking him for victories gained in Louisiana and Arkansas.

His army was the last Confederate force to surrender.

In 1870 he accepted the chancellorship of the University of Nashville, and so continued until 1875.

He was tendered the chair of mathematics at Sewanee, the University of the South then, and held that position until called to take his place with the mighty hosts of heroes and sages who have gone before, March 28, 1893.

He married Cassie Selden, of Lynchburg, Va., whom he met while recovering from severe wounds he received in the first Battle of Manassas. She died at Sewanee, Tenn., in 1907, at the age of 69, having survived the general 14 years. Eleven children blessed their union, all of whom have proven the truth of the old saying that "blood counts," and all now are living but one, John Selden Kirby Smith, who died at the age of 45, leaving a widow and six children.

When the War between the States was over Gen. Kirby Smith, like Gen. Lee, devoted his great abilities, his superb talents, his lofty example to that profession which is second only to the ministry, that of the teacher. The monetary remuneration was meager, but the work was noble and had its reward in the benefits to the youth of the land.

The act of Congress, to wit, section 1814 of the Revised Statutes, provides as follows:

Sec. 1814. Suitable structures and railings shall be erected in the old Hall of Representatives for the reception and protection of statuary, and the same shall be under the supervision and direction of the Chief of Engineers in charge of public buildings and grounds. And the President is authorized to invite all the States to provide and furnish statues, in marble or bronze, not exceeding two in number for each State, of deceased persons who have been citizens thereof, and illustrious for their historic renown or for distinguished civic or military services, such as each State may deem to be worthy of this national commemoration, and when so furnished the same shall be placed in the old Hall of the House of Representatives, in the Capitol of the United States, which is set apart, or so much thereof as may be necessary, as a National Statuary Hall for the purpose herein indicated.

In pursuance of this law the State of Florida has placed in the National Statuary Hall, in the United States Capitol, two statues, one, in 1914, of John Gorrie, M. D., inventor of the ice machine and mechanical refrigeration (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, February 6, 1914, concurrent resolution No. 32), and one of Gen. Edmund Kirby Smith, in 1918, mentioned in concurrent resolution No. 42, just reported; the first a memorial to a benefactor of mankind, a physician, and scientist, illustrated for distinguished civic services, and the second as Florida's memorial to her most distinguished soldier.

Both are the works of a citizen of Florida, Mr. C. A. Pillars, a sculptor student of Lorado Taft, whose genius and talent are shown by these statues, which, I believe, will be conceded to be unexcelled by any in that famous hall, one in marble and the other in bronze.

No action by Congress is necessary, but it is well and proper to recognize what has been done by the State, and to place of record the facts showing how the State has exercised her choice, and the manner in which she has availed herself of the privilege granted by Congress of perpetuating the memory of two of her distinguished sons, and thus being herself represented in National Statuary Hall.

Mr. President, I ask that the resolution be concurred in, and that the report of the House committee be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida that the report of the House committee be printed in the RECORD? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The report referred to is as follows:

[House report No. 695. Sixty-seventh Congress, second session.]

STATUE OF GEN. E. KIRBY SMITH.

Mr. LUCE, from the Committee on the Library, submitted the following report to accompany House concurrent resolution 42.

The Committee on the Library, to which was referred the resolution (H. Con. Res. 42) thanking the people of Florida for the statue of Gen. E. Kirby Smith, having considered the same, report thereon with the recommendation that the same do pass.

Pursuant to section 1814 of the Revised Statutes of the United States providing for the erection of statues in the National Statuary Hall, United States Capitol, the State of Florida, in 1918, presented to the United States Government the statue of the late Gen. E. Kirby Smith, which was placed in National Statuary Hall, where it now stands.

The accompanying resolution of acceptance is within keeping of the policy heretofore established, by expressing officially the thanks of Congress to the State presenting such statue.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of the House of Representatives as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

KOREAN APPEAL FOR INDEPENDENCE.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask that there be printed in the RECORD, in 8-point type, a communication addressed to the people of Korea by the Korean mission to the Conference on the Limitation of Armament which recently adjourned.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The matter referred to is as follows:

KOREAN MISSION TO THE CONFERENCE ON LIMITATION OF ARMAMENT, Washington, D. C., February 20, 1922.

To the people of Korea:

The Korean mission to the Conference on Limitation of Armament respectfully submit for your consideration the following report of its efforts to direct the attention of that conference toward Korean affairs.

Realizing that the case of Korea presented a Far Eastern problem of the first magnitude, whose solution must precede or attend any lasting settlement of oriental affairs, and having in mind the initiation of the conference by the President of the United States, we deemed it proper to prepare and present a petition to the American delegation immediately after their appointment and in advance of the assembling of the conference.

Summarizing the outstanding features of Korea's annexation by Japan, reciting the covenants of Korea's treaties with the United States and other members of the conference, pledging their good offices to her in the event she should be unjustly dealt with, and invoking these covenants in her behalf, we respectfully requested the delegation to lay our petition before the conference for its formal consideration. Certain members of the delegation acknowledged its receipt, but did not otherwise manifest any concern.

When convinced that this initial effort was unavailing, the mission prepared a second and more elaborate application to the conference, praying for an audience and offering to submit the cause of Korea to its deliberate judgment. Copies of this application were delivered personally to the secretary of the conference, accompanied by a request for their distribution among the members. Whether this request was complied with the mission does not know. But its presentation was not acknowledged, and, as far as the mission is able to state, it was never considered.

Late in the sessions of the conference and after public announcement that its labors were approaching a close, the mission prepared a third and last request for recognition. Copies of this request were also personally delivered to the secretary, and by him sent, presumably by instruction, to the offices of the Secretary of State, where they now are, if they have not been otherwise disposed of. They were never delivered to the delegates.

In the meantime the mission had received a memorial direct from Korea, executed by duly elected representatives from each Province or district, and by authorized executives of 52 societies and guilds, petitioning the conference to give a hearing to this mission on behalf of Korea.

The original of this memorial was filed with the secretary general of the conference, together with 100 printed translations and facsimiles, but its receipt was never formally acknowledged.

The conference adjourned without hearing or heeding Korea. The results of its labors are embodied in six treaties which assume to rescue the eastern world from the contingencies of war. These we shall not review nor criticize, beyond the assertion that the conditions concededly making for war when the conference was called, and to remove which it was designed to accomplish, are as active and sinister when it was dissolved as they were when it was organized.

Japan is still in Manchuria and Mongolia. The only 16 of her 21 demands ever forced upon China remain undisturbed. Her armies still occupy Sakhalien and Siberia, and she still holds Korea in thralldom. All lines of communication in these regions are under her control. She has not wholly surrendered those of Shantung. The doors of eastern Asia may be open, but they are sentinelled by Japan, and none can enter within or pass without them save by her permission.

Immune from the restraints of a powerful and increasing American Navy, relieved from the probability of fortresses in the Pacific seas, buttressed by a four-power treaty, commanding every passage between the islands to the Asiatic mainland from Sakhalien in the north to Formosa in the south, Japan emerges from the conference far more powerful than when she entered it. She is the dominating power in Asia. There are none to question, much less to dispute, her supremacy. She is isolated from the other great powers by vast stretches of land and sea, and these have become her allies. The only limitation placed upon her expansive militarism is the mutual reduction of capital ships made obsolete by the airplane and the submarine. Korea is prostrate, and China is at her feet. Her methods of economic penetration, systematized by years of experience, may now be applied with impunity, and political control must inevitably follow. Henceforth, Japan means Asia; and Asia, under Japanese hegemony, may in time recall and repeat the career of Genghis Khan.

Against this prospect looms only the inertia of Korea, China, and Asiatic Russia. Korea has been overrun. She is in chains, but she is not conquered. Rebuffed by the nations whose covenants she holds, Korea will continue as best she can her struggle against Japanese domination. She is disarmed and physically helpless. But the soul of the nation survives and can not be subdued. Her thralldom, though complete, is not altogether discouraging. It is a constant reminder and a perpetual warning to China and to Siberia of the fate which is designed for them. It serves to keep alive their need for sleepless vigilance. And it may serve to distract the policy and shatter the ambition of the one surviving autocracy of the twentieth century.

The new state of mind which is said to underlie the treaties negotiated by the conference can not contribute to the cause of peace if it is not impartial. If designed to promote the welfare of the world by banishing war from its confines, it must recognize and apply to all peoples the obvious attributes of national integrity and political independence. These can not be conceded to some races and denied to others. They can not be extended to China and withheld from Korea. The right of self-government is no more essential to China than to Korea. The former is far more formidable in population and in territory. The latter is, nevertheless, as distinctive and deserving. The new state of mind which goes with China but stops with Korea seems akin to the policy of disarmament which discards the battleship but retains the submarine. It may postpone but it can not avoid the catastrophe of war.

Korea is small in numbers, in resources, and in territory. Her Government was overthrown, her domains annexed, and her people enslaved by successive acts of aggression from 1905 to 1910. The beneficent covenants of the treaties just negotiated are not for her. Her political effacement has made her unclean. Her voice has been in Washington that of one crying in the wilderness.

Though depressed by the treatment she has received from the Washington conference, Korea does not despair. She will continue her struggle for restored nationality whatever sufferings she may endure, whatever vicissitudes she may encounter. Other subject peoples confronting equally dismal prospects have resisted oppression for centuries, yet never in vain.

Distinct in race, in language, in traditions, in religion, and in culture, Korea's effacement is impossible. Her people may be oppressed, their freedom denied, and their institutions flouted, but their nationalism will endure. To Japan she must ever be an element of disintegration, to Asia a nation determined to enjoy her own life in her own way, to live in peace and amity with her neighbors, pursuing her own ends without let or hindrance from other peoples. In her struggle for freedom long since begun and never to end until the goal is reached, Korea invokes the sympathy and the encouragement of the American people.

By direction of the Korean mission to the Conference on Limitation of Armament.

TREATY WITH JAPAN.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty between the United States and Japan with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator, in particular the island of Yap, signed at Washington on February 11, 1922.

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate take a recess until Monday next at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, February 27, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, February 26, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by Mr. CHESTER W. TAYLOR of Arkansas as Speaker pro tempore.

Rev. Page Milburn, of Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

O God, who inhabiteth eternity and dwelleth in the hearts of the humble and contrite, hear our prayer. As we this day remember those who have lived among us and dedicated their lives to God and the people, may we be apprised of the wonderful fact that death doth not end all, that—

Beyond this vale of tears
There is a life above,
Unmeasured by the flight of years,
And all that life is love.

With this inspiration in our hearts may we be right, think right, and do right. Wilt Thou bless the President of the United States, both Houses of Congress, and all who are appointed to rule over us. Bless the people, and save us for His sake who gave himself for us. Amen.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal be postponed until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal be postponed until to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE SAMUEL M. TAYLOR OF ARKANSAS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the special order for the day.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. OLDFIELD, by unanimous consent, Ordered, That Sunday, Feb. 26, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon, be set apart for addresses on the life, character, and public services of Hon. SAMUEL M. TAYLOR, late a Representative from the State of Arkansas.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 293.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. Samuel M. Taylor, late a Member of this House from the State of Arkansas.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House, at the conclusion of these exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Speaker, it is well that we should pause long enough in this busy world to pay tribute to our beloved dead. We are met to-day to commemorate the life, character, and public services of our late colleague, the Hon. SAMUEL MITCHELL TAYLOR, a Member of Congress from the State of Arkansas.

Col. TAYLOR, as he was familiarly known to his colleagues here, was born in Itawamba County, Miss., on the 25th day of May, 1852. He was admitted to the bar in 1876, and practiced his profession for 10 years at Tupelo, Miss., and removed to Arkansas in 1887 and located at the city of Pine Bluff, where he lived until his death on the 13th of September, 1921. He is survived by his widow, two sons, and two daughters.

Mr. Speaker, I shall include in my remarks newspaper notices, editorials, resolutions of bar associations, poems, etc., which appeared in the newspapers of the district of Col. TAYLOR at the time of his death. These give an accurate picture of the high esteem in which he was held by those who knew him best. However, Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to this fact, a fact which is rather unusual in the politics of our country. Col. TAYLOR was succeeded by his son, the Hon. Chester W. Taylor, who is doubly honored by being designated as Speaker pro tempore to preside over our deliberations on this day. I do not recall during my service here that any other Member has been so honored.

Soon after Col. TAYLOR moved from Tupelo, Miss., to that progressive and wide-awake city of Pine Bluff he was elected prosecuting attorney of his judicial circuit and served the people four years in this important office. He made an able and conscientious prosecuting officer and drew to him many devoted friends, who remained loyal to him to the day of his death. Mr. Speaker, I did not know Col. TAYLOR intimately until he came to Congress in 1913. However, I had met him on several different occasions and knew him by reputation well enough to know that he was one of the most successful lawyers in our State. It was my privilege to serve with him during his entire service in this House. Col. TAYLOR was not only an orator and an able statesman but an upright, Christian gentleman. He did not speak often on the floor, yet when he did he was given closest attention by those present, for Members had implicit faith in his sincerity and honesty of purpose. I dare say there was no more popular man in this House than Col. TAYLOR. While he was a partisan Democrat, yet he was not offensive in his partisanship. Some of his most intimate personal friends belonged to the opposite party. Being sincere and honest in his own convictions, he accorded sincerity and honesty of purpose to others. He was a genial, kindly man, always considerate of the feelings of others. I knew him well and intimately and never heard him utter an unkind word about anyone. If he could not speak well he did not speak at all. He was never too busy to be courteous. In addition to being able he was also courageous, an attribute not any too prevalent in statesmen of the present generation. He not only knew what he sought to do in matters of legislation but he had the courage to do that which he felt was right and in the interest of the people.

Col. TAYLOR was ill several months but he persisted in attending to his duties as a Member of the House until a few weeks before his death. He came to the House when he should have been conserving his strength. He was thoroughly conscientious in every official act. He made the statement that he had never cast a vote while a member of Congress that would have been cast differently had every voter in his district been sitting in the galleries looking at him. In other words, his official life was an absolutely open book and he had no misgivings about a single vote he had cast. During his service here he remained at his post of duty in Washington while Congress was in session until he was stricken with fatal illness. Furthermore, he made his home in Washington during his entire service here within a stone's throw of the Capitol, and during his last illness he could see this great building from his window. After he became too ill to come to the floor of the House he kept up with what the House was doing and manifested great interest in the proceedings of the Congress.

He possessed the spirit of true southern chivalry and grace of the perfect gentleman, was gallant and forbearing, gentle and considerate.

He was a faithful public official and died in the service, but his memory will live in the hearts of the men and women who love the South and its noble traditions, for Col. TAYLOR typified the best in southern manhood.

He was a Mississippian by birth, but was loyal to his adopted State and in return received the love and confidence of a native-born son. The people attested their affection and appreciation of his faithfulness and ability by bestowing upon him the highest honors which were in the gift of the people.

He was a kind and devoted husband, an indulgent father, and a faithful friend, and in his last long illness and while for days he hovered between life and death he bore it all courageously and never complained. Forgetting his own suffering, his only thought was for the comfort and welfare of her whom he had chosen in youth as his life companion—the wife of his bosom, the mother of his children.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, I have paid a very poor tribute to our friend and colleague, with whom we have been recently so closely associated, but it is useless for me to descant upon his virtues. For a number of years he has passed in and out daily before you; his life has been an open book, and all who knew him will testify the world is better that he lived.

When I attended the funeral in his own home city and saw the great procession of neighbors, friends, and the grief-stricken populace which gathered to pay their last tribute of respect, I could but realize how dear he was to the hearts of his own home people, by which the old proverb was borne in upon my mind: "They loved him most who knew him best."

Mr. Speaker, we are powerless in death's mysterious presence.

While acting on the stage of life the grim reaper appeared and beckoned Col. TAYLOR to depart, and when he passed from this life those who knew him hoped for him that—

Somewhere the sun is shining,
Somewhere the angels wait,
Somewhere the clouds are drifted
Close to an open gate.

As a part of my remarks I insert the following tributes to our late colleague, written by those who knew him best:

COL. TAYLOR'S PUBLIC CAREER LONG, USEFUL—PROMINENT IN PUBLIC LIFE MANY YEARS—SETTLED HERE IN 1887.

A biographical sketch of Congressman TAYLOR will show the record of a long and useful life during which he had rendered much public service and had been repeatedly honored by those with whom he dwelt.

SAMUEL MITCHELL TAYLOR was born in Itawamba County, Miss., on May 25, 1852, and was the fifth in order of birth of the 10 children of Col. Clark W. and Louise (Keyes) Taylor, the former having been a native of Georgia and the latter a native of Alabama. His father was a successful merchant and planter in Mississippi and commanded a regiment in the Confederate Army during the Civil War.

After receiving a liberal collegiate education, SAM TAYLOR began the study of law at Verona, Miss., and was admitted to the bar of Mississippi in 1876. His constant study and experience made of him one of the best-known attorneys of this State, and he had a profound knowledge of law and precedent. He began the practice of law at Tupelo, Miss., where he remained until 1886, having won high standing at the bar of his native State.

CAME HERE IN 1887.

He removed to Pine Bluff in 1887 to establish his home and practice his profession. Two years later he was elected prosecuting attorney of the eleventh judicial circuit and held that office with much credit to himself and State for four years. He was an able and resourceful lawyer, which enabled him to win many forensic victories, and his reputation as an orator caused him to be in demand on many public occasions at home and in other parts of the country.

TAYLOR FUNERAL MOST IMPOSING EVER HELD HERE—HUNDREDS MEET BODY ON ARRIVAL, FILL CHURCH TO OVERFLOWING—CONGRESS IS REPRESENTED—DELEGATION REPRESENTING GOVERNMENT CONSISTS OF TWO MEMBERS OF SENATE, 11 FROM HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, AND FEDERAL JUDGE TRIEBER OF LITTLE ROCK.

Representatives of the National Government to-day united with Pine Bluff citizens in paying honor to the memory of Congressman SAM M. TAYLOR, who died at Washington last Tuesday morning, and the funeral was the most imposing ever held in this city.

The body of Congressman TAYLOR arrived here at 11:45 o'clock this morning on the Missouri Pacific train that was an hour late. In addition to members of the local bar and a committee from the chamber of commerce, the funeral party, which included members of the family of the deceased Congressman and a delegation of United States Senators and Congressmen from this and other States, was met at the station by several hundred local citizens. Members of the family and the congressional delegation arrived in a special Pullman.

Mr. TAYLOR was a firm believer in the principles of the Democratic Party and since his youth had been a valued factor in party councils. He was a delegate to the Democratic National Convention in 1896 at Chicago, where he represented Arkansas on the credentials committee. In the same year he was temporary chairman of the State Democratic Convention in this State and presidential elector at large. In 1910 he was chosen chairman of the State Democratic Convention without opposition. He was elected to succeed Joe T. Robinson as Congressman from this district when the latter resigned in January, 1913, to become governor of Arkansas. At the subsequent election he was elected to this office, which he held until the time of his death.

ACTIVE IN SCHOOL AFFAIRS.

Mr. TAYLOR became a member of the Pine Bluff school board in 1897 and served until he resigned in 1913 to leave for Washington. During the last 12 years of this time he was president of the board and one of the public schools of this city is named in his honor. He was a member of the First Baptist Church of this city, a member of the Masons, Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias, Royal Arcanum, and Knights of Honor.

On October 1, 1879, Mr. TAYLOR was married to Miss Mary J. Bell, of Pine Bluff, who has been with him in Washington during his last illness. He also leaves two sons and two daughters. Daniel Taylor, the eldest, now lives in Chicago, where he is an attorney for the Rock Island Railway; Chester Taylor, the other son, has been private secretary to his father since he has been in Congress. Two daughters, Mrs. William Nichol and Mrs. H. B. Strange, live in this city, with a grandson, Taylor Roberts, and granddaughter, Beverly Strange. Samuel Taylor 2d, son of Chester Taylor, is another grandson.

For a number of years prior to his death Congressman TAYLOR was a law partner of Judge W. D. Jones, of this city, the firm's name being Taylor & Jones. Daniel Taylor was formerly a member of the firm but withdrew when he became attorney for the Rock Island.

The body was taken in charge by the H. I. Holderness Co. and taken to the First Baptist Church, where it lay in state until the hour of the funeral, at 3 o'clock, surrounded by a guard of honor composed of deacons of this church, of which the deceased was a member. The funeral was conducted by Dr. John H. Moore, pastor of the church, and the big auditorium was not large enough to accommodate the crowd of friends who sought to attend. The casket was almost hidden from view by the number of floral tributes sent by individuals and organizations as a tribute of the esteem in which the deceased was held in Pine Bluff and throughout the State and Nation.

CONGRESSIONAL DELEGATION.

Members of the congressional delegation were met at the Union Station by members of the local bar and the chamber of commerce, who accompanied them to the Hotel Pines, where at noon they were guests of the Civitan Club at their regular weekly luncheon. The members of this delegation included Senators McKellar of Tennessee and Caraway of Arkansas; Congressmen PARKS, WINGO, OLDFIELD, TILLMAN, JACOWAY, and DRIVER of Arkansas, ELLIOTT of Indiana, CAMPBELL and SHREVE of Pennsylvania, JOHNSON of Washington, SANDERS of Texas, and PADGETT of Tennessee; P. A. Malone, Acting Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives; and Judge Jacob Trieber, of the United States district court at Little Rock.

Members of the family who arrived this morning were Mrs. Taylor, widow of Congressman TAYLOR, and her son, Chester W. Taylor, who has been his father's secretary since he entered Congress, and Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Taylor, of Chicago.

At 2:30 o'clock this afternoon the committee from the chamber of commerce, composed of President T. J. Collier, Secretary W. D. Hearn, A. D. Foster, N. J. Gantt, and J. H. Means, met the honorary delegation of visitors and accompanied them to the First Baptist Church, where seats had been reserved. Following the impressive service, during which Dr. Moore paid a high tribute to the memory of the deceased, referring to his record as a member of the church, as a citizen of Pine Bluff, as a husband and father, and as a Representative of the National Government, the funeral cortege left for Bellwood Cemetery, where the body was laid to rest.

CONGRESSMEN LEAVE TO-DAY.

Members of the congressional delegation will leave this afternoon in their private car over the Missouri Pacific Railroad for Little Rock, and at the request of the Acting Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives, who is in charge of arrangements, the train that leaves here at 4:45 o'clock will be held until members of the party return from the cemetery.

The following pallbearers were selected:

Honorary—W. D. Jones, W. O. Taggart, A. W. Nunn, Dr. Z. Orto, Leo M. Andrews, Judge W. B. Sorrells, Judge John M. Elliott, C. H. Triplett, M. E. Bloom, Judge W. T. Woodriddle, John M. Gracie, E. A. Howell, W. F. Coleman, J. W. Crawford, Creed Caldwell, Ziba Bennitt, J. R. Core, Dr. J. S. Jenkins, Dr. Wm. Breathwit, Irving Reinberger, E. W. Freeman, Mayor Mack Hollis, W. D. Hearn, F. G. Bridges, S. C. Alexander, Dr. Junius Jordan, John B. Speers, and Chas. Owens.

Active—Jos. Nichol, Sam Vaulx, Haynes Gregory, Harry Hanf, H. B. Speers, Carter B. Murphy, Frank B. Tomlinson, and Will Rowell.

REPRESENTATIVE SAMUEL TAYLOR DIES IN WASHINGTON—SERVED SIXTH ARKANSAS DISTRICT SINCE 1912—BURIAL IN PINE BLUFF—PLEURISY AND PNEUMONIA CAUSED DEATH OF BELOVED CONGRESSMAN—WAS RANKING DEMOCRATIC MEMBER RIVERS-HARBORS COMMITTEE.

[By R. M. Gates.]

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13.—Pleurisy and pneumonia caused the death of Representative SAMUEL MITCHELL TAYLOR of Arkansas at 3:12 o'clock this morning at his apartments in the Congressional—almost within the shadow of the great Capitol. His wife and son, Chester, his private secretary, were present at the bedside. The remains, accompanied by committees representing the House and Senate, will leave Washington early to-morrow night for Pine Bluff, where the funeral will take place Friday.

Representative TAYLOR, who was elected to Congress from the Sixth Arkansas District in 1912 to fill out the unexpired term of Joseph T. Robinson, who had been elected governor of his State, was 69 years of age. He was born in Itawamba County, Mississippi, but removed to Pine Bluff in 1887, where he was shortly afterwards elected prosecuting attorney, which office he filled for three successive terms. Mr. TAYLOR's health began to fail about two years ago, but it was not until last spring that his decline occasioned any solicitude either on the part of his family or his intimate friends.

He was unable to take the oath of office upon the convening of the extra session of this Congress and was not sworn in until the latter part of May. From that time until he was attacked by the illness which was the direct cause of his death, his attendance on the sessions of the House was irregular. Throughout the decline of his health, however, he was courageously hopeful, never once saddening his friends in the House by a voluntary expression indicating mournful consciousness of a losing fight. He was made a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in the first year of his service in the House, as his district was largely interested in legislation with which the committee dealt exclusively, and he died its ranking Democratic Member.

ALWAYS HEARD WITH RESPECT.

"SAM" TAYLOR, as he was known by his friends and colleagues, was a Democrat of the old school from which the South's leading public men of 50 years ago were graduated and later glorified by distinguished service. He seldom addressed the House, but when he had anything to say he was heard with respectful attention, because he never spoke except when he had a message to deliver.

Uniformly agreeable and courteous, "SAM" TAYLOR was beloved by his friends and admired by those whose acquaintance with him was less intimate. He had a geniality of manner, a kindness of expression, an unflinching sprightliness of spirit that made his presence as refreshing as salt air. No man ever engaged him in conversation either on business or for social intercourse without feeling better for the incident.

Besides his widow, Representative TAYLOR is survived by two sons, two daughters, and two grandchildren. The eldest son, Daniel, is general attorney for the Rock Island Railroad with headquarters in Chicago, and Chester W. Taylor, who has been his father's secretary while in Congress. The daughters are Mrs. William Nichol and Mrs. Hubert E. Strange, both of Pine Bluff.

To-day the Sergeant at Arms of the House appointed the following Members to attend the funeral: Representatives JACOWAY, TILLMAN, DRIVER, WINGO, PARKS, and OLDFIELD, all of Arkansas, and Representatives ELLIOTT of Indiana, CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania, JOHNSON of Washington, SHREVE of Pennsylvania, and PADGETT of Tennessee. Representatives JACOWAY, DRIVER, and TILLMAN are already in Arkansas. WINGO, OLDFIELD, and PARKS will leave here to-morrow night with the funeral party.

The committee appointed for the Senate by Vice President COOLIDGE includes Senators ROBINSON and CARAWAY of Arkansas, McKellar of Tennessee, HARRISON of Mississippi, HERVELD of Oklahoma, and SPENCER of Missouri. Senator ROBINSON is in Europe and Senator CARAWAY is at his home in Jonesboro, whither he went several days ago.

TRIBUTES PAID CONGRESSMAN BY COLLEAGUES—CONGRESSIONAL DELEGATION GUESTS AT CIVITAN MEMORIAL LUNCHEON—MR. TAYLOR IS LAUDED—WAS FAITHFUL MEMBER OF HOUSE, ALWAYS WORKING IN INTERESTS OF HIS DISTRICT AND NATION, LATE LAWMAKER'S ASSOCIATES IN CONGRESS DECLARE IN ADDRESSES.

Eloquent tributes to the life and deeds of Congressman SAM TAYLOR were paid to the deceased lawmaker at a memorial luncheon at the Pines this noon when the members of the congressional delegation, which accompanied the body home, were guests of the Civitan Club.

Dr. J. H. Moore, of the First Baptist Church, gave the invocation, and the visiting Congressmen were welcomed by the Rev. H. B. Trimble, who deplored the loss of Pine Bluff's distinguished citizen and member of the most august legislative body in the world, stating the loss of Congressman TAYLOR was keenly felt by every resident of his district. Mr. Trimble said he was delighted to have the colleagues of Col. TAYLOR help pay the last tribute of respect to the dead Congressman, but regretted the unfortunate circumstances which caused their visit.

Congressman PADGETT of Tennessee declared it was with a deep sense of regret and sorrow that he and his colleagues came to Pine Bluff on such a mission, that Mr. TAYLOR was well liked by his associates in the House, that he was a valuable Member of Congress who always had the welfare, stability, and interests of his district and the Nation at heart.

Congressman ELLIOTT of Indiana stated that he was sent to Washington four years ago, and that he had been at his hotel only 30 minutes when he became acquainted with Col. TAYLOR, and the friendship formed at that time had endured till Col. TAYLOR's death. Representative WINGO of Arkansas referred to Mr. TAYLOR as a man who always had the interests of his country at heart and who loved and served with unflinching loyalty the State from which he came. The speaker regretted the loss to Congress and to this district, and expressed the hope that the next Representative from this district would prove as capable and loyal a servant of his people as Mr. TAYLOR had been.

Representative SANDERS of Texas declared that after seeing the great concourse of people gathered at the station to do honor to a great statesman he was reminded of the Biblical passage, "Know ye then that there is this day a great man and prince fallen." The speaker said he could hope for nothing better than to discharge his duties in a way that would bring him the love and respect which prevails for Mr. TAYLOR in his own district. Congressman SANDERS congratulated Arkansas on its congressional delegation, and stated there was no stronger group of men in Congress from any State.

G. O. P. SOLOON PRAISES HIM.

Congressman SHREVE of Pennsylvania related how he was the last man on the Republican side of the House to talk to Col. TAYLOR on his last day of service, telling of the friendship which had existed between them from the beginning of the Sixty-second Congress. He characterized Col. TAYLOR as a man who could see over, above, and beyond all the issues of any question, a loyal Democrat, proud of his party and of his State, a delightful man and a splendid Representative, keenly interested in every question, a man whose friendships were lasting.

Entering Congress at the same time as Col. TAYLOR and staying at the same hotel with him, Congressman JOHNSON of Washington told of the friendship formed between his four-year-old daughter and the local congressman, using this friendship to illustrate the gentle spirit and lovable qualities of Col. TAYLOR which so endeared him to his colleagues. The speaker told of his work on the Naturalization and Immigration Committee and declared "the South is the bulwark in the fight for protection of America for Americans." The protection of America for its own posterity was called the greatest problem of the day by the speaker.

SENATOR M'KELLAR SPEAKS.

Senator M'KELLAR of Tennessee stated Col. TAYLOR's life could well serve as an example to any young man in Arkansas or in America. Col. TAYLOR was referred to as a man of highest characteristics and ideals, having but one aim and purpose in life and that was to do his duty as he saw it.

Congressman CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania told of his fondness for Col. TAYLOR, formed through years of association with him, and of the benefit he had derived from the advice of Col. TAYLOR, whose broad views and cool head had been of unusual value in the trying days of the war.

The remarkable gentleness of spirit of Col. TAYLOR was warmly praised by Senator CARAWAY of Arkansas, who said in all his association with him he had never heard him utter an unkind word about anyone, always treating everyone with loving consideration, whether they were for him or against him. Col. TAYLOR's loyalty to his constituents was illustrated by the speaker, who quoted Col. TAYLOR as saying: "I always vote as though my constituents were in the room with me and could read my heart."

JUDGE TRIEBER SPEAKS.

Federal Judge Trieber thanked the gentlemen from the North for their kind words about the South. In discussing the love of its citizens for the South, Judge Trieber described Col. TAYLOR as a member of a class of which there are now too few, the old-fashioned Southern gentleman. Mr. TAYLOR's skill and eloquence as a lawyer were portrayed by the speaker in his memorial of his dead colleague.

Judge Trieber related many incidents in which Col. TAYLOR figured when touring the State with him during the campaign of 1896, and eulogized the Congressman's ability as a speaker, his clean methods in politics, and the high regard in which he was held by the people of the State.

Representative WINGO of Arkansas told of the high esteem in which Mr. TAYLOR was held by Representatives of all sections of the country, of the prominence he had already attained in Congress, his high ideals, and the love borne for him by his colleagues.

TELLS OF ILLNESS.

Congressman TAYLOR's bravery during the last days of his illness was related by Representative PARKS of Arkansas, who declared Col. TAYLOR died fighting for his country as surely as if he had fallen on the field of battle.

Congressman OLDFIELD of Arkansas added several intimate details of Col. TAYLOR's last illness, telling how his one desire was to return to his home at Pine Bluff. His growing prominence and influence in Congress was pointed out by the speaker, who referred to his work on the Rivers and Harbors Committee. The speaker declared that Col. TAYLOR was so well liked in Congress by members of both parties that he could get more favors from the Republicans than any Democrat in the House.

Col. TAYLOR's deep affection for his constituents was feelingly portrayed by Congressman JACOWAY, who quoted him as once remarking "There is not a man, woman, or child in all my district that I can not take by the hand and call my friend."

Congressman DRIVER told of the deep grief felt in common by all those who had known Col. TAYLOR, the high praise accorded him on every hand, and then said such commendations of love and respect were fitting tributes to a career like Mr. TAYLOR's.

NEGRO LEADER SYMPATHIZES.

Among the many messages of condolence which have been sent to members of Congressman TAYLOR's family, is one from John H. Young, one of the best-known Negroes of Pine Bluff and a leader among his race, as shown by the fact that for the past 33 years he has been supreme master of exchequer of the Negro Knights of Pythias. His letter to the Congressman's widow follows:

"MRS. SAMUEL TAYLOR.

"DEAR MADAM: You and yours have my deepest sympathy in the departure of your beloved husband from us. He was a friend to me and the race of which I form a part. He was ever ready to give a kind word and to advise even the humblest of us who sought counsel from him.

"The prayers of many go up for you and yours, that you may seek consolation in Him who knows and does all things well.

"Of your beloved husband it can be truly said that a friend to humanity has been called from labor to reward, and whatever any of us can do for you and yours we will willingly and gladly do.

"May each of you take comfort and realize that the Holy Writ says: 'Write, blessed are they who die in the Lord, for henceforth they rest from their labors and their works do follow them.'

"Yours, respectfully,

"JOHN H. YOUNG, Sr."

LOCAL BAR TO HAVE PART IN TAYLOR BURIAL—TO GO IN BODY TO MEET TRAIN ON WHICH REMAINS ARRIVE TO-MORROW.

At a meeting of the Jefferson County Bar Association at 11 o'clock this morning, held in the chancery court chamber with Chancellor John M. Elliott chairman and A. R. Cooper secretary, a committee composed of Judge W. D. Jones, Judge W. T. Woodbridge, and J. W. Crawford was named to prepare resolutions on the death of Congressman SAM M. TAYLOR of this city, to be presented to the Arkansas Supreme Court and the chancery and circuit courts of this district.

It was requested that all members of the bar meet the body and the members of the congressional committee upon their arrival in the city at 10.30 o'clock Friday morning and to attend the funeral that will be held from the First Baptist Church at 3 o'clock to-morrow afternoon.

Another committee was named to secure a floral emblem on behalf of the bar association.

A committee has also been named by the Chamber of Commerce to meet the members of the congressional delegation upon their arrival in the city to-morrow morning and to escort them to the hotel. This committee is composed of T. J. Collier, president; W. D. Hearn, secretary; N. J. Gantt, A. D. Foster, and J. H. Means. Secretary Hearn of the Chamber of Commerce yesterday sent a telegram of condolence to members of the family at Washington "from the people of this community through the Chamber of Commerce."

The funeral will be held at 3 o'clock to-morrow afternoon, as announced in The Commercial yesterday afternoon. Dr. John H. Moore, pastor of this church, will conduct the obsequies and it is expected that the funeral will be the most imposing ever held in this city. In addition to the list of pallbearers announced yesterday, the name of WILL ROWELL has been added to the list of active pallbearers.

Following are the resolutions adopted:

"Whereas Hon. SAMUEL MITCHELL TAYLOR has been called to his reward by Him who doeth all things well; and

"Whereas he was for many years a member of the bar of Jefferson County and of the State of Arkansas, where he shone with great brilliancy as a member of the bar, as a citizen, as a public servant, charged by his fellow citizens with the discharge of public duties; and

"Whereas it is but just and fitting that the members of his home bar should express their high appreciation of him as a lawyer, a public servant, a citizen, and a man above reproach in all things, as far as such appreciation may be expressed in language by us;

"Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by those who knew him best, That in the death of Hon. SAMUEL MITCHELL TAYLOR this bar has lost one of its greatest and most brilliant members; the city of Pine Bluff an honored citizen; the National Congress, in which he served, a faithful, honest, conscientious and efficient member; the people of the sixth congressional district, who loved to honor him, a servant whose place will be hard to fill; and the world a lovable, genial gentleman, of whom it could truthfully be said,

"His life was gentle, and the elements

"To mixed in him that nature might stand up

"And say to all the world, 'This was a man.'

"Be it further resolved, That a copy of this resolution be delivered by the secretary of this meeting to the widow and family."

LINCOLN COURT HONORS MEMORY OF COL. TAYLOR—MEMORIAL SERVICE HELD, BAR ASSOCIATION ADOPTS RESOLUTIONS.

The Lincoln Circuit Court at Star City yesterday held memorial services in memory of Congressman TAYLOR. A few moments prior to the convening of court Judge Sorrells received a message that Col. TAYLOR had died. With many cases to be heard, this information was not imparted immediately to the bar. There were many attorneys of the district present, and when court reconvened at 1 o'clock Judge Sorrells announced the death of his friend, Mr. TAYLOR. He then asked if any member of the bar had anything to offer or say. At this time Judge E. J. Kerwin, a friend and admirer of Col. TAYLOR, introduced the resolutions, which were unanimously adopted by the bar, placed on record in the court and a copy sent to the family of Mr. TAYLOR. Attorney Arthur Johnson and other members of the bar from Jefferson County spoke in highest terms of the life and character of Col. TAYLOR.

The following is a copy of the resolution:

"Whereas it has pleased Almighty God, in His wisdom, to remove from our midst our honored and beloved Congressman, SAMUEL M. TAYLOR; and

"Whereas he was permitted to serve the people whom he loved and lived among, until in that service, which was always faithful, he reached the golden years of his well and honorably spent life; and

"Whereas his devotion to duty, to the Government of the United States, in the Halls of Congress at Washington, D. C.; to the State of Arkansas, to this congressional district, among which were the counties of Lincoln, Desha, and Jefferson, the people of which latter counties he served for many years as their prosecuting attorney, caused him to manifest his sincere appreciation and gratefulness in the honors bestowed upon him; even when ambition sang its sweetest song in the years when life was to him sweeter and sweeter, still he remained at his post of duty; and even at the last, when the veil that shuts out the light and the life of each and all was falling slowly, reminding him that the God he served and loved was calling, and with loved ones at home, yet his high conception of duty to those whom he served and loved, and who in turn loved him, was such as to cause him to live with hope, that bright star of every human breast and heart, and it was this hope that springs eternal, coupled with his belief in the God of each and all, that gave him strength to fight his last battle quietly and bravely, as he fought all of his battles during life.

"Col. TAYLOR, as he was familiarly called by his friends and many of his constituents, was the possessor of one of those pleasing and lovable dispositions that enriched his otherwise beautiful character. He came from the great State of Mississippi, the home of George, Waltham, and Lamar, when a young man. Arkansas was his State by adoption and of his own choosing; had he remained in Mississippi he might have become a John Sharp Williams. As a young lawyer it was early discerned in his career that a bright future was his, possessed as he was of those great virtues and qualities in one's life that go to make men great, kind, lovable, and charitable. He built a character that is the priceless gem of his life, and the greatest in-heritage he leaves his family, wife, daughters, and sons, is the heritage of all the ages—a good name.

Out of the tree of life, ceaselessly and perseveringly, he cut day by day the deeds that made him that which he was, a noble, good man, a man whose citizenship is worthy of emulation by every aspiring young man in the State. He loved his country and his country's flag; for all that each star and stripe that Old Glory stood for, so did Col. TAYLOR. During the trying days preceding this country's entry into the World War and while it lasted his love for the success of the ideals of the United States represented by the American flag caused him to remain day and night at his post of duty. His life was one of the best because one of service—service to his God, to humanity, to his family, his constituency, and to his friends. His life was that of the Christian, and the principles received in early childhood were exemplified by him during all the years he served and lived. His home was ever his best beloved spot on earth and in fact and in truth his castle. It was to him the sweetest place of all, surrounded as he was by his devoted and loving wife, the companion of all his young and ambitious years, by his two daughters and two sons, one of whom is an honored member of the bar of this district.

"The bright stars and the jewels of his life, those immediate jewels that nestle in the heartstrings of every heart, were his children, and next to them his friends. Long a member of the bar of this district, four years the prosecuting attorney of the people of this circuit, eight years of service in Congress as the representative of the people, it is fitting and proper that we on this day mourn his death. We mourn because he was a good man, an exemplary citizen, honest and incorruptible as a public official, and a lawyer who faithfully discharged every duty to his client. He had the greatest respect for and in turn was held in esteem by the judges of the courts before whom he appeared. A real southern gentleman, a Christian, scholar, loving husband, and devoted father: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the members of the bar of the Eleventh Judicial District, of which Lincoln County constitutes one of the three counties in said district, That these resolutions be adopted this day as an expression of our love for him and his faithful service to the people whom he served, and that the waters of forgetfulness in time may not wash out either his good deeds or his memory from among us and those who may serve in the years to come.

"Be it resolved further, That these resolutions be spread upon the record of this honorable court; that a copy of same, under seal of this court, be furnished his beloved wife and children who survive him, and to whom we extend our condolences and assurances of deep and sincere sympathy, and that the press of this district be furnished a copy for publication.

"And, last, as our final tribute to our Congressman, brother lawyer, and friend, that the courts of this judicial district, presided over by the Hon. W. B. Sorrells, circuit judge, and life-long friend of Col. TAYLOR, adjourn out of respect to his memory on the day of his burial.

"May he forever rest in peace.

"E. J. KERWIN."

STATE OF ARKANSAS,
County of Lincoln.

I, W. A. Fish, clerk of the Lincoln circuit court, hereby certify that the foregoing resolutions were unanimously adopted by the Bar Association of Lincoln County, in open court, and that the same were spread in full upon the records of said court, on this the 13th day of September, 1921.

W. A. FISH,
Clerk of the Lincoln Circuit Court.

A FRIEND TO ALL.

Resolutions on the death of Congressman TAYLOR were adopted at last night's meeting of the Central Trades Council and several speakers eulogized him. This action is further proof of the fact that the dead Congressman recognized no casts or class in society, but sought to serve all people to the best of his ability. How well he succeeded in this effort is shown in the expressions of sorrow that come from every source.

PINE BLUFF CENTRAL TRADES COUNCIL, AFFILIATED WITH ARKANSAS STATE FEDERATION OF LABOR, AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR, PINE BLUFF, ARK.—A RESOLUTION.

Whereas God has removed from this world our friend, Congressman SAMUEL MITCHELL TAYLOR; and

Whereas in the death of this good man our country has lost an able statesman and leader, our city and county a beloved citizen; and

Whereas the life of Congressman TAYLOR has been filled to the brim with deeds that have endeared him to the hearts of all classes and creeds, and his kindly sympathy and interest were ever given to those in distress: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Pine Bluff Central Trades and Labor Council, representing 2,000 union men, That we extend the bereaved family our sympathy in their dark hour of their great sorrow, and that we mingle our prayers with those of others that Heaven may help and sustain them in their loss.

Respectfully, yours,

A. W. LEHRMANN,
W. S. BUSICK,
ROBT. MALY,
A. L. MAPIN,
M. F. MITCHELL,
Committee.

CONGRESSMAN TAYLOR.

The people of Pine Bluff are to-day in grief over the announcement that Congressman SAM M. TAYLOR died early to-day at Washington, D. C. It was recently reported that he had been seriously ill for several weeks, suffering from pleurisy and pneumonia, but his physicians announced that his condition was improved and the hope was held out that he would soon be able to return to his home in Pine Bluff. Instead of being able to return as usual from the scene of his labor as a Member of Congress to receive welcome and commendation from his friends at home, only his lifeless body will be brought back here to be buried, while the lovable SAM TAYLOR exists only in memory.

Although he was officially recognized as Representative from the sixth congressional district of Arkansas, and had held several high positions, he was known to his friends as SAM TAYLOR, denoting the affection for him from his friends, who were as numerous as his acquaintances. One of the public schools of this city is known as the Sam Taylor School, as a recognition of the valuable services he gave to the school children and school patrons of this city during the 16 years that he was a member of the Pine Bluff school board, during the last 12 years as president of the board.

SAM TAYLOR was a member of an old and prominent Southern family and it may well be said of him that he was a worthy son of a noble sire. He had been a resident of Pine Bluff for 35 years, during which he became known as one of the leading members of the Arkansas bar, a man always active in behalf of his political party, interested in the welfare of his community and country, the head of a prominent family and a citizen and neighbor who was loved because of his integrity and his lovable character. In the death of SAM TAYLOR Pine Bluff has lost a valuable citizen and the sixth congressional district has lost an able Representative. His name will always occupy a prominent place in the list of the many prominent Pine Bluff citizens whose record of service to their fellow men are inscribed upon the tablets of love and memory.

CONGRESSMAN TAYLOR DEAD.

Congressman SAM TAYLOR, of this district, has passed away, and with his passing goes one of the old school of public men in the South. He was genial, pleasing, friendly, and of the type who makes following and support without apparently endeavoring to do so. He was free of the demagogic trend too frequently found in present-day politics, and he was always zealous to the interests of friends and constituents.

His home was in Pine Bluff, and he was so beloved there that the question of substantial home indorsement for him was never raised. Ill in health in his last campaign, and unable to make the personal canvass that is expected, he came out victorious through the aggressiveness of beloved friends.

The death of Congressman TAYLOR will be deeply regretted over his district and over the State as well.

SAMUEL M. TAYLOR.

The body of the late Congressman SAMUEL M. TAYLOR, who died in Washington last Tuesday, will be buried this afternoon at Pine Bluff, where most of his life was spent.

The death of Mr. TAYLOR removed a kindly but forceful man, who had fought his way up to prominence. In his young manhood he had to contend against the numerous handicaps imposed on Southerners by the hatreds born of the Civil War. By close application and right living he pushed steadily ahead. He was honored often by the Democratic Party and he repaid the party by intelligent and earnest effort.

Mr. TAYLOR died in harness. His family and his friends may get satisfaction from the thought that he so acquitted himself as an officeholder that he owed nothing to the voters who elected him. He gave honest and efficient service and his reelections showed the voters' appreciation of such service.—Arkansas Gazette.

COL. SAM M. TAYLOR.

With the death of Col. SAMUEL M. TAYLOR, of Arkansas, the Democrats in Congress lose a member who had endeared himself to all his colleagues. There was no more genial soul than this modest man from the growing Southwest. He was a rare raconteur, a most companionable man, gentle in manner, kindly in disposition, generous in all his instincts, firm in his convictions, and singularly devoted to all the higher and nobler traditions of the South. It was worth something to hear him relate some of his earlier experiences in Mississippi and as a young lawyer in his adopted State. His anecdotes were racy of the soil; he was particularly happy in hitting off the Negro dialect and characteristics, and he was never more entertaining than when telling stories which he picked up at remote country inns or in corner stores. He will be greatly missed in the halls of Congress, in which he had been a familiar figure for nearly a decade.—Johnstown (Pa.) Democrat.

AN APPRECIATION.

(By Mrs. Max Eisenkramer.)

In presenting the following poem, to the memory of the late Congressman SAMUEL M. TAYLOR, the author says:

"I ask the privilege of penning in my humble way the virtues of our late Congressman, SAMUEL M. TAYLOR, as I knew him from childhood until his death.

"I base my inspiration on the bigness of the man, as demonstrated in a congratulatory handshake and expression of interest in my future success, when my work was placed among the relics of the University of Texas. Perhaps meeting him on my return from worship may have formed the setting, as it was then he quoted to me the following lines from 'Envy Not': 'Rejoice in all the honors which come to those you know. That you know them makes you, in a sense, a partner to their fame; that you rejoice with them brings you their friendship.'"

LIFE'S WINDOW.

In this life of many windows,
I see jewels rich and rare;
Come, I beg you, see them with me,
Human hearts, just here and there.
Oft 'tis not until the parting
Of a jewel, rich and rare
That we waken to its merit
Here and there and everywhere.

Let me take you to this window.
To one jewel, rich and rare,
Who on earth has lived to bless us,
And is now blessed over there.
Up and out at all times stood he,
In the laws of God and man,
And each deed stood as a blessing;
Emulate him, if you can.

Did the things that spell real manhood
Come into his daily life?
Yes, to him was sacred, duty,
Whether pleasant, or with strife.
Loyal was he to his country,
Loyal was he to his home,
And the slab that marks his burial,
Will prove this, in years to come.

Was he good and kind and gentle,
Was he patient, brave, and true?
Would to God these selfsame blessings
Were a gift from God to you.
Did he love his wife and children?
Here I tread on sacred ground—
With the same love in his bosom
That in every prince is found.

Oh, how humble! This a jewel,
That in him we, too, will find;
And the rich man and the lowly—
Side by him walked all mankind.
Do you doubt it? Then the school house
That in years will us remind
Of this patriotic spirit
Who sought democracy to bind.

And there is another window,
With a jewel, rich and rare;
Selfishness could never enter,
It was service everywhere,
To lend to all a helping hand,
Who strive a goal to reach,
"For your glory is my glory."
So the prophets and poets teach."

Then with eyes brimful of interest,
As their sparkle I could note,
From his soul there came the "Envy Not"
That from Worthington I quote.
And in my heart a feeling
For this great man arose.
As I saw in him the qualities
Of life—not meant for prose.

And I wondered not he filled this place,
A jewel for his land;
There, within the hall of Congress,
There, our statesman, glorious, grand,
It was just those noble qualities
Of deed and mind and heart,
That on earth leaves him immortal,
As the soul that did depart.

So in his house of many windows
You now see that jewel fine;
That jewel in the lives of all
Who have reached the heights sublime.
'Tis that great gem, religion,
The foundation of all good;
And through this he built his mansion,
Here with man, and there with God.

Back again, to life's first window,
To one jewel rich and rare;
Who on earth has lived to bless us,
Here and there and everywhere,
Up and out at all times stood he,
In the laws of God and man;
And each deed stood out a jewel,
Emulate him, if you can.

Mr. JACOWAY. Mr. Speaker, once again we are with sadness reminded of the uncertainty of life, and with the unerring and fatal accuracy of death. Some months since the gentle and generous spirit of Col. SAM TAYLOR took its flight. All that was mortal of one who had with a royal bearing grown to the fullness and perfection of manhood's estate dropped out of line and was a memory. In life he was "every inch a king." His was an existence that had paid rare dividends to the world in which he had lived and moved and had his being. All the days of his life he had entertained noble thoughts; he had performed good deeds and had carried out to a successful consummation various and varied policies and plans, which made the world know it was richer and happier in the knowledge that he had lived.

It is not for me, and I dare say the undertaking of anyone, on this occasion, to recite in detail the wonderful history of Col. SAM TAYLOR. Time and space and the knowledge of the poverty of my own vocabulary prevent me from doing so. That is the work of the just historian. No poor words of mine can add additional luster to the wondrous way in which he wrought, when as a young man, vital with the rich red blood of a superb manhood, he lived and loved and toiled, and left behind him good and big things undertaken and accomplished, and which stamped him with the hall mark of a potential benefactor in his day and generation. His achievements are securely chronicled and preserved in the archives of his Government that he patriotically loved, and which he so faithfully served, and in which he had a continuing and abiding faith. To-day as we pay tribute to his memory, and view the record that is his, it wrings unstinted praise from legions of friends and admirers; a proud and consoling living reality to those that he loved best, and who in turn loved him without limit. To them it is a rich, a priceless family heritage to which they can point with genuine pride, conscious in the happy and proud thought that the blood that coursed his veins was theirs in fee simple. Behind him he has left a world of beautiful memories which is the common inheritance of both friend and family.

The contests that Col. TAYLOR waged for political supremacy were unique, and easily fall in a class by themselves. While he was vigorous in debate, and wielded a shining lance, he never sought an unjust advantage.

His wit in the combat, as gentle as light,
Ne'er carried a heartstain on its blade.

From every political contest he emerged with his own self-respect, stronger with those to whom he had appealed for support, and also living in the respect and admiration of those who opposed him. In these contests he erected high standards and from them he never varied. In his last race for Congress, in presenting his views to the voters of his district, he adopted as his slogan: "We have done that which is our duty to do."—Luke, 17th chapter, 10th verse. And again, in the same race, he broadly stated that he would adopt and be judged by Thomas Jefferson's standard as to the qualifications a candidate for office should possess:

Is he honest?
Is he competent?
Is he faithful?
Is he true to the Constitution?

With these as his guides and embodied into his political creed, he presented his cause to the people of his district and won by majorities that were overwhelming, carrying, as I think the record will disclose, all the counties of his district save one, and only losing this by a small margin, which was the home county of one of his opponents. It was his belief that the combined judgment of the people is seldom wrong, and that it is the exception when an erroneous verdict is rendered by them at the polls, feeling that when the people are in possession of all the facts and understand the issues involved that substantial justice will be meted out by them. He was the personification of courtesy in the hotly contested battles waged in the courts where he played so prominent and illustrious a part for over a quarter of a century. Among the strong votaries of the legal profession, he was one of its El Capitans, profoundly respected, and at the same time justly feared on account of his solid erudition in that profession he considered the foremost of all. That high course of action that guided him in the trial of causes characterized him as a political opponent.

At all times he sought to be absolutely fair. I quote his own language: "It has been a rule of my political life never to speak despairingly or disrespectfully of my opponents. If they be men of good moral character, the voters find it out. If they be otherwise, this the voters will also note before casting their ballots; and if my opponents or myself be unworthy to represent the people of our district in the Congress of our country, I simply lay before you these words:

'Be sure your sins will find you out.' (Numbers, 32-38.)

To me no higher or loftier gauge of battle could be thrown down. It serves as a true index to the character of the man. It is but another citation that his mind always traveled the high mountain ranges of thought, and was reflected in a course of conduct in life that made him loved and respected by his fellows. This trait of character was one of the compelling reasons on that beautiful autumn day in September when his body was lowered into the tomb that the rich and the poor, the high and the low, the white and the black, gathered at the church and the grave to pay their last respects and to him pay the homage of a king. In sorrow we left him in his long sleep resting under a veritable wilderness of flowers.

Mr. Speaker, the low sweet notes of taps have been sounded for our good friend and colleague, Col. SAM M. TAYLOR. The "Grim messenger with the inverted torch beckoned him to depart, and he was unafraid. In lowly submission he bowed his acquiescence and obedience to the mandate of the highest of all courts and responded to 'Nature's final decree in equity.' I know that when his dying eyes again visualized that which life had brought to him and how lavish it had been to him the sting of death was robbed to a minimum. He had achieved in honor that which falls to the lot of a limited few. By his side with a heart full of love, ministering to him, anticipating his every want was she the bride of his young manhood in the spring time of life—the mother of his children. She had been his inspiration throughout the days—his universe. He had seen his children grow to manhood and womanhood's estate. He saw with pride the first born one of the legal heads of a great trans-continental railroad system, two beautiful daughters who had established their homes, and by their brilliancy of intellect, charm of face and form, and womanly sweetness had taken their high places in that world decreed by God as woman's absolute dominion: The second son who had been a trinity to him as son, friend, and counselor, and who now worthily wears the mantle that fell upon him from his father's shoulders, had been an unfailing source of comfort and pride to him. The voices and love of grandchildren made happier and sweeter his latter years. So when death came, and before him again he saw revolving on the kaleidoscope of life these beautiful colors and tints that were all made for him the grave was robbed of its victory.

Mr. Speaker, upon the tenderest heartstrings of his family a sorrow as heavy as a huge stone has been rolled and to-day they grieve. In conclusion may I say to them, mourn not: God lives and loves and rules, and in that Beautiful World of Somewhere he stands with white hands beckoning them to follow—You shall meet him in the morning.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I will not attempt to pay any extended formal tribute to the life and character of my departed colleague. I am content to leave that duty to the older Members. What I wish to do is to say a few words of simple tribute to a departed friend.

I do not know of any man among my acquaintance to whom I was drawn more strongly in a personal way than to Colonel TAYLOR. Somehow I never thought of him as the public official, as the active partisan, as a colleague in the House. I always thought of him as I first met him when a young man starting out in public life myself. At that time he had already achieved an enviable place at the bar of our State. He was already recognized as a very strong, potent force in his party. I was the beneficiary not only of his time and courtesy but of his wisdom and counsel. I think he was one of the kindest men I ever knew to those of us who belonged to the younger generation who went to him for counsel and advice. That was the thing that attracted me to him and made me think more of him as a friend than as one in a public position discharging public duties.

Another thought that comes to me about Colonel TAYLOR is that he was one of the few remaining of what I am afraid is a fast-disappearing type. That is what those in other parts of the Republic refer to as a typical old southern gentleman. He was typical of that school that I say I fear is fast disappearing. I wish there were more men of that character among those in public life to-day. Those of us who had the privilege of meeting with his neighbors readily understood the love and affection in which he was held, even by those who differed with him either in the courtroom or on the hustings in a political contest. There was in him that sense of justice, that high honor that was so characteristic that even his adversaries respected and admired him. These were the things that protected him against the shafts of jealousy and hate, because he was always honorable and fair. He loved his fellow men. He loved his country. He rendered great and distinguished service to both, and his country, his fellow men, and the circle of his immediate friends sustained a great loss when Colonel TAYLOR passed away.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, in the county of Jefferson, at Pine Bluff, the city by the winding river, named as our State is named, we buried our late colleague and comrade, SAMUEL MITCHELL TAYLOR. The soft September sun shone bright over that typical far southern county site, as a legion of his friends followed his clay to its final resting place in beautiful Bellwood cemetery. In this great throng of people were heavy-hearted relatives, clergymen, Senators, Representatives, Federal and State judges, doctors, lawyers, planters, bankers, merchants, newsboys, and here and there men and women of color, all mourners. There never lived a more popular citizen. Lover, lawyer, statesman, old-time polite, courteous gentleman and friend of man was SAMUEL M. TAYLOR.

As a young man he was courtly, graceful and handsome. He was singularly persuasive with juries, and as a trial lawyer had few equals. His voice was as mellow and soft as the music of a guitar, and at a party convention or before 12 good men and true in the jury box he was all but invincible.

The years go swiftly by, and it was a long time ago when I first heard his eloquent tongue in forensic speech. It so happened that the young men and old from the four corners of our State were gathered in Little Rock to select an associate justice of the supreme court. The favorite of the old men for the honor was the late Judge Jordan E. Cravens, of Johnson County, the youngsters were for a brilliant young circuit judge from Monticello. At that time I was a callow fledgling of the law, and was there as a delegate, pushing with enthusiasm and vigor the candidacy of the young circuit judge aforementioned, who had been my college mate and boyhood friend. This young aspirant for high judicial preferment was placed in nomination by young SAM TAYLOR, of Pine Bluff, in one of the most charming, forceful, and effective convention speeches I ever heard. Our candidate was nominated, elected, and still graces the bench. As Judge Chas Coffin, one of the oldsters, said:

We went to the college campus to draft a tyro to invest with the judicial purple, heretofore supposed to be best fitted for older shoulders.

The years went by and the time came when there was a certain important will case pending in my court at Bentonville, the case of Phillips vs. Phillips, the parties litigant for a long time having lived in Jefferson County. The matter came on for trial. The ablest counsel in the State appeared for the contestants and contestee, SAM TAYLOR being of counsel for the contestants. The law was against him, the facts in favor of the contestee, and yet the 12 men composing the jury were so moved by his matchless appeal that they promptly returned a verdict for his clients.

The years sped on and I became a colleague of the one-time convention orator and advocate in the Congress of the United States.

Here he was known, respected, and loved by all his fellow Members. He was possessed of stainless honor. There was not enough gold in all the world to buy him or corrupt him.

For the last few years we could see that he was rapidly failing. He seemed, however, to be hopeful, even sanguine of recovery and further service, and yet he did not seem to fear to face the grizzly thing called death, but when he allowed his mind to dwell on the end that he knew would come sometime, his unfaltering trust in God and His revealed promises soothed and sustained him for the last great adventure which follows the flight of the spirit from the body.

As I think of his last days I recall the following lines:

I watched a sail until it dropped from sight
Over the rounding sea. A gleam of white,
A last far-flashed farewell, and, like a thought
Slipped out of mind, it vanished, and was not.

Yet to the helmsman standing at the wheel
Broad seas still stretched beneath the gliding keel.
Disaster? Change? He felt no slightest sign,
Nor dreamed he of that far horizon line.

So may it be, perchance, when down the tide
Our dear ones vanish. Peacefully they glide
On level seas, nor mark the unknown bound.
We call it death—to them 'tis life beyond.

The end came on September 13. He closed his eyes for the last time in this world and went to sleep in sight of the white-columned Capitol of the Nation, in which imposing structure he had for nine years served a proud constituency with immaculate fidelity.

My thought strays back again to the little mound in whose lush bosom we laid him to rest, the grave hidden under the rarest and richest of floral tributes I have ever seen.

Peace, and rest, and sleep, good friend.

Warm summer sun, shine kindly here;
Warm southern wind, blow softly here;
Green sod above, lie light, lie light.
Good night, dear heart; good night; good night.

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Speaker, colleagues with more extensive association with Col. SAM M. TAYLOR have spoken of his distinguished service in this body and of his participation in important contemporaneous legislation. Unfortunately I was denied the pleasure of the association afforded them.

I became acquainted with Col. TAYLOR many years ago, but conditions were such that it continued a casual one until I assumed my duties here, at which time disease greatly weakened the physique of Col. TAYLOR, preventing his attendance upon the sessions and his appearance at his office, except at intervals. I was, however, aware of his reputation as a lawyer and statesman. Like many of the statesmen from my native State, Col. TAYLOR came to us from our sister State of Mississippi, the native home of Augustus H. Garland, of James K. Jones, of James P. Clarke, whom the citizens of Arkansas delighted to honor in honoring themselves. He brought to us the transcendent virtues, devotion to duty, and adherence to great principles characterizing the other great characters.

Col. TAYLOR won his spurs at the bar and launched his political career while a resident of his native State, and but matured himself in continuing his activities in newer and more favorable fields, and died in the knowledge of the fulfillment of his ambition.

He located in the beautiful city of Pine Bluff, Ark., the metropolis of the Arkansas River Valley, where he attained the leadership of his bar, serving faithfully and well as prosecuting attorney for three consecutive terms. In 1912, when the Hon. JOE T. ROBINSON, then representing the sixth district in Congress, resigned to enter upon his duties as governor, Col. TAYLOR was selected to fill the place, and brought to his duties that same devotion, experience, capacity, and energy so usefully employed in his professional and official life before.

He was honored by his party in being selected for and presiding over two State conventions with such fairness and impartiality that no stings were left to trouble the party in the subsequent campaigns. When I reached Washington I became the guest of the hotel where Col. TAYLOR made his home for several years, and I recall no one name used with more affection. His friends there, without regard to party affiliations, are to be numbered by the guest list. I sought him out at every possible opportunity, and in the hours of association afforded me I learned why he was so loved. He was entirely unassuming and companionable, with a mind stored with a wealth of information, the product of hard study and experience gained in the practice of his profession, his labors here, and his contact with his fellow man; a man of strong convictions, but devoid of offensive partisanship and without malice. He was a manly man, as gentle as a woman, but courageous in his adherence to principles. Just such a man as he was portrayed by his colleagues to me. The character of man to counsel and advise. The type of man whose memory is cherished by communities, districts, State, and Nation, and whose family life is a benediction.

When the remains of Col. TAYLOR reached his home city of Pine Bluff the people were assembled from the city and surrounding country and without regard to race, creed, or political affiliation joined in a rare tribute of affection and esteem. He has crossed over the river and rests in the shade of the trees.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to detain the Members for only a moment, for I can no more add to what has been said by my colleagues than we who are assembled here could add to the grandeur, the glory, and the greatness of the life that we come to commemorate. Those people who know us best are the ones whom we call our neighbors. The Members of this House who served with Col. TAYLOR for a number of years know him as a public official. That he was careful, conservative, industrious, and, above all, a loyal and a faithful public servant was not doubted by any man. When Col. TAYLOR died and was carried back to his home in Arkansas to be buried the pastor of the church to which he belonged, and one who knew him in private life, delivered an oration at his funeral. I desire to incorporate in my remarks the oration of the Rev. Dr. John H. Moore, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD. Dr. Moore expressed my idea and my feelings for our colleague far better than I can. It is a difficult matter to talk about those after death who have been our associates and our friends, and I feel that I could do our friend no greater honor than to reproduce the oration delivered by the pastor of his church that those of us here might know how he was loved by his associates at home. I therefore append this oration as a part of my remarks:

DEAR FELLOW CITIZENS: In the twenty-fifth chapter of Genesis, at the eighth verse, you will find my text for this occasion.

"Then Abraham died in a good old age, an old man, and full of years, and was gathered to his people."

Without burdening you with the processes, I wish to state that a comparison of this phrase "full of years" with the other instances where it occurs and a little deeper look into it reveals that it does not mean length of days. The same expression, "full of years," was used to describe the closing of the lives of Abraham, Isaac, Jehoida, and the patriarch Job. It means satisfied with years. One of these Old World nobles was a preacher; three of them were laymen. They were all men of God and men of affairs, distinct in their individualities, different in their capacities and faculties—varied in their expressions of life, yet all of them came to the same calm close. It means that these men were satisfied with life, having exhausted its possibilities and having reached a satisfactory climax. There was no more to strive for. They were not afraid to die; they did not seek death, but were ready and willing to go when called. The high ambition of youth pursued through stern years had been realized. They came to a tranquil close of a noble life. It is a picture of one sitting down to a table with the choicest food before him. He has now eaten to his fill and when called by his host to retire to another room he calmly pushes back his chair and goes.

This is satisfaction, not satiety. Many men have been burned out with life and some of them go unbidden into the unknown. I have known many old men to come down to the grave having put nothing worth while into life, and therefore received no satisfaction. Ambition and impulse has led them far astray and they looked backward with regret and remorse and forward with doubt and fear. But not so with Abraham and his type of men. My deep conviction is that the man in whose honor this memorial service is held belongs to the type described in this text. Such men have been inspired and guided by the noble ambition expressed by Oliver Wendell Holmes:

"Build thee more stately mansions,
O, my soul,
As the swift seasons roll,
Leave thy low-vaulted past,
Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast,
Till thou at length art free,
Leaving thine outgrown shell
By life's unresting sea."
Then Abraham died.

Death walks with impartial tread. It casts its grim shadow over the palace and the cottage. It has lately invaded high circles and embraced one beloved and honored by his family and by the people whom he represented in the most distinguished law-making body in the world.

It is a custom in America to bury distinguished men in the place where they have lived and are loved most. Washington was buried at Mount Vernon, Abraham Lincoln at Springfield, Ralph Waldo Emerson and Nathaniel Hawthorne are buried under the wind-swept pines of New England. The gentle, noble Washington Irving on the banks of the majestic Hudson. The immortal Henry Clay sleeps in the soil of his beloved Kentucky.

It is fitting, therefore, that Congressman SAM TAYLOR should be laid to rest in the city of Pine Bluff. It was here that he came with his young family more than a third of a century ago. It was here that he developed his ability as a lawyer and public servant and made for himself a reputation which will ever dignify his name. This was his home and the citizens of Pine Bluff and the sixth congressional district recognize with deep appreciation the distinguished escort of Senators and Congressmen. In thus honoring your comrade and friend you have honored yourselves, for it is the universal verdict of the high and low that—

"His life was gentle and the elements so mixed in him that nature might stand up and say to all the world, 'This was a man.'"

In fitting this stately text to this distinguished citizen I will first briefly outline—

1. HIS FULLNESS OF YEARS.

He was born almost three score and ten years ago in Mississippi of noble but not rich parents. His education from the standpoint of schools was negligible. He was one of those rare self-educated men. Endowed with a brilliant mind, a retentive memory, a love for nature and folks, he laid tribute upon every lofty influence which touched his life. Ambitious and determined, he tunneled the mountains, bridged the streams, and rode the storms which came between him and his goal. I happened to know from family sources that he made a living with one hand and studied with the other. Only those who have been educated under such adverse circumstances can appreciate fully what this means. To him these lines were full of meaning:

"Heights of great men reached and kept
Were not attained by sudden flight,
But they, while their companions slept,
Were toiling upward through the night."

In the study and practice of his profession, which for the most part was in our city, he early made a place for himself which he held unchallenged.

Having become a Christian rather early in life, he showed the world anew that a lawyer can and should be a Christian gentleman. He made the law of God the rule of his life and thus lifted himself above the vices which too often mar the ethics of men of his profession.

The resolutions of this bar and the bars of the sixth congressional district, the presence here of so many fine lawyers are an unimpeachable testimonial of their love and reverence for a lawyer who daily practiced the principle of fidelity to truth and honor.

Having aspired to sit in the Hall of Congress, he was five times honored with election to this position of sacred trust. And through all these years he was faithful and efficient and always true to the party to which he gave his lifelong allegiance.

When therefore he came to die he had reason to be satisfied with life from this standpoint. He could ask no more at the hands of his people. A man who has served his day and generation by the will of God can but come to a tranquil close of life.

With reverent hand I now draw aside the curtain of his family life. He loved his family devotedly. He gave his children all the education they wished. He was a good provider for them. He lived to see all of them mature, honorable, happy, and useful. He taught them the great principles of life and religion which had shaped his own course in life and which will always make his memory to them cherished and sacred. No greater heritage can a father leave his children. He was an affectionate and devoted husband to the wife who shared his trials and triumphs, who bore him his children, who companioned his last days, and whose heart most keenly feels and mourns his loss. She now traverses a solemn aisle of pain whose deepest shadows are accessible only to God.

But when a man has made a home and has provided advantages and citizenship for his family and lives to see them securely settled in life he can die with great satisfaction.

The complacent anticipation of death as described in Browning's noble words is in accord with my text:

Grow old along with me:
The best is yet to be,
The last of life, for which the first was made;
Our times are in His hand
Who saith, "A whole I planned,
Youth shows but half; trust God; see all, nor be afraid."

The other part of this text will now claim our attention for a few minutes. "He was gathered to his fathers."

A moment ago I lifted the curtain for a brief look into his earthly home. I shall now lift another curtain and let you look into his heavenly home.

I do not speak in vague terms of immortality. Mr. TAYLOR was a Christian. He was so esteemed by all who knew him. I think I can state his confession of faith in a few sentences. He believed in the inspiration of the Scriptures. He believed in the virgin birth, the Deity, the atonement, and the resurrection of Jesus Christ. He believed in the regeneration and reinvigoration of a human soul by the Holy Spirit of God. He believed in a definite futurity. He based his hope of eternal life on the fact that he put his trust in Jesus.

"He is gathered to his people." He is no stranger there. Let your imaginations people his heaven. His parents are there. Some brothers and sisters. Many of the friends of his youth who died years ago. Many of his comrades in the Senate of Mississippi. Some of his comrades in Congress who have preceded him. Add to this those in all the walks of life whom he knew and loved and served.

All men of his type of mind and calling think much of the great Bible characters. I dare say he will find a charm beyond words in meeting with Abraham, and Jacob, and Joseph, and Moses, and Joshua, and David, and Solomon, and all the great prophets and apostles. I am told by his children that he was a great reader of sermons. He read as a habit many great sermons to his children when they were young. He will look up some of those grand old preachers and tell them what their sermons meant to him. Then he will be in high clover when he meets up with that galaxy of Christian statesmen of England and America whose lives and deeds were his guiding stars in his public career.

Heaven is a real place where real persons are forever in the presence of the blessed God, and in the unbroken companionship of each other.

Men of the bar, let this occasion call your attention with deep solemnity to the fact that you, too, will close your law books for the last time, that you will prepare your last brief, that you will make your last plea in the courts of the world, and you yourselves will stand for final judgment before the Supreme Court of the Universe. The preparation Mr. TAYLOR made for this appearing was a transaction with the Lord Jesus Christ many years ago.

Dear sorrowing companion and children, he marked out the way to heaven for you. It will be no mysterious, meaningless, unknowable meeting. You shall know there even also as you have been known here.

"His day has come, not gone,
His sun is risen, not set,
His life is now beyond
The reach of death or change;
Not ended, but begun."

"God does not send us strange faces every year
When the soft winds blow o'er the pleasant places;
The same old forms look out from the same old faces
When the violet is here.

"It all comes back, odor, grace, and hue,
Each fond relation of the life repeated;
Nothing is lost, no looking for is cheated,
It is the violet we knew.

"So after death's winter, it shall be
God will not put strange sights to heavenly places;
The same old love will look out from the same sweet faces
And we shall cry, 'Beloved, I have thee.'"

And SAMUEL M. TAYLOR died, a man full of years, and was gathered to his people. And may his people and his friends be gathered unto him when they die.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, I would feel amiss as a Member of the American Congress if I did not express my appreciation of the distinguished gentleman, Col. TAYLOR, whose memory we are here to-day to perpetuate. It was my pleasure to meet Col. TAYLOR soon after I came to the Sixty-third Congress. I had spent some time in the southland and we had some things in common. As our acquaintance developed I found that as lawyers we had somewhat similar experiences. Col. TAYLOR had been the district attorney of his own county and I had had the same honor in my county, and out of the exchange of stories and experiences there developed a very strong friendship. I considered Col. TAYLOR one of the best friends that I had in Congress. He was particularly kind to me, coming as I did as a new Member, unacquainted with the rules and practices of this body. He assisted me greatly with his wise counsel and kindly advice, and was always ready to help a new Member. I think it is the experience of every Member of Congress as he looks back to those days when he first came that he can recall some commanding figures who stand out more prominently than all of the rest, perhaps for the very reason that they some time had rendered some service of value to the new Member. Col. TAYLOR was a good man. He had a great fund of experiences; he was a profound lawyer. He was a delightful conversationalist. He was fond of his friends, and he would never pass you by without that hearty "Good morning" so characteristic of the southern gentleman. I really had a very strong attachment for Col. TAYLOR, and it was my privilege to attend the funeral ceremonies in his home town. I thought as I stood in that beautiful church, filled to overflowing with people with tears in their eyes, sorrowing that they had lost a distinguished citizen, that Col. TAYLOR was not only loved in Congress but that he was loved among his own people.

Col. TAYLOR was always proud of his district and his city, but he could look beyond the confines of his own State out into the great Union. He was truly an American, an American statesman, and it was my very great pleasure to have had his friendship.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, in the winter of 1917-18 and the months that followed, when all of us were speaking in different parts of the country with reference to the war, the Liberty loan, and the Red Cross, I had the privilege of being assigned to Pine Bluff, Ark. I knew nothing about Pine Bluff. I knew nothing about Arkansas. I felt very far away from home; but at Pine Bluff I met Congressman TAYLOR, and, without multiplying words, it is sufficient to say that his cordiality and courtesy and hospitality were something beyond words, something which I can never forget. When, on the 4th day of March, 1919, I began my services in this Congress I found the room assigned to me to be the one immediately opposite Representative TAYLOR's room, and in the nearly 1,000 days that have elapsed since then it seems to me that I must have been in his room 1,000 times, as the temporary presiding officer of this body can testify.

And the result of it was an acquaintance which ripened into an affection, and I became obligated to him for myriads of favors, large and small. I do not wish this hour to pass without just a word of tribute from me to his memory. He was good, kind, generous, and able, and I mourn his death as a dear friend.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, it was my pleasure to know the Hon. SAMUEL M. TAYLOR of Arkansas during the last four years of his life only, but during that time I was on intimate terms with him and came to know him and value him as a true friend, citizen, and statesman.

During the time I knew him he was broken in health and of course was not the man whom his constituents knew in the days when he was in his prime and rendering to them the great services which they appreciated and which caused him to be chosen as their representative in the Congress.

When I came to Congress in July, 1917, war had been declared, and the atmosphere around Washington was charged with patriotic fervor, Americanism had taken a new lease of life and the chief topic discussed was the great war which we had just entered. By chance I put up at the hotel where Mr. TAYLOR was stopping. We became acquainted on that day and immediately formed a friendship which lasted during the remainder of his life.

We had many conversations upon all topics, and I found him to be at all times what we have come to term a true Southern gentleman of the old school. He was well educated and had a thorough knowledge of the law, his chosen profession, and had a keen grasp on all public questions pending in Congress. His advice was freely sought by his colleagues, and graciously given, and it will be many long years before the name of Hon. SAMUEL M. TAYLOR is forgotten in the legislative halls of the Congress.

His home life was ideal. He had a splendid wife, two sons, and two daughters, as well as several grandchildren. He often referred, in conversations I had with him, to the various members of his family, all of whom were very dear to him. He had one son who was an officer in the Army of the United States in the World War, and upon many occasions he referred with pride to him and his work for his country. And when the son came back from the war he made a special effort to have me meet him and get acquainted with him.

The world has not produced as many men of the type of Mr. TAYLOR as we would like, but it is a real pleasure to me to know that I was permitted to know him and that we were friends. It has been a source of gratification to me to know that the people of Mr. TAYLOR's district so appreciated his services to the people and the sterling worth of the Taylor family that they elected his son, Chester W. Taylor, to succeed him in the national House of Representatives.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, my personal acquaintance with SAMUEL M. TAYLOR was somewhat limited. I come, however, from the State in which he was born, in which he was educated, and in which he grew to manhood. I come from the same section of that State as he did. It has been my pleasure to know his connections intimately. I was in Little Rock just at the time he was first elected to Congress. I talked with men on the supreme bench and with several of the State officials, and I found something of the very high esteem in which he was held by men of that rank; but I had known SAM TAYLOR better from those who had known him from boyhood.

There is a story in connection with his boyhood days that is worth telling anywhere. Those were the days of reconstruction in the South, when everything in his section of the country was in dilapidation and ruin. Yet there was much of the spirit of the old South in his community. There were many people whose financial fortunes were ruined, but who were recognized as people not only of character but of culture and of intellectuality. There was a country preacher in the community who was a man of learning, of very high character, of attainments, who undertook to exercise something of leadership in shaping the tone of things in the community in those distressful times. For instance, he led the young men in the organization of a literary society and in the organization of a Shakespeare society, and he led in the matter of securing as teachers in the community men of real learning and ability, who would inspire the boys and young men to high ideals and worthy ambitions. The result was that in that immediate community, Verona, Miss., was maintained one of the very best schools in the State in those days of poverty and distress, and from it there came a group of men who have marked that community and distinguished it as I have not known any other small community to be.

It is almost startling to enumerate the men who came out of the locality in which SAM TAYLOR was reared. Among them has been a president of the largest girls' college in the State, a president of the State university, a State superintendent of education, a superintendent of city schools in the largest city in the State, and about four professors in leading colleges of the State, and a president of a prominent Virginia college. So much for educational lines. From that community came also a man who served long and most efficiently on the railroad commission of the State, another who served long on the board of penitentiary management of the State, a president of the Mobile & Ohio Railroad, a general attorney of the Mobile & Ohio Railroad, a traffic manager of the Southern Railway, the leading banker for years of the State of Florida, a speaker of the house of representatives of the State, a leading State official of the State of Texas, and two Members of this House, one of them, the well-known humorist, Congressman Private John Allen, besides other men useful and successful in business, in the ministry, etc. I knew practically all those men personally—the Allens, the Brices, the Russells, the Leavells, the Clarks, the Mabrys, and the Kincannons, and last but not least, the Taylors. SAM TAYLOR grew up as a member of that group of men of whom there were so many to become distinguished in professional, business, and political life.

In a life of nearly 60 years I have never known a community that turned out such a coterie of able and successful men. I have talked with them about SAM TAYLOR, and they looked upon him as a man worthy of every man's friendship, worthy of every man's honor. They believed in him to the core. They believed in him as a man of large ability and true patriotism, and they were proud of him as a member of their group. I met him only occasionally, but I heard many things from those who knew him best, and I found that they believed in him also as a man of great loyalty—loyalty to his friends, loyalty to his country, loyalty to his native State and to his adopted State, and loyalty to eternal principle. They also believed in him as a Christian without hypocrisy, a man without guile, of high ideals and principles, a cheerful but humble servant of God, a friend of all humanity. In thinking of him I am reminded of Leigh Hunt's lines:

Abou Ben Adhem, may his tribe increase,
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw, within the moonlight in his room,
Making it rich and like a lily in bloom.
An angel writing in a book of gold.
Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold,
And to the presence in his room he said,
What writest thou? The vision raised its head,
And with a look made all of sweet accord,
Answered, The names of those who love the Lord.
And is mine one? said Abou. Nay, not so,
Replied the angel. Abou spoke more low,
But cheerily still, and said, I pray thee, then,
Write me as one who loves his fellow men.
The angel wrote and vanished. The next night
It came again, with a great wakening light,
And showed the names whom love of God had bless'd,
And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest.

So I think of SAM TAYLOR as a man who genuinely loved his fellow men, who believed in his fellow men, who had absolute confidence in them; and so they believed in him. He was a man who loved, honored, and served God, his Maker, who realized his obligation to righteousness and truth, and stood fearlessly for the right things.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, some one has said that death is the most fascinating adventure of human existence. Especially may that be true of one who has the Christian faith, as did our late beloved, lamented SAMUEL M. TAYLOR. To him death was but the glorious transition to another world, and he faced it as calmly and serenely as the star of heaven meets the glowing of the morn.

His life was an inspiration to those who cherish friendship or prize the virtues of godly men.

Although Col. TAYLOR and I were born and reared in the same community, I never knew him until I became a Member of this House, owing to the fact that he was many years older than myself and moved away before my time. But during the short period I served with him I learned to read his noble character through the window of his heart, which always stood wide open for the inspection of the world.

He came from one of Mississippi's most worthy and distinguished families, and he carried the high ideals of their traditions throughout his long and useful career. He never stooped to little things, but spurned the idea of infidelity or deceit and stood before the world as the unselfish champion of human rights. His political, like his religious, faith was founded upon basic principles which he never deigned to compromise, and his fidelity to his friends was as constant as a living faith.

In the quiet of the cloakroom I have gone with him back across the reminiscent years and seen him live again his boyhood days among the scenes and among the people we both knew and loved, and I have often noted his unfeigned interest in the fortunes of those friends, many of whom have passed to the great beyond. He told me of his religious experiences, his conversion to the Christian faith, and what a consolation it had been to him through the trying years of his eventful life. He loved to talk of old Hopewell Church, back in Itawamba County, where he first heard the Gospel preached, during the stormy days of reconstruction. He talked of his experience as a struggling young lawyer in the town of Verona, in those days which Senator Bob Taylor, of Tennessee, used to call the "Happy long ago."

He believed in the future and looked forward to the coming of a grander day. He believed in his Government, in peace and in war, and pledged his all to its maintenance and support. He believed in his fellow man, applauded the merits of the righteous, and spread over the shortcomings of those who erred the broad mantle of Christian charity. He believed in God, and

So lived that when the summons came to join
The innumerable caravan, which moves
To that mysterious realm, where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
He went not like the quarry slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon, but, sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approached his grave,
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE WILLIAM E. MASON.

Mr. MANN took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the special order.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. KING, by unanimous consent, Ordered, That Sunday, February 26, 1922, be set apart for addresses on the life, character, and public services of Hon. WILLIAM E. MASON, late a Representative from the State of Illinois.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 294.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. WILLIAM E. MASON, late a member of this House from the State of Illinois.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House, at the conclusion of these exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt a general eulogy on the life and character of WILLIAM E. MASON, though I believe that, excepting the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, who, alas! is soon to leave the House, I am the only Member who served in the Fiftieth Congress with him. But others have been more continuously associated with him and to them I leave the task of doing fuller justice to the services that he rendered and the qualities that he possessed.

For my part, I want to pay him tribute in the one aspect which to my mind was the most attractive, as it was the most impressive, and the most valuable feature of his entire public career.

WILLIAM E. MASON was always the champion of the weaker in every controversy, always the one eager to help the under dog. I think it can be said of him, as of no other Member in either House, that during the whole of his public career no wrong was ever attempted to be perpetrated by a Government, in any part of the world, that MASON's heart did not throb with sympathy for the oppressed, and with a fiery eloquence all his own he denounced the oppression and encouraged resistance to it. To him an act of tyranny by a Government was a profanation of the earth, of the world, created by a merciful God to be the dwelling place of free men. To him it was always apparent, and always present that there never was but one circumstance under which in the whole course of existence the earth became articulate. No violence to itself has ever sufficed to make it break the majestic silence which it has maintained since its creation. The footsteps of myriads pass over its surface without awakening resistance. The plowshare might furrow it without provoking any other result than the abundant harvest which blessed the labors of the husbandman. Its entrails might be torn by the pickax without any other result than the ores yielded by its bosom to reinforce the productive powers of man. Once, and once only does it find a voice, and that is when the blood of God's creatures stains its face. Wherever human blood is spilt as a result of oppression or wrong, there the earth calls aloud to heaven for vengeance upon the slayer. And the man through whom that call finds expression becomes the instrument of the Divine purpose to avenge the crime—and by avenging it prevent or at least discourage its repetition.

It is in that character that I think those who knew him best love to look upon Mr. MASON; it is in that character that, in my judgment, his fame will be most enduring and brilliant. Now that he has gone, I feel—I think we must all feel—that the earth is richer for holding within her bosom that body which when living was the force that made the call for vengeance upon the shedder of innocent blood—the blood of patriots—re-echo in these halls, and everywhere throughout the world. And the indignation awakened throughout the world over oppressions perpetrated by any part of it has been the most powerful agency ever established for promotion of justice and freedom. If, as most of us, I think, believe, death is but liberation of the soul from the body in which it has been imprisoned, then the spirit of Mason, no longer trammelled, confined, or limited by restraints of space or time or matter, is now surveying, with joy beyond the power of us mortals to understand, in widely separated parts of the world—in the Philippines, in South Africa, in Ireland—where blood was shed in defense of national existence, the cause that he championed already victorious or moving rapidly and irresistibly to victory complete and decisive. And it must be for all of us here an inspiring memory that one of our members has contributed so largely to the spread of liberty and battled so triumphantly for the vindication of justice wherever war has been waged for freedom in any part of the world during the 30 years or more of his service in this House and the other House of Congress.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, "When that the poor have cried, Caesar hath wept."

On the morning of the 16th of June, A. D. 1921, Hon. WILLIAM ERNEST MASON, a Member of this House and a Representative at Large from Illinois, departed this life in his apartments at Congress Hall Hotel in this city at the age of 70 years, 11 months, and 11 days.

The mournful news spread rapidly upon Capitol Hill and through the halls of the House Office Building and about the purviews of the Capitol itself and quiet emotion held gentle sway when BILLY MASON died. The flags on the Government buildings seemed automatically to reach half-mast and when the House of Representatives met at noon, the Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON of Illinois, and patriarch of Congress, rose in his seat and announced the sad event.

Immediately the House adjourned.

WILLIAM E. MASON was a son of Lewis J. and Nancy (Winslow) Mason, his father a wagon maker and a pioneer of the West, locating at Bentonsport, Iowa, in 1858. There were 14 children in the family, in addition to two others adopted by the kindly couple, and even after the elder Mason became a furniture merchant and hotel proprietor, the family was in none too prosperous circumstances.

WILLIAM E. MASON was born in Franklinville, Cattaraugus County, N. Y., July 7, 1850, and was thrown upon his own resources at the age of 15 years by the death of his father, having been educated in the public schools and Birmingham College, where he pursued a two years' course. From 1866 to 1870 he taught school, during the last two years of that time at Des Moines, Iowa, and during this period he completed his classical studies and took up the study of the law. Finally he entered the office of Thomas J. Withrow, an eminent corporation lawyer, who soon afterwards became general solicitor of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad Co., with headquarters at Chicago.

When his preceptor entered upon his railroad duties, Mr. Mason accompanied him to Chicago in order to complete his legal preparation under his able guidance, and thus was formed a lifelong connection with the metropolis. After another year with Mr. Withrow, he entered the office of John N. Jewett, remaining for several years with this noted Chicago lawyer. In 1872, shortly after attaining his majority, Mr. Mason was admitted to the Illinois bar, practicing independently until 1877, when he formed a partnership with M. R. M. Wallace.

A later professional association was as senior member of the firm of Mason, Ennis & Bates, and from 1898 until his death he was in partnership with his son, Lewis F., as Mason & Mason, the firm possessing extensive and influential legal connections.

In 1879, and before he arrived at the age of 30 years, he was elected as a State representative in the Illinois General Assembly and in 1881 was chosen State Senator. After serving four years in that capacity he was elected to the Fiftieth Congress of the United States and then reelected to the Fifty-first Congress.

At the close of this Congressional term for a period of six years he devoted himself assiduously to his profession in Chicago and during this time he was deeply interested in the affairs of the World's Columbian Exposition, playing a leading part in locating it in Chicago, and in the formation of plans for its inauguration.

In 1897 the State of Illinois returned him to Washington as United States Senator. From 1903 until 1917, Mr. Mason was again in private life but all the while remained active in the councils of the Republican Party and appearing on the ticket as an elector and in its national conventions as a delegate. In 1916 he was elected to the Sixty-fifth, and afterwards reelected to the Sixty-sixth and Sixty-seventh Congresses.

Briefly, the foregoing events mark the life course of our lamented colleague, WILLIAM E. MASON.

No one better than Marc Antony ever knew how to play on the human heartstrings of the masses. He produced there not only the most varied emotions, but united and molded them into energy and activity. In his oration over the dead body of Caesar he did not invite in the first instance the attention of his hearers to the great deeds which Caesar had performed for the Empire or to the captives and ransoms which Caesar had won for Rome, or that Caesar had thrice put away the kingly crown, nor did Antony at once exhibit Caesar's mantle to the crowd "first worn when he returned from overcoming the Nervii," or yet the cuts in it. Nor did he even attempt to read Caesar's generous will in behalf of the people until he had first obtained the eager sympathy of his hearers by showing that Caesar, whatever his faults, was their friend—the outstanding fact in his favor was, however, that "when that the poor have cried, Caesar hath wept."

It was Caesar's efforts to alleviate the condition of the masses that they remembered with gratitude after his death, rather than his armies, his conquests and his empires.

After all, what greater encomiums can be pronounced at the bier of a public man than to have it said he was a friend of the poor and unfortunate, a man of most modest fortune, yet the sun of no day dropped into the West without some gentle or encouraging word said or kind deed done by our dead friend, and who is there who can deny the thought that when on that beautiful June morning his transcending soul passed noiselessly through the gates into the everlasting foyer his name was not, by the Recording Angel, already inscribed in Abou Ben Adhem's eternal column of those who loved their fellow men.

Speak of beauty in nature or in an art, and "BILLY" MASON became at once an eager listener and keen participator, and the sound of a pure musical note awoke in him the song of his own soul which in his younger days revealed itself in the clearest of tenor tones.

Free from hypocrisy, clean of cant and detesting false pretenses, and having at a very early day in his life armed himself with the good sword of truth, he fought black error throughout his career in every hideous shape in which he found it—a brave and fearless man who surrendered it alone to death.

The law is a jealous mistress. This ancient statement has had its truth tested upon multitudinous occasions. While the law demands for itself constant attention and worship, nevertheless frequently grants her indulgence and permits an occasional glance by her suitor toward her less staid sister—the Goddess of Politics—not covering, however, any great period of time.

WILLIAM E. MASON was one of those who successfully wooed both sisters without arousing the jealousy of either. He was a natural lawyer and a natural politician in the higher sense. While acting in one capacity or the other he was able to give the matter in hand his undivided attention, reinforced by his strong mentality, and producing a high, honorable, and effective representation of his client or the people. So the law ratified in him this double fealty which she condemned in others.

A review of Mr. Mason's history as a lawyer demonstrates that he was not only a great advocate but a great exponent of the common law which Sir Edward Coke said was "reason itself." He was a great case lawyer as well and could draw with ease from his memory innumerable citations without resort to the digest.

One of his famous cases of great public interest in which his legal ability was fairly tested grew out of the World's Fair at Chicago. For several months prior to its opening the public was considerably agitated over the Sunday question. Several cases were brought to the United States court of The People versus the World's Columbian Exposition to restrain the management from keeping open on Sunday. In May an action had been brought by Mr. Mason, attorney for Charles Clingman, against the exposition to restrain the defendants from closing the gates on Sunday. The suit was brought both in the capacity of a stockholder of the exposition company and as a taxpayer of the city of Chicago. On May 29 the case came before Judge Stein, of the Superior Court, who granted the injunction on the contention advanced by Mr. MASON that Jackson Park had been dedicated by an act of the legislature (1869) to be held, managed, and enjoyed as a public park, for the recreation and the health of the public, and "to be open to all persons forever." He held that this act had not been invalidated by any of the legislation in reference to the exposition and, indeed, that it was beyond the power of the legislature to dispense with it. Afterward, finding that the Sunday attendance did not make the opening profitable, the exposition managers voted to close, and were individually fined by Judge Stein for contempt of court, and, on appeal to the Superior Court, the injunction was sustained, and the fair was kept open thereafter on Sundays.

From the very beginning of his legal career he drew the admiration of the bar and of the people and on sheer merit he secured a certain place in his chosen profession which he held until the close of his life. As a lawyer he was indeed "diligent in his business and he stood before kings."

Above all things Mr. MASON was a lover of his family and his home. For him the earth furnished no other equal attraction. Once he showed me a picture of this wonderful family consisting of himself and that good and true companion, who had shared with him in the profits and losses of life, his wife, Edith Mason, together with sons, daughters, daughter-in-law, and grandchildren, all together numbering 24 persons. He spoke enthusiastically and tenderly of his family in a perfect gem of eloquence and recited to me the wonderful charades and other games they used to play. Is it any wonder that as he stood in this place on January 19, 1919, and eulogized our dead colleague, John A. Sterling, on a similar occasion, in a burst of feeling he said:

Of course, Mr. Speaker, we do not agree with Col. Ingersoll that "Life is a barren vale between the cold and barren peaks of two eternities." Of course, every man who has had one friend, who has had one woman to love him, and children to caress him, does not agree with Col. Ingersoll that "Life is a barren plane," but a plane with barren spots; but the oasis comes whenever we meet a friend and find an opportunity to be of use and service.

His popularity in Illinois was unequalled. A simple announcement that he would speak at a certain place brought out the city dweller and the rural citizen with equal eagerness in great crowds to hear him. He was a favorite speaker in Chicago and on many occasions he has filled that city's great Coliseum to overflowing.

All this was due to the faith the people had in him as much as to his ability as a speaker. They knew, to use a slang phrase, that he "lived on the level," that his life was an open book, and that above all he was a consistent follower in his every-day life of that great principle which, though uttered nearly 2,000 years ago in a voice so gentle and sweet, has yet sounded down through the ages like a clarion note to the consciences of mankind, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them."

With many others it was my good fortune to hold his personal friendship and so to enjoy his fund of anecdotes, always given to embellish an argument or drive home a point, together with the words of wisdom always dropping from his lips and to enjoy and bask in the sunshine of his smile—bright in memory today. Strong, forceful, and courageous in a fray, yet conciliation and kindness itself in the everyday work of life, BILLY MASON never injured mankind nor hurt a dumb animal for, as I believe, he supplemented the observance of the Golden Rule with a deep-set, beautiful conviction, which no doubt greatly aided him in speeding over life's trail, as were expressed by Coleridge in his Ancient Mariner, that:

He prayeth best who loveth best
All things, both great and small,
For the dear God who loveth us
He made and loveth all.

One of Senator MASON's great qualities and one which endeared him to his associates and which won him friends and admirers wherever he was known, was his gift of eloquence, his power as an orator. It has been said of him, "He commanded all departments of forensic art, yet he was so natural in manner, so simple in delivery, so expert in shading and emphasis, so persuasive and convincing, that his audiences were conscious only of compelling leadership of thought, of uninterrupted communion with a splendid mind through the medium of faultless speech."

Early manhood found Mason a worshipper, as it were, of the spirit of Abraham Lincoln, and a strong exponent of his principles. No doubt this emulation existed throughout his entire career and strengthened and supplemented his efforts in rendering aid to the masses, to the poor, to the submerged and the inarticulate. He believed that the good of the people was the highest law. He abhorred tyranny in all forms. He did not uphold either the divine right of kings or any other human being or groups of human beings to exercise, directly or indirectly, a divine right to rule a people. He agreed with Rumbald when he said:

I never could believe that Providence had sent a few men into the world ready booted and spurred to ride and millions ready saddled and bridled to be ridden.

As a legislator, MASON upheld all measures of interest to the people at large. He was a strong advocate of the rural free delivery bill and championed all bills favoring the rights of labor and curbing their antagonists. He was one of the first to stand out boldly for the freeing of Cuba, and his efforts at that period of his career are written in the imperishable records of his country.

Had he been a citizen of the Roman Republic he would have been an associate and colleague of the Gracchii. In the age of chivalry his undying devotion to the weak and the unfortunate would have made him a rival in their affections with Cid the Campeador of Valencia.

BILLY MASON was a staunch patriot. He loved his country, and there was no rock upon its hillsides, no wave that kissed its shores, no blade of grass upon its prairies, for which he would not have yielded his heart's "ruddiest drops." He believed in the Declaration of Independence as written by the forefathers. The Constitution was as fixed for him as the North Star is to the mariner. He sang the Star Spangled Banner without the dotting of an i or the crossing of a t. He rose in protest at the exhibition of any tendency to modify our Revolutionary history or weaken our Revolutionary ideals. A typical American, he believed that Nathan Hale was a patriot and that he uttered those memorable words, "I regret that I have but one life to lose for my country," and he never for a moment doubted that Ticonderoga was captured by Ethan Allen in the name of the Great Jehovah and the Continental Congress.

Mr. MASON's colleagues here knew him perhaps better than most people, and it is by them that the sincerity of his purpose, the warmth of his feelings, the staunchness of his moral stand, and the unflinching strength of his friendships are appreciated at their true valuation. Viewed from any angle, WILLIAM E. MASON was one of the outstanding figures of his day, a man who held the public attention to an age when most men seek quietude of retirement, a man of strong character and personality.

Mr. Speaker, our friend and colleague is gone, his eloquent voice is stilled forever. No more shall it ring out in behalf of liberty. No more shall it plead "trumpet-tongued" against man's inhumanity to man. The lowly have lost their advocate, but they bear his name engraven upon their hearts. He received the only reward with which a public servant can be content—the inner consciousness which tells him that he has done his work well.

Can we not think in the closing scene "when unto his dying eyes the casement slowly grew a glimmering square" this great and tender-hearted tribune of the people, as the morning sun, symbolic of renewity, touched with gold the great dome of the near-by Capitol, heard the receding voices of his friends the populace saying,

He has fought a good fight,
He has finished his course,
He has kept the faith.

Mr. RODENBERG. Mr. Speaker,

I do not know
Where falls the seed that I have tried to sow
With greatest care;
But I shall know
The meaning of each waiting hour below,
Sometime, somewhere!

The career of no man whom I have ever known was a finer exemplification of sincere, unselfish, and devoted service to his fellow man than that of WILLIAM E. MASON. There was none so quick as he to respond to every call of human suffering. His soul was filled with a deep and abiding sympathy for all mankind. He was always the fearless champion of truth and justice, and his brave heart never faltered in the defense of the right as God gave him to see the right. Instinctively, he rebelled against every form of wrong and oppression. The cry of distress, the appeal of the helpless and the unfortunate, thrilled his soul like a bugle call and kindled into life all of the passionate fires of a matchless eloquence. He pleaded humanity's cause at all times and under all circumstances. Undeterred by criticism and unaffected by the temporary loss of popularity, he steadfastly adhered to a course that was dictated by a conscience responsive to a finely developed sense of righteousness.

BILLY MASON was never guilty of an unjust, an unkind, or an ungenerous act. He was the enemy of none and the friend of all. There was nothing vindictive in his nature. He was free of all malice and was ever ready to cover with the mantle of charity the frailties and shortcomings of his fellow man. I never knew a gentler or a kindlier soul. The warmth of his genial personality dispelled the mists of gloom and radiated sunshine and good cheer wherever he went.

Mr. Speaker, Illinois has added many names to the roll of distinguished American statesmen, but none of her great sons who have left their impress on the pages of her inspiring history had a stronger hold on the affections of the people than BILLY MASON. He was easily the most popular campaign speaker in the State of Illinois. Brilliant in repartee, logical in argument, unflinching in his good humor and endowed with a wonderful gift of expression, his eloquent voice always aroused his audience to the highest pitch of enthusiasm. He possessed an originality that was as captivating as it was unique. There were times when he was not in full harmony with the majority sentiment of his party associates and at such times he pleaded his cause with an earnestness that always commanded universal respect and with a complete disregard for the effect upon his own political fortunes. And yet, when these differences of opinion arose, those who disagreed with him never treasured the slightest resentment against BILLY MASON. They gave him full credit for honesty and sincerity of purpose and admired the courage and fearlessness with which he defended his position. They knew that whatever mistakes he made, they were of the head and not of the heart.

It is yet too early to measure the compelling influence of his life upon his day and generation. We do know, however, that none played better his part in the great drama of human affairs, and that in reviewing his career we can draw an inspiration for patriotic effort, recalling the words of Philip James Bailey:

We live in deeds, not years; in thoughts, not breaths; in feelings, not in figures on a dial.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MANN). The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, it was a sad day to me when the flags on this Capitol were lowered to half-mast for the death of my friend for almost a lifetime, the Hon. WILLIAM E. MASON.

Abou Ben Adhem, may his tribe increase,
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw, within the moonlight in his room,
Making it rich and like a lily in bloom,
An angel writing in a book of gold.
Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold,
And to the presence in the room he said,
"What writest thou?" The vision raised its head,
And with a look made all of sweet accord,
Answered, "The names of those who love the Lord."
"And is mine one?" said Abou. "Nay, not so,"
Replied the angel, Abou spoke more low,
But cheerily still, and said, "I pray thee, then,
Write me as one that loves his fellow men."
The angel wrote and vanished. The next night
It came again, with a great wakening light,
And showed the names whom love of God had bless'd,
And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest.

And so I can truthfully say of our departed friend and colleague that he was "one who loved his fellow men," and more than that, that he was beloved by his fellow men. I am not overstating the fact that when I say that he had as many warm personal friends as any other man in all the State of Illinois. I knew him for all the years of his public life and for more than 40 years enjoyed his personal friendship; he was my friend and I was his friend. I first met him when the Legislature of Illinois first convened in January, 1879, both of us having been elected to the thirty-first general assembly of the State at the preceding November election. We became warm friends from that time and so continued to the day of his death. I think I served with him in a legislative capacity in the Legislature of Illinois and in the Congress of the United States for more years than any other man, and I knew him as well as one man could know another. Mr. MASON was a great campaigner and his services were in demand in every political campaign in Illinois for near half a century. He was always eloquent and convincing. He had a wonderful command of language and of apt illustrations, which, coupled with a ready wit, always captivated his audiences. And the beauty of it all was that he was sincere, believed in his party, and was always its enthusiastic advocate. I have campaigned with him many times, and his addresses were always as interesting to me as to his audience, for he never made the same speech twice. He always had something new to say, or a different way of stating the same proposition, or a new argument in support of his contention. He was always eloquent, always earnest, always convincing.

In the Thirty-fourth General Assembly of Illinois we staged in that State the most spectacular and long-drawn-out contest for the election of a United States Senator that ever occurred in all the history of the country. At that time the senate of the State consisted of 51 members and the house of 153. The senate had a Republican majority of 1 and the house a Democratic majority of 1, so that the joint assembly, charged with the election of a United States Senator, was a tie, having a membership of 102 Republicans and 102 Democrats. One of the leading members of the State senate was Senator WILLIAM E. MASON. Gen. John A. Logan was a candidate for reelection to the United States Senate and was enthusiastically supported by the Republican members, and especially so by Senator MASON, who regarded him as the ideal of a man, a soldier, and a statesman. The balloting for Senator began, and each day was without result until a Democratic member died, and in due time another Democrat was elected as his successor. Then a Republican member died and again the matter dragged along until another Republican was elected as his successor. Then another Democratic member died, and, hailing from a district in which every precinct was Democratic, no one seemed to doubt that he would also be succeeded by another Democrat.

It was not generally known that there was to be any Republican candidate, but the day before the special election to fill the vacancy numerous cattle buyers and sewing-machine agents might have been observed riding around the district, and strangely, if carefully noticed, it might have been observed that they called only on Republicans. So it just happened that next day when the ballots were counted it was found that a Republican had been elected in that overwhelmingly Democratic district, and so after a four months' contest, in which many exciting incidents occurred, Gen. Logan received the necessary 103 votes in the joint assembly and was duly elected. Throughout all that contest Senator MASON was one of the most active and vigilant supporters of Gen. Logan, and I think was quite as much pleased over his election as Gen. Logan himself. After the contest was over the 103 whose votes had finally resulted in Gen. Logan's election formed an organization and planned to meet once a year to renew the friendships formed during that session and for a general social time. For several years they did so meet. At the last meeting Senator MASON was chosen president of the 103, and year after year tried to get the survivors together for the regular annual meeting, but it was possible to secure the attendance of only a very few, so many had died or moved away, and so it was finally necessary to give up entirely all hope of getting any considerable number together, much to the regret of Senator MASON. And now after the lapse of 37 years I think there are less than a dozen of all the 103 living on this earth. The great majority have gone to meet their leader, Gen. Logan, on that other unknown shore, and there it may be that Senator MASON may be able to get a very full attendance if he should call a meeting of the 103 over there.

Of all the men who at one time or another served with Senator MASON and myself in the Legislature of Illinois in the years gone by, I can but note that only a very few are alive to-day. And here in this House, those of us who have been here for a number of years can but note the absence of many of our former colleagues when the knowledge comes home to us that they have passed over, their life's work done, and that we shall know them no more on earth. But we shall know them, we shall meet them sometime, somewhere. It often happens here that one of our colleagues dies and the flags on this Capitol are placed at half-mast, but soon those same flags float again as high as before, and the world goes on and on just the same.

Our colleague, BILLY MASON, has gone, but he has only gone on before, just a little while before; and in just a little while we shall meet him over there, genial, kindly BILLY MASON, friend of all mankind, and we shall grasp his hand and see that friendly smile which so often greeted us here, but now—

How strange it seems, with so much gone
Of life and love to still live on.

Look where we may, the wide earth o'er,
Those lighted faces smile no more.

Yet love will dream, and faith will trust (Since He who knows our need is just),
That somehow, somewhere, meet we must.
Alas, for him who never sees
The stars shine through his cypress trees,
Who, hopeless, lays his dead away,
Nor looks to see the breaking day
Across the mournful marbles play,
Who hath not learned in hours of faith,
The truth to flesh and sense unknown,
That life is ever lord of death,
And love can never lose its own.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, WILLIAM E. MASON was not cast in an ordinary mold. Mentally and intellectually he towered far above the ordinary mortal. Well do I remember our first meeting. I had come to Washington to attend the extraordinary session of Congress which convened in April, 1917, and found the air filled with talk of war and carnage, destruction and desolation. The fateful day when the die was to be cast came, and never shall I forget the wonderful debates held upon the resolution to declare war. It was such a scene as will linger in my memory so long as life remains. Of those who spoke upon the resolution none were more fearless, none more eloquent, none more patriotic and sincere, than Mr. MASON. I can see him now, standing in the well of the House four-square to the world, pleading, in a plaintive way, for peace. His were the words of a prophet, but they fell on deaf ears, for every man present had made up his mind how he would vote, although the roll had not yet been called on the resolution which committed this great and glorious country to participation in the world struggle. I then became deeply attached to Mr. MASON and I am happy in the knowledge that this attachment continued to grow until my friend was called to a greater and nobler life. Mr. MASON had a heart that embraced all mankind. Any cause of suffering or distress won his sympathy and active support and once he became committed to a cause did not lay down his arms until it had triumphed. In his passing the Nation lost a true and tried legislator, the State of Illinois a grand and upright son, his family a true and loving father, and we who are here to-day a wise counsellor and friend. His passing has created a void that can not be filled. Uncle BILLY, we miss you. Peace unto your ashes.

How shall words our grief abate?
Call him noble; call him great;
Say that faith, now gaunt and grim,
Once was fair because of him;
Say that goodness, round his way,
Made one everlasting day;
Say that beauty's heavenly flame
Bourgeoned wheresoe'er he came;
Say that all life's common ways
Were made glorious in his gaze;

Say he gave us, hour by hour,
Hope and patience, grace and power;
Say his spirit was so true
That it made us noble, too.
What is this but to declare
Life's bereavement, Love's despair?
What is this but just to say
All we loved is torn away?
O my comrade, O my friend,
If this parting be the end,
Yet I hold my life divine
To have known a soul like thine!

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I shall not invade those sacred and intimate precincts of Senator MASON's family and home life. I knew him for a period of only four years prior to his death. My association with him was made more intimate by the fact that we were members of the same committee in this House.

Two outstanding characteristics of the man left their impress upon me. One was his gentle and friendly qualities, and the other was his political courage. I remember when he first returned to this House in the Sixty-fifth Congress. By accident our hotel rooms adjoined. Along in the still hours of the night on one occasion, at 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning, I was aroused by sounds of distress coming from his chamber. I had not at that time formed his personal acquaintance, having had a mere introduction to him in the lobby of the hotel; but responding to the most common impulses of humanity I went to his room and found him ill. Of course, I rendered such slight and unskilled services as I could. His first thought then was of his wife and his family, who were in their home in Chicago. But simple and commonplace as my ministrations were, he reminded me of them, on almost every meeting during the four years that followed, by some reference, some exaggerated estimate of the services I had rendered him on that occasion.

I remember when a boy, before I came to voting age, I read of Mr. MASON while he was in the Senate of the United States. I remember the fierce contest that raged within his own party over his separation from the predominating opinion of the Republican Party on the question of the Philippines and on the questions that grew out of the Spanish-American War. I remember with what admiration I viewed his course during that struggle. Perhaps I have a wrong estimate, but I remember that as a result perhaps of his divergence from the controlling view of his party he lost his seat in the upper House of Congress. I then admired his course. So when I found him here I was prepared somewhat for the exhibitions of political courage which he displayed in this body.

Political courage is quickened by no stirring martial music; no fluttering banners beckon. Few are the comrades by your side to give you something of their enthusiasm and of the fervor that moves men on to conflict. Political courage looks out upon no prospect of glory at the end, but it looks down a dark, cold, and forbidding avenue. But I believe Senator MASON possessed that rare quality of political courage that dared to face a vote or dared to choose a pathway that might perhaps end in defeat or despair.

Whether in attack or in defense he always unsheathed a valiant blade—a blade hammered out in the foundries of logic and common sense, tempered and sharpened in the fiery forges of sarcasm and ridicule, and yet so curved and pointed and polished by the grace and skill of the orator as to make it a thing of magic when wielded by that master of mind and emotion.

I journeyed with the committee that carried to his home in Chicago all that was mortal of our colleague and laid him in the bosom of Mother Earth. I saw a great concourse of citizens of Illinois come to pay him the last earthly tribute. They came not because he possessed power, because at the gates of death he had abdicated his power. They came not because he possessed wealth, because what little he had had fallen from his hands. But that great multitude of those who knew him came and in sorrow stood by his bier because they loved him.

On the return journey I had the privilege of reading a little book that Senator MASON had written. Perhaps all of you are familiar with it. It was entitled "John, the Unafraid." It told the story of an humble citizen who had promulgated a simple faith unmingled with creed and had worked the regeneration of the whole community in which he lived through his humble, godlike walk among his fellow men and by his unselfish life of service and trusting faith in God without cant, and heedless of dissension and schism that sometimes mar the religious life of nations and people.

I remember that that little volume closed with these words:

No matter how dark the night, there is a light still burning in the window, and the door of the Church of the Brotherhood is never locked.

I believe that when death came to BILLY MASON, no matter how dark that night, no matter how dreary that pathway, I believe he saw the light that was still burning in the window, and I know that for him the door of the Church of the Brotherhood was not locked.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, when Mr. MASON left us I felt that not only had the Nation lost a most valuable statesman, the people of Illinois a most conscientious Representative, and Chicago a most honored citizen, but that I personally had sustained an irreparable loss.

For 40 years I have known Mr. MASON intimately. I have watched his political career through all of its interesting and varied phases and know how faithfully and conscientiously he has served his city, State, and Nation in all those years. I have observed, too, how untiring he was in his efforts to help the oppressed and unfortunate, whether they were in his own immediate vicinity or far across the sea; whether the oppressed and unfortunate consisted of a nation or merely some obscure unknown individual. And I am certain that even those who did not agree with him in his policies must have been deeply impressed by the earnestness of purpose, the deep and sincere love for humanity, and the unselfish, untiring, self-forgetful bigness of the man.

I have known him, too, in his family and social life, and have seen the nobility and beauty of character which are truly an inspiration to all who knew him intimately as I did.

His love for and understanding of little children was one of his most beautiful characteristics. It was not an unusual sight to see him surrounded by children and young people, all listening with profound interest to his stories, or blending their young voices with his in song.

As a friend, he was devoted and loyal. Always ready with a word of cheer and a sunny smile in times of stress, or a word of wise counsel and advice in times of doubt and confusion. A man who inspired love and confidence in all who were associated with him.

And so, to-day, I think of him with love and veneration, and with gratitude in my heart that it was my privilege to have the friendship of a man who so beautifully exemplified in the most complete and unlimited degree the character of a true patriot and a noble Christian gentleman.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Speaker, I have not come here to make a speech. I have no prepared address. I have come here only by my presence and with a word to pay my tribute to one whom I knew and loved for many years.

I met WILLIAM E. MASON first back in 1897, when he came to the Senate as I was leaving the House. He had been in Congress before and I had known of him, but my personal acquaintance with him dated from that time. Later in this Congress we served together on the Foreign Affairs Committee, and then I came to know more of him. The one thing that everyone knew of WILLIAM E. MASON, no matter what may have been the subject under discussion, no matter what may have been the situation at the time, was his love of humanity. You speak of his independence. That very independence for which he was noted was based upon his love of his fellow man. Such was the underlying keynote that went through all his life, and I wish particularly to pay tribute to him because of his love for his fellow man. When he died, not only Irish freedom, but freedom wherever oppression existed, lost a friend. They say he has gone forever. Ah, no. He has departed, but he still lives.

He has outsoared the shadows of the night,
Envy and calumny and grief and pain,
And that unrest which men miscall delight
Can touch him not, and torture not again.
From the contagion of the world's slow stain
He is immune and now can never mourn;
And yet he lives, for memories of his good deeds
Are our companions in this world forlorn.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I deem it a privilege to add my expression of regard and affection for my late colleague and good friend, the Hon. WILLIAM ERNEST MASON. While he was, at the time of his demise, a Member at large from Illinois and for many years lived in another congressional district, his original home in Illinois was at Waukegan, in Lake County, in the district which it is now my honor to represent, and his mortal remains were entombed, as I was privileged to witness, in the family burial lot in Oakwood Cemetery in the city of Waukegan on June 20, 1921.

I first became well acquainted with our late colleague in the memorable political campaign of 1896. In that year he lent his great energy and influence first to the nomination and later to the election of William McKinley as President of the United States. Mr. Mason was then in his prime. He had served as a Representative in the Fiftieth and Fifty-first Congresses from March 4, 1887, to March 3, 1891, representing the old third district, when only 4 of the 21 Representatives from Illinois resided in Chicago as against 11 out of 27 at the time of Mr. Mason's death. His services in the 1896 campaign were fittingly rewarded by his election to the United States Senate by the legislature in 1897.

No higher recognition of Mr. Mason's ability as a campaign orator could have been given him than his selection by his party to engage in joint debate with the standard bearer of the Democracy in 1896, the matchless platform speaker, then also in the vigor of his youth, William Jennings Bryan. I well remember Mr. Mason's discussion of the issues of the tariff and the free coinage of silver. We spoke together at some places in Illinois. On one occasion that summer, at Princeton, at meetings arranged by the Swedish-American Republican League of Illinois, then recently organized, Mr. Mason spoke between five and six hours during the afternoon and evening. His speeches seemed never to tire either himself or his audiences. What a magnificent voice he had! What fluency of speech; what wealth of information; what delightful humor; what moving pathos and sentiment; what keen invective and satire; how stirring his appeal! Through all his speeches, also, there rang a clear silvery tone of love of home and country. His mere recital of "Home Sweet Home" brought tears to his audience. His patriotic references to the flag and to the Republic brought repeated cheers from his listeners. His colleagues in this House and in the Senate saw many flashes of his wit and eloquence, but his true greatness as an orator was best displayed among the masses of the people, when he roamed at will on the wide range of human interest and emotion.

His kindness was proverbial. He would rather suffer imposition than refuse a possibly worthy case his help. He was the life of every group or gathering in which he might be found. An interesting conversationalist on any subject, his fund of stories and anecdotes out of his own experience and out of the common source seemed inexhaustible. He was highly musical, not in a technical but in a natural sense. He sang well, understood and appreciated music thoroughly, and possessed the rare gift known to musicians as "perfect pitch." In March of last year he and some members of his family joined in a trip to Panama. During the moon-lit nights on the Atlantic he constantly entertained groups of friends with reminiscences and stories and frequently his melodious voice was heard "rocking on the billows of the deep."

Four years representing a district in the national House of Representatives, six years representing his State in the national Senate, and a little over four years more in this body as a Member at large from Illinois (in the Sixty-fifth, Sixty-sixth, and Sixty-seventh Congresses) mark his congressional career. He also served in the House of Representatives and in the Senate of the Legislature of Illinois. His profession was that of lawyer, which he practiced in the city of Chicago from his admission to the bar in 1872 until his death, with the necessary interruptions for public service.

Mr. MASON's death brought sorrow not only to his family and close relatives and friends and to the membership of this House, but to thousands, many thousands, who loved him and admired him. Few men in our country have reached as large a number of our citizens through public speech as did he. He gave his full part to the constructive, legislative work of the bodies in which he served. He was faithful to his trust, industrious, and effective. He spread sunshine and pleasure wherever he went. A widow, children, and grandchildren mourn him as a loving husband and affectionate father and grandparent. His State and his country mourn him as a faithful and patriotic public servant. He forewent wealth and luxury for public service and for the pleasurable society of family and friends. Do not such achievements measure a successful life? Assuredly they do! He lives best who loves best and serves best the persons and things intrusted to his care!

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, there are few men who have served in the House of Representatives in recent years who have equaled, and none have surpassed, WILLIAM E. MASON for political fearlessness, ability, and for masterful oratory, which were his outstanding characteristics. There has been no Member of the House in all its long history who ever equaled WILLIAM E. MASON for his fearless devotion to the cause of oppressed people. He was in season and out of season ready to lend a helping hand to the man or woman who was in misfortune. Of all the poor people who went to him in distress none went away empty handed, and for all he had a welcome and a word of cheer. He was in truth the champion of the oppressed and the unfortunate.

The most conspicuous feature of his long political career was his fight against imperialism in opposition to the views of President McKinley, the leader of his party.

Undaunted by all kinds of political pressure, he courageously attacked, along with Senator HOAR of Massachusetts and Speaker REED, the policy of his party to retain the Philippines. Although defeated in his object and driven out of the Senate because of his valiant and unceasing efforts to give liberty to small nations, he never compromised with what he understood to be a grievous wrong.

Viewing the situation in the light of to-day it might have saved this country from many of its present difficulties if his advice had been followed when he opposed the imperial policy of the United States. Although he failed in freeing the Philippines he was successful in helping to secure the independence of Cuba.

Throughout his entire political life he was never subservient to the dictations of the interests or of the subsidized press.

He was absolutely fearless in his record of votes, and in all his public utterances. He had the fearlessness that came from absolute honesty. He could not be intimidated by the press that has ceased to discharge the function for which it was established—the impartial dissemination of news and has become a mere circular to preserve the interests that support its advertising columns.

We, of New York State, are honored by having presented to the Nation WILLIAM E. MASON, and proudly claim a right to share with Illinois his achievements and his eminent career in public life. We are also indebted to him for helping to pass, by his eloquent remarks, the joint resolution to locate the Grant Memorial Tomb on Riverside Drive, which is to-day one of the historical points of interest in New York City.

It was my privilege to serve with him on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and to observe how much he contributed his great talent and experience to the final wording of the Peace Resolution with the Central Powers. Unhappily, he was too ill to appear in the House, but with his usual courage, even though lying on his death bed, he wrote a strong letter advocating the immediate passage of the peace resolution, which was read with great interest by the Members of Congress.

He was a powerful orator, possessed a strong sense of humor, and often indulged in light and congenial wit, but when aroused, woe to the antagonist against whom he directed his sledgehammer blows. He was big hearted, natural, and lived in simple estate, loved by his large family and many friends. He exemplified in his life the golden rule, "Do unto others as ye would that they do unto you," thus making and retaining as friends all whom he met. Of him it could truly be said:

His life was gentle, and the elements
So mixed in him, that Nature might stand up
And say to all the world, "This was a man."

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, I have three things here which I wish to insert as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection consent will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, there is a little old Persian poem in which an inquirer says:

Traveler by the camel's side,
Thou hast wandered far and wide,
Tell me, on what fabled strand
Hast thou found the fairest land?

And the old, experienced globe traveler replies:

Where thy friends and loved ones stand,
There thou hast the fairest land.

I spent yesterday in a fair land, a land that was fair, for I spent it in the Congressional Library, reading the many words of a friend of mine, WILLIAM E. MASON.

It occurred to me that probably every man in the present delegation from Illinois in this House of Representatives would at this hour say many things descriptive of Mr. Mason; they would, one or another of them, speak of his oratory; his ability as a campaign speaker; his popularity, greater than any other campaigner in Illinois; his stage presence; his wit and humor on the platform; his capacity to take care of himself by repartee when heckled either on the political platform or here; his willingness to catch a train and go to any town or hamlet or crossroads in the State or county when duty called or a friend was in trouble; of his untiring travels over this old town, trying to help somebody at the departments; of his inability to say "No" when anybody at all asked him for an endorsement; and of his beautiful family life and devotion to the dear ones at home—and of their loving, touching, undying devotion to him.

It seemed to me that it would be a good thing if I, for a change, should attempt something different. And so I betook me to where all his congressional and senatorial words are embalmed and preserved forever. (To my great regret, I could not find a shorthand report of his various speeches in the Illinois Legislature, nor could I find that he had handed any manuscript to the daily newspapers—indeed, I think he never did that—and accordingly his banquet speeches remain unpublished in the public prints.)

After a whole day reading the outbursts of love of country, love of liberty, love of humanity, love of fairness, and love of the eternal right, I decided that it would take two or three weeks of any man's time to glean, to garner, to winnow, and thresh out from the many, many columns and pages of the RECORD a collection of his sayings, a compilation of paragraphs, which would do justice to the man or to me. So I abandoned that.

But I found enough. I found enough to prove him, as I always knew him to be, full of love of country, and all the other loves which I have enumerated, and in addition full of love for the downtrodden and oppressed of the world, which made him think always of America, as I think of it, as the heir of the ages, the child of the centuries, the beacon light of liberty, and the last hope of humanity. It was this love for the downtrodden, this unfaltering determination to be "for the under dog," that actuated and animated and dominated his whole official life and caused him to fight fearlessly and "at the drop of the hat" for the black man, for a free ballot and a fair count, for the tortured Cuban, and for the Irishman.

It is not well to multiply instances or examples. Accordingly I quote from only one of his more important speeches, May 18, 1897.

I quote with interest and pride and with a throb in my heart and a catch in my throat some passages from this speech in the Senate delivered May 18, 1897, by Senator MASON. The subject under consideration was Senate joint resolution 26, resolved, etc., that a condition of public war exists between the Government of Spain and a government proclaimed * * * maintained * * * by the people of Cuba, and that the United States of America shall maintain a strict neutrality between the contending powers, according to each all the rights of belligerents in the ports and territory of the United States.

Mr. MASON said in part:

Day after day the papers have been full of the announcement that this country was at last to speak, and that the barbarities inflicted by the Spaniard on the Cuban were to have some rebuke, at least in the Senate of the United States. The rules of the Senate, to which we all bow with such graceful dignity, have permitted this gentlemanly filibuster to continue until there is to-day no guaranty that the voice of the people will be heard here, or that there is to be any protest from the American people either in the legislature or by the Executive against the sale of girls, the murder of children, and the barbarities that the Spaniard calls "war."

When Senator MASON was elected to the Senate a number of newspapers said that they regretted it because they believed that he was the ideal Congressman and ought to be kept in the House all the rest of his life; that he would not enjoy it so much in the Senate; and I believe myself that he was of that type of man who would rejoice more in being on this floor than on the other.

Years and years ago one who had served 22 years in the public service said to me that the ideal public service for an American is on the floor of the American House of Representatives. Above everything else in the world I think WILLIAM E. MASON was a commoner and that he really would have had a happier life if he could have had an uninterrupted experience here.

I am not going to dwell long on international law. Every student of international law knows that it is made by force and that there is no barbarity of all the past that did not find its precedent in international law. International law is as flexible as time, as changeable as everything else on the earth.

I am not studied much in the use of language.

Ah, but he was a master of words!

He said:

I am not studied much in the use of language.

I am here to say as a Republican, I am here to carry out the pledges of my party in convention assembled, that there is no question before the American people so much demanded by the hearts of the intelligent Christian people of this country as the demand made upon us here and now that we shall lift our voices in defense of liberty in the Island of Cuba.

A majority of us favor the measure but the majority can not control.

I am here neither to praise nor to criticize the President. It is enough for me to know that in the utmost exciting political campaign this country has ever seen, amidst the heat of battle and the dust and noise, William McKinley's name, his splendid character, his beautiful life, was like a pillar of fire by night that led us to the greatest victory that we have known in modern times, for an honest currency and for protection to the industries of the country. I do not and I shall not criticize him for the delay. I trust his judgment even though I may differ with him. I reserve the right to express my opinion and to cast my vote upon this question when the hour shall come. Eight hundred starving Americans upon the Island of Cuba!

The native-born Cuban, up to some two years ago, could not teach school in his own bailiwick, and has never been permitted to hold any office of honor or trust. Some of their children came to our schools. They heard the music of Yankee Doodle and they took back to the insurgent father and mother the story of Bunker Hill, and they have begun to demand their right—their right to govern themselves.

Let me say to you, Mr. President, whether we shall sit silent on and on; whether we shall continue in this dignified body to be silent when all the people ask us to speak; whether the United States shall do its duty or not, under the Providence of God, Cuba shall be free. There shall be no slave on the continent where our flag floats. (Demonstrations and applause in the galleries.)

It is common sense that we are after. It is the common sense that our friends on the other side seek to avoid. I want it understood here and now, as I present this petition.

He was always praying for freedom for somebody! Oh, how we all remember how, day after day, week in and week out, he presented and finally urged, in ringing tones, his resolution freeing Ireland!

As I present this petition from the merchants and the business men of these great cities that it finds echo in every hamlet among the people where I live.

You, my hearers of 1922, may rest assured that WILLIAM E. MASON knew well the hamlets of Illinois. From his first campaigning in Illinois, say, 1881, to his last in 1921—40 years—he knew not only the crowded cities where great throngs cheered him on, but also he knew "the hamlets"—and they knew him!

No man in Illinois got off more freight trains and local trains at 1 or 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning, at more junctions, at more crossroads, at more tank towns than WILLIAM E. MASON—always cheerful in the face of delay or disappointment, always gladly and cordially welcomed by the hamlet.

During the political campaign just closed I felt the pulse of thousands of people.

That is just exactly what he did; he knew how to do it.

He continues:

There are no Senate rules among the people. In Illinois if they do not like what you say they say so, and if they do let you know it. In Illinois, from Cairo to Dunleith, 400 miles of the best State in the Union, the plain people there, as well as the merchants, in response to the proposition that the Cubans should be free, agreed with one acclaim whenever it was mentioned; and, while to-day the people are waiting with bated breath, and financial affairs are based on our action on the tariff, when you get at the deep undertone of the conscience of the Christian people of this country, they say, "Let us have freedom in Cuba. Let the Spaniard go back to his own land and let us have no slaves upon our continent."

In those days it is said that he did not think enough of President William McKinley. In my humble judgment William McKinley never would have been nominated for President of the United States had it not been for the terrific fight put up in the State of Illinois, and I have always believed that one of the cardinal decisions in that fight was back in 1896 in the Springfield district, and next to that in the Jacksonville district. I can recall now a convention in 1896 in the city of Jacksonville, Ill.—and some others here remember it—when everything was absolutely trembling in the balance. WILLIAM E. MASON came there and took the floor, and in a speech of unexampled eloquence and lofty aspirations he wrought upon that convention until they rose and the very building rocked with cheers for William McKinley. I think it was the deciding point in the nomination of McKinley.

Passing on to the conclusion of this one speech of his, which I have taken the time to quote, he said:

"You can call jingo as long as you like. You may define jingo as long as you please. Patrick Henry was a jingoist according to the definition of the gentleman. Every man who would rather fight than buy peace at the dishonor of his wife or his child has been called a jingo from the days of early republics until now."

"In convention * * * at St. Louis * * * my distinguished friend, the Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. LODGE, was on the committee to draw up the resolution, and when it was read, reciprocity shook the rafters, protection set everybody to work with feet and hands, but when we spoke the broad deep tone of liberty, when we said we remembered Valley Forge, and, by the eternal freedom there won, by everything dear to Americans, the party was committed to the independence of Cuba."

The hall and the rafters rang and the people all over the whole United States said, "Thank God! Amen and Amen!"

I hold my commission, Mr. President, from no set of men. I got my seat from no boss. I hold my place, your equal politically, through the machinations or dictations of no machine. By the Eternal Power I hold my commission from the people. I promised the people I would speak, but, if I have been too long silent, I shall answer to my people, and to my people alone.

I refrain from reading a thousand other paragraphs, all showing love of liberty. I wish I could have time to read all, because what I want to do is to tell what he says, not what I think.

Referring for a moment to his record, I call your attention to the brief biography, doubtless approved by himself, appearing in the Congressional Directory, Sixty-sixth Congress, page 21. This is all there is of it:

WILLIAM E. MASON, Republican, of Chicago; lawyer; born July 7, 1850; married Edith White, of Des Moines, Iowa, June 11, 1873; 40 years in law practice in Chicago; has served in both branches of the Illinois Legislature and in both branches of Congress; elected, 1916, to the Sixty-fifth Congress at large; in 1918 to the Sixty-sixth Congress, and in 1920 to the Sixty-seventh Congress.

His biography in the Blue Book of Illinois is a little more extended:

WILLIAM E. MASON, Republican, Chicago; member of the Chicago bar for 40 years; was born in the State of New York, but spent most of his early life in Iowa, where he married Miss Edith White, of Des Moines. Has served in the upper and lower branches of the Legislature of Illinois, and was one of those who elected Logan to the Senate; served two terms as a Member of the United States House of Representatives and one as Senator, and at present is congressman at large from Illinois. While in the United States Senate was instrumental in having the rural free delivery bill passed; also made the first report of the postal savings bank law, while chairman of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee.

In conclusion, by unanimous consent, I insert in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, pages 125, 126, 127, and 128 of the book written by him entitled "John, the Unafraid," as follows:

Not many days thereafter John came home to Martha, sick with a fever, and for many days laid on a bed of pain and suffering. In his delirium he spoke often to his brothers, calling them by name, and urging them on to continued service.

On the seventh day he came out of his wanderings and found Martha at his side, holding his hand. Feeble of body, but strong and clear of mind, he spoke to Martha, saying: "How long have I been sick?" And she, weeping for joy, said: "Be silent, John dear, you have been wandering in your mind for seven days; now you will soon be well." And John answered her: "Yes, I am nearly well now."

"I understand my pain is gone, because my poor body has surrendered its fight for longer life. How kind the Father is to give me this painless time to speak good-bye to you, my love. My voice seems weak, but my spirit sees clearly all the past, and is rapt in expectancy of the future."

"If this is the end, and there is no life beyond, I salute the Everlasting Good and am thankful for what I have had. Remember, Martha,

I doubt not. Neither am I afraid. I go to a friendly city. The Master is there."

"Tell my dear minister that Brother Lewis will pay the next month's rent for Sarah and her children."

"Has there been any sickness in the Brotherhood?" And Martha said: "Not an unkind word has been spoken." And John said: "Truly the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand."

"Has the sickness of fear left them all?" "Yes," answered Mary, "they have forgotten fear in caring for each other."

"Have we paid our neighbors that which we owe, and is there sufficient to provide for you?"

And Martha said: "Yes, all is well."

Then John said: "There was some unfinished work on my bench," and Martha told him that his brother Mark had finished the work and delivered it on the day promised.

"And my shop; the bench, the tools, and all?" and Martha said: "All are in order, dear one, as you would have them." And John said: "How kind you all are."

It was the hour of sunset and Martha lifted his head and turned him so he could see the western sky. "How beautiful," said John; "see, Martha, the sun is setting, but it will rise again. This is my faith; it will rise again."

And so John the Unafraid was prepared to go out from this life, not in fear but in faith, with open arms and smiling face, as one who goeth out to welcome the coming of his most beloved.

Upon the streets and within the house many gathered, waiting news from John the Unafraid. While at his bedside Martha his wife, and the wife of the Master's cobbler, kept in silent prayer the watches of the night.

And when the morning came, Martha said: "He still lives, and his breathing is as natural as that of a sleeping child."

And so John the Unafraid came out of the Valley of the Shadow, and when strong to speak, said: "I thought ere this to have solved the mysteries of Death; I must labor still with the greater mysteries of Life."

The Church of the Brotherhood goes on. Come ye powerful of all the earth, kings and rulers; come ye commanders of armies and navies; come ye captains of wealth and industry; and come ye sick children of the Father, ye brothers of the Master, for you are needed in this Church. You need not withdraw from your church, but serve more where you are. One kind word to a suffering brother, even the least of them, puts you in full communion. No tribute of pew rent is demanded, and no creed must be acknowledged. Promise only to serve the Good, as you understand it. The Brotherhood is weak in theology, but strong in religion. Forgetting wealth in the search for values, turning our backs on the shadows and facing the substance, putting behind us the tinsels of display, looking forward to the things worth while. Would you know the way to this church? Speak kindly to the next brother you meet; and if he be not sick, he will point you the way. No matter how dark the night, there is a light still burning in the window, and the door of The Church of the Brotherhood is never locked.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, human life is a strange and wonderful experience. We are as meteors in the sky. Out of the darkness we come, fanned into brilliancy by the life-giving atmosphere through which we move; we flash, for an instant, across the firmament; after that, the void and enshrouding silence. We are as ships that put out from port upon an unknown sea; sometimes the blue arch of heaven stretches peacefully above us and the sun is shining, the sea is placid, and mind and body cry aloud exulting in the joy of life; then storms and waves assail us, and in the fury of the tempest we realize the weakness of our strength and the poverty of our resources. But always we think that tomorrow—yea, always to-morrow—there will be pleasant lands along our lea and fortune, and hope, and ambition beckon us on. And then, when we come to port, the voyage ends.

Sometimes we make our voyage solitary and alone. Sometimes we only hail another as he passes. Sometimes we sail, side by side, day upon day, and year upon year, through foul weather and fair, with another voyager. With these friendly voyagers we fight the storms together and revel in the sunshine, and enjoy a mutual interchange of counsel and precept. The effect of these contacts upon our life's journey is incalculable. They influence and oftentimes change the courses of our journeys and the final destination at which we arrive.

In such a way it has been my privilege to meet our colleague, whose life and virtues we memorialize to-day. It was not my fortune to be an intimate friend of WILLIAM E. MASON, although, from the commencing of the special session of Congress in April, 1917, when a state of war with Germany was declared, until his death, I was in almost constant contact with him and grew to know him very well. While my personal acquaintance with him dated from 1917, I had known him and known of him from my boyhood, as all Illinoisans of my generation have. As a boy I heard my elders, in the stores and on the streets, and in the heated political campaigns of those days, speak of him. They never called him WILLIAM E. MASON—it was "BILLY" MASON. And so it was from the moment of his entrance into political life until his death. As a representative in Congress, as United States Senator, as a Representative at large in Congress, he was not some pedestaled, intangible celebrity; to the people of Illinois he was something tangible, something real, somebody they knew about, plain "BILLY" MASON. Too many public men, from constant exercise of official power, assume to travel upon a superior plane; they get away from the soil from which they sprung. WILLIAM E. MASON never did that.

We humans do not know a great deal about one another. Within the shell of the body the individual being dwells. Through the windows of the body the soul within looks out and we see it dimly as we pass. Its visible expression comes from the spoken word, the kindly eye, the activities of the body. There is a radiant energy that emanates from this secret dweller in the temple of the body that has its effect upon all who come within its influence. With some the force is negative or repelling; with others it is commanding and persuasive and impelling.

With such a persuasive personality was our late colleague gifted. There was no man in our State who ever had it to a greater extent. His public career illustrates that. His views on public questions were always distinct and certain and always freely expressed. He took part gladly in political discussion, contests, and debate. He made firm friends and equally vigorous enemies. There was no halfway ground with him—he was a partisan and admitted it. He did not always meet the views of his constituents while in public office. But always, when a candidate for office, and his enemies were arranging for his political obsequies, the results would record a victory for him by the vote of the people.

This hold upon the people of Illinois was remarkable. I remember that during the Sixty-fifth Congress Mr. MASON voted on certain measures before the Congress in a way thought to be extremely unpopular in many parts of the State. In the next election, in a State-wide race for Congressman at large, he led all the rest, both in primary and in election. During the last national administration, Mr. MASON was usually out of harmony with the national leadership, and frequently expressed himself upon the floor of the House in pointed and direct language. Irrespective of the subject, whenever it was known that he was to speak, Democrats and Republicans alike flocked to their seats and gave him respectful and careful attention.

He was a power on the political platform. No other man of the State, and I believe of the country, could sway an audience on a political subject as he could. He possessed a fund of wit and humor and sarcasm and invective, a power of logical reasoning and lucid expression, and, above all, a magnetic, radiant personality that few men have equaled and none excelled.

The name of WILLIAM E. MASON is safely written in the history of Illinois. It will be a long time before the people of our State have forgotten him. In these simple ceremonies which have been called to mark his passing, I tender my few words of tribute to his memory. He has crossed over the river and rests under the shade of the trees. After the smiles and the tears, after the joys and the sorrows, after the noise and tumult, old friend and colleague, rest well.

Mr. WILLIAMS assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we called him BILLY MASON because we loved him. The people called him BILLY MASON because they loved him. He appealed to the people. He never endeavored to build up a personal political organization. He appealed to the minds, to the reason, to the hearts of the people. All will remember his physical appearance. He had a very large head, filled with the finest of grey matter, but although his head was large and brainy, the outstanding feature of BILLY MASON was his heart. His heart was bigger than his body. His great aim in life was to help somebody who needed help. It was not confined to those in distress abroad. He felt the kindly touch of those close to him, those at home, but everywhere, anywhere, his heart throbbed and thrilled with emotion for the distressed and oppressed in any clime and in any land.

He was a wonderful campaigner! I never heard his equal in making a campaign speech. He not only entertained an audience, but he reasoned with them. I think no one in the country has ever made such an appealing speech upon that common, trite, and intricate subject, the tariff, as MASON used to make on the stump. He reasoned with the people until they agreed with him, and always his heart was so that he was in touch with their sympathy. We shall miss him, we do miss him, from the halls of the House. He was no man's servant, except as he was the servant of the people. He did what he thought was right and he had the courage of his convictions. With a voice that was enticing, with the great brain that he had, with the great heart that he had, and with the nerve to do what he thought was right, it is no wonder that his equal does not exist as a campaign speaker.

His family relations were so touching, so loving that I hesitate to enter into that sacred place, but his widow and his children will always know that he occupied the highest place in the esteem and in the love of all Members of this House who knew him so well, and I may say of all the people who admired him so much.

Mr. MANN resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 10 legislative days within which to extend their remarks in the RECORD on these resolutions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that all Members have 10 legislative days within which to extend their remarks on the resolutions which were agreed to in the House to-day. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, on many occasions I have listened to tributes paid to deceased Members of this House, but I wish to say that on no occasion have I been more impressed with their eloquence and their sincerity, and from my acquaintance with our deceased colleague I feel that he is worthy of them all.

May I ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments to pay a slight tribute to the memory of our distinguished friend and colleague, Hon. WILLIAM E. MASON.

Prior to his death he resided for upward of 50 years in Chicago, which, although not adjacent, is in close proximity to the district in Michigan which I have the honor to represent. He was well known throughout my district, the State of Michigan, and was not without a national reputation, having seen much of public life, and having served in both branches of the State Legislature of Illinois and with distinction in both branches of the Congress of the United States. I first met him when at a political meeting in the city of Jackson, Mich., during the presidential campaign of McKinley and Bryan in the fall of 1896, when the issue was 16 to 1. I do not think I am in error in saying he favored the election of Maj. McKinley and to that event he contributed his full share. Mr. MASON was an ardent campaigner, a fluent speaker, a skillful, logical, and forceful debater, and a strong partisan. His forensic ability was well recognized, and while he expressed himself in most pleasing language, permeated with wit and humor, his strong arguments carried such weight and conviction as to impress all with the soundness of his proposition. He served his State as United States Senator from March 4, 1897, to March 3, 1903. In 1917 he was elected as Representative at large to the Sixty-fifth Congress from the great State of Illinois. He was also elected to the Sixty-sixth and reelected to the Sixty-seventh Congress, and served until the time of his death, June 16, 1921. As United States Senator he strongly advocated Cuban independence. We all remember with what ardor he pleaded for the freedom of Ireland. His anxiety for this people is being clarified now, although he passed to his reward before its consummation. He would have rejoiced to know of its promise and assurance, although the goal has not been reached.

From a primer written by him, entitled "A Political Text Book and Voters' Guide," Mr. MASON enumerates on the front page that he was the author of the Pure Food Laws; father of Rural Free Delivery and Parcel Post; first to report for Postal Savings Banks; active and practical friend to U. S. soldiers and their families always; and that he voted for suffrage in 1897 and ever since. He was an ardent advocate of the soldiers' bonus and proposed the issue of a $500 bond to be called the Honor Service Bond. In speaking for it in the House of Representatives on the 2d day of December, 1919, among other things, he stated:

I am free to say that I have no pride of opinion and am willing to vote for any of the half dozen bills which have been introduced by my colleagues upon this subject.

Mr. MASON was a patriot and lover of the Constitution, always zealous of its strict observance. In one of his latest speeches delivered in Congress April 23, 1920, he stated:

This Nation has no right to expect that it will always have wise and humane rulers, sincerely attached to the principles of the Constitution. Wicked men, ambitious of power, with hatred of liberty and contempt of law, may fill the place once occupied by Washington and Lincoln.

In his speech for a "United Country," of August 27, 1919, he quotes Gen. Pershing as saying:

It is the consciousness that the soldier has behind him an undivided Nation which enables him, whatever his rank, to face his task with courage.

And then he himself adds:

See what our soldier boys are doing. The world's history has never recorded greater military skill and bravery than is being written day by day on the western front.

He lost no opportunity of demanding that our troops be withdrawn from Russian soil. It was a violation of the Constitution, to his mind, to send or keep them there. And it is denying credit to no one in stating that his efforts to bring home the American troops sent to Russia was most potent in their removal.

Mr. MASON was well educated and taught school in early life. He was of a pleasing disposition and had a large fund of current information which he always imparted interspersed and enlivened by apt and pithy stories. Knowing him as I did, I am sure he would like to have said of him the story described by Michigan's young philosopher-poet, Edgar Guest, when he says:

But I would like to have my story told
By smiling friends with whom I've shared the way
Who, thinking of me, nod their heads and say
His heart was warm when other hearts were cold.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes on the subject of a young soldier who lost his life in the destruction of the dirigible, the Roma, a few days ago.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MANN). The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have asked for these few minutes to speak of the tragic death of Sergt. Virgil Hoffman, one of the 34 persons who lost their lives when the great dirigible airship Roma exploded and descended to the earth in flames from a height of 1,000 feet at Langley Aviation Field near Hampton Roads, Va., on Tuesday the 25th day of February, 1922. The Roma was America's largest airship. It was equipped with six Liberty motors and to test which it was making a trial flight.

Sergt. Hoffman was a prominent and highly respected young man, whose home was at Eaton Rapids, Mich., in the district I now have the honor to represent and distant only 10 miles from my home town of Charlotte. He enlisted at the age of 18 in the World War, when he was just entering upon a life of promise. He saw active service overseas, then in the army of occupation, and continued in the United States Air Service until the fateful day when he came to his untimely death. He was a brave soldier. He loved his country. He gave his life and made the supreme sacrifice for it. He represented that spirit of bravery and intrepidity that distinguishes the American soldier under every trial. And now that he has gone to the home of his Great Commander our love and adoration follow him. We commend him for his gallantry. We revere his memory and extol his service and true worth. He will live for all time in the hearts of his countrymen.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by inserting a short eulogy and biography printed in the Eaton Rapids Journal, a paper published in Sergt. Hoffman's home town.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The article referred to is as follows:

SERGEANT VIRGIL HOFFMAN, VICTIM OF "ROMA" CATASTROPHE AT LANGLEY FIELD.

Sergeant Virgil Hoffman, chief rigger of the monster dirigible which the United States bought from Italy and was burned on an experimental flight last Tuesday afternoon, was a victim of the awful tragedy in which the lives of 34 men were snuffed out near Hampton Roads, Va., and the funeral will be held at the Methodist Church in this city next Sunday afternoon with full military honors.

Virgil was born in this city February 2, 1900, and was a product of the local schools, always active in athletics and a prime favorite with his mates. After leaving school he went to Battle Creek and worked with his brother as an apprentice electrician; but on the 20th of February, 1918, just after passing his 18th birthday, he enlisted in the Army and was sent to Columbus for training. He landed at Brest August 1, 1918, and served with the A. E. F. till the armistice was signed, when he was transferred to the army of occupation and saw service on the Rhine for a period of 11 months.

He was permitted to return home for a period of several weeks during the fall of 1920, but returned to camp in time to be detailed to the crew of six men that were sent to Italy last year after the monster airship, leaving New York in October and returning the following May, assisting in again erecting the machine and accompanying the craft on its trip to Washington, D. C., at the opening of the disarmament conference.

His untimely death is an awful shock to his mother, Mrs. John Hyatt, and the family and friends who thought so much of him. He had planned to visit his mother last Christmas, after an absence of over two years, but was disappointed in obtaining a furlough, and had frequently written her expressing his regret.

The other members of the immediate family are his two brothers, Earl, of Battle Creek, and Howard, of Wooster, Ohio, and the little sister Grace, who lives with her mother.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, my acquaintance with BILLY MASON began with his entrance into the membership of this House on the occasion of his last service here. However, I had known him by reputation for a great many years as a remarkable political figure, and that reputation was not altogether acceptable, as is usually the case when newspapers talk about a man as a jingo. So quite naturally when I learned to know him here I was attracted to the very splendid qualities that were so remarkably displayed in his activities as a Member of the House.

I think that from the standpoint of effective oratory I have never heard his equal speaking to the membership on the floor of the House to say nothing about the large masses of people that he would address in the heat of a campaign. I noticed that he never feared to take the unpopular side of an issue. He never flinched under criticism so far as I could see, whether the criticism was expressed or whether it was merely inferred by the attitude of Members on either side of the aisle.

One of the most remarkable incidents in my memory of him was when he came to the well of the House to reply to some charge that had been made against him, when I do not know how much of the sympathy of the House was with him up to the time of the beginning of his speech. I never heard anyone speak in this chamber who produced the wonderful impression that he produced on that occasion. More than one of the Members found their eyes so suffused that they were not able to look at the speaker because of his tremendous power in the presentation of an issue that at the time seemed in certain quarters to be unpopular.

I have often referred to Mr. MASON as having qualities that are very unusual from the standpoint of a public speaker. The more I knew him the better I loved him, and as is always the case where you gain your viewpoint of a man from the public press, you are so much concerned to know him intimately, because, like any other great leader, as one of our colleagues mentioned, he made both friends and enemies, friends who were held to him by hooks of steel, and enemies, not personal but political, who were as strongly opposed.

So I have felt that it is not only my duty, but my great pleasure as well to pay this brief tribute to Mr. MASON as one who deserves the best from his colleagues, because he was certainly worthy of all the good things that might be said about him. He is one of the figures among us that is an outstanding example of the value of fearless exposition and even fearless advocacy in times of storm, and a man who would never flinch under adverse criticism. If we have one lesson that is needed to-day, it seems to me that element of courage is very much in demand, even at this present moment.

I want to add my voice to the tributes to this great man, for there is nothing that stirs my heart more than expressions of admiration for a life that is worth while.

Mr. GABALDON. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the honor of speaking a few words, not only to express my personal feelings but also on behalf of the more than 10,000,000 inhabitants of the Philippine Islands, on the life and character of WILLIAM E. MASON, late Congressman at Large from the State of Illinois.

The name of WILLIAM E. MASON was well known and well beloved in those far-off islands of the Orient sea. For he was one of the very first Americans to raise his voice in the United States for Philippine independence.

Mr. MASON was a Member of the United States Senate in 1899 when the question of recognizing the independence of the Philippines was before the country. Although a member of the Republican Party, which was standing out against independence, Senator MASON entered the lists on the other side of the question. He opposed the raising of the American flag in the Philippines against the wishes of the inhabitants there with heart, body, and soul.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD covering those days in which the decision hung in the balance shows that WILLIAM E. MASON spoke as one inspired. And who can say that he was not inspired by a higher power, a power that bestows its choicest gifts of oratory and eloquence upon those who are pleading for human liberty?

I had a long discussion of those momentous days in the life of the Philippines with Congressman MASON only a few months before he died. Never will I forget the fire of patriotism that burned in his eyes as he related the story of his fight in the Senate nearly a quarter of a century previously against American sovereignty in the Philippines.

SEÑOR GABALDON—

He said—

I lost my seat in the United States Senate as the result of breaking with President McKinley over the question of the United States governing the people of the Philippines against their will. I remained at the bottom of the political ladder for many, many long years before I could again be elected to public office. But listen; never for one single moment, one single second, have I regretted my action. I would take exactly the same attitude were I to live through the whole campaign again.

It was almost the same sentiment he had expressed at the close of his great speech in the Senate. Let the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of 1899 recall those words to our memory:

I am for the independence of the people of the Philippine Islands as I am for the independence of the people of Cuba. I am bound by a solemn promise made in this Chamber. Senators may haggle and say it is not nominated in the bond; but it is an implied promise more sacred to an honorable gentleman than though it were written in blood.

I have an idea that Filipino homes are sacred, that their children are beloved, that they love their soil, and that they have their songs:

that the father has his prayer, that they have a hearthstone of some kind, and that the mother has a lullaby for her babe.

If in my effort to-day I can get one American to think a little more of the rights of man, if I can add one comfort or one hope to the poorest, blackest, meanest and lowest of God's creatures in the Philippine Islands, I shall be satisfied and more than paid for my effort.

I am done. I am not well done. I have been advised by those whom I think most of as friends to await events. But the events that I saw coming in early August are here. I could wait no longer. Some have been kind enough to say that my seat was in danger.

Why, I have seen the boys come home sick, and I have seen their graves; and I have seen so much of sacrifice in this cause that, as much as I love the association and the seat as Senator among you, I would give it as cheerfully as I would a crust, if my people want it, regretting only that I have so little to give in this cause.

I had hoped for some power of language that the old masters were said to have who stood within this forum in the past. I have almost prayed for some magnetic power that I could turn the tide for the liberty of these people, for some magnetic power that I could draw you so close that I could write in living letters upon your hearts the word "Liberty." Not liberty for your family as I prescribe it, not liberty for me or my children by your dictation, not Austrian liberty for Hungary, not Spanish liberty for Cuba, not English liberty for the United States, and not American liberty for the Philippines, but universal liberty—universal liberty for which our fathers died.

Mr. Speaker, 20 years after this speech was made in the Senate WILLIAM E. MASON was still working for the independence of the people of the Philippine Islands. Is it any wonder that in his death we feel we have lost a friend? On June 13, 1919, Mr. MASON presented the following bill in this House Chamber in which we are now gathered:

Whereas all just powers of the government are derived from the consent of the governed; and

Whereas the people of the Philippine Islands, including all classes and all political parties, are petitioning the United States to grant them a free and independent government; and

Whereas the right (if any) to govern them was acquired by the United States in the War with Spain and by conquest of the Philippine people; and

Whereas President McKinley in his first letter of instruction to the peace commissioners instructed them not to enter into any agreement which would mean perpetual sovereignty of the United States over the Philippine people; and

Whereas the American people through their Congress declared repeatedly that they would not take territory as a result of the War with Spain and repeatedly stated that as soon as the people of the Philippine Islands were able to establish a stable government that would protect life and property, that the people of the United States would grant them independence; and

Whereas more than 20 years ago President McKinley stated that the Philippine Islands are not ours to exploit, but "to train in the science of self-government"; and to deny them self-government now would practically be an admission that the United States had failed in training them "in the science of self-government"; and

Whereas President Roosevelt said more than 10 years ago that he hoped the time would arrive when the Filipinos "can decide for themselves whether it is well for them to become independent"; and

Whereas it is now known by the American people that a stable government has been established in the Philippines; and

Whereas the American people have made untold sacrifices in the late war in the interest of self-determination, and to further refuse independence to the Philippines is not only an abandonment of the promises made at the time we took possession of the Philippine Islands, but is a violation of our highest ideals: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the people of the Philippine Islands are hereby declared to be free and independent, and the Congress of the United States hereby recognizes the Philippine republic as prayed for in their memorial and requests the President of the United States to negotiate and submit to the Senate of the United States such political and commercial treaties as may be necessary to secure for the people of the Philippine Islands self-determination and a free and independent government.

Mr. Speaker, I can say nothing that will add to the glory of the memory of this patriot. His spoken words, preserved in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, will be his everlasting monument. But not only that—his memory will abide forever in the hearts of the Filipino people, whose cause he served so nobly.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, it was my very great privilege to know my deceased colleague, WILLIAM E. MASON, from his young manhood, and to admire him as a man and a citizen.

Illinois was proud of him; proud of his eloquence; proud of his untiring energy, of his devotion to his party; proud of the sacrifices he made to promote the well-being of the Nation. He was one of the most versatile men I ever knew; he swayed audiences by his eloquence as no other man could. His service to the public was unselfish. He was zealous in the promotion of whatever appealed to his conscience as just. He was sympathetic; his sympathies went out to those who needed sympathy. He was a lover of liberty in its best sense. He believed in the humble citizen; his life was devoted to the promotion of his cause. He had no sympathy for the aristocrat. He was a democrat himself in everything but politics. His political faith was best exemplified by his constant advocacy of the Republican cause. He was companionable and filled with loving kindness. His heart went out to suffering humanity everywhere. He was a legislator of distinction, both as a Member of the Senate and the House. The people of his State, high and low, knew WILLIAM E. MASON and loved him. His name was the signal for enthusiasm at any meeting before which he might appear.

The announcement that he was to speak always brought a great concourse of people together. He was full of wit and humor, quick at repartee, and he had a knowledge and experience which enabled him to speak on any subject. He was an orator of the first class. He was untiring and never-ending in his work. He was in demand as a speaker everywhere throughout the Nation. His jovial disposition made everybody his friend. He had the courage to express his views upon any subject. He was the delight of the House on every occasion that he appeared before it. Everybody listened to him with attention, and what he said was responded to with rapturous applause.

I regret that he has passed from us, but he has left a record of service that fills us all with pride. His name will be remembered by the people of Illinois; his memory will be revered as one who in his life spoke his mind; advocated the cause of justice; dealt with things as he found them; treated subjects on their merit; and displayed an interest in the cause of humanity that will continue to bear fruit in the years to come. Men like WILLIAM E. MASON never die. Their words and work live after they have passed away and are emulated by those who follow.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] recalled that he and I are the only Members of this House who were here when Mr. MASON came as a Member of the Fiftieth Congress. That was the beginning of Mr. MASON's national reputation, though he had been a popular and effective public speaker and legislator in Illinois for several years before he was elected to the House.

But I recall more vividly the Fifty-first Congress and BILLY MASON's activities in the House at that time. I believe the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] and I are the only Members of this House who were also Members of that House of the Fifty-first Congress when Mr. MASON made a reputation as a forceful and versatile debater and became one of the most popular speakers on this floor.

The Republican Party had come into control of the legislative and executive departments of the Government after quite a season of activity as a minority party. Thomas B. Reed was Speaker, and the first session of that Congress was a stormy as well as a very busy one, with filibusters, counting a quorum, consideration and passage of the Federal election bill and the McKinley Tariff Act.

Mr. MASON was in his element, for he loved political storms as he loved domestic tranquillity, and in all the legislative and parliamentary contests he took an active and effective part. He used jest as well as argument, had a fund of stories that he aptly applied to confuse his opponents and arouse enthusiasm in the galleries until he became one of the most popular debaters in the House. He was BILLY MASON to everybody—the Members of the House, the newspaper men, the public here and throughout the country, for he was one of the most-quoted men in public life because of his quaint and apt illustrations and his fun. He was not always in harmony with the Speaker and the majority side of the House, and he did not hesitate to level his darts at his party associates when his convictions differed from theirs. But through it all he was BILLY MASON to both sides of the House and to the country. He was often criticized, as all of us were in that Congress, but criticism never disturbed him. It was just another opportunity and inspiration for more fun and more stubborn contention. He was one of the most effective filibusters in that House, which was celebrated for filibusters, and he would smile and laugh as he irritated those whom he opposed until we would laugh with him, for his fun was infectious.

He and I and the majority of us on this side of the House went down to defeat in the election of 1890, which followed the enactment of the McKinley Tariff Act, and while many mourned and complained BILLY MASON laughed and made fun of himself as well as of others; and after the election, Speaker Reed, who had campaigned in MASON's district and mine, remarked that he had gained the impression that he had been a three-ring circus out in Illinois, and BILLY retorted that it had ended just that way, with nothing but sawdust remaining.

In the Senate he was BILLY MASON, as he had been in the House, and he did a good deal to upset the dignified serenity of that body when he filibustered and made fun to more effectively carry his point and support his convictions, whether they were in harmony with his party or opposed. Then, after many years, he returned to the House, and we found him the same jovial, smiling, and popular Member, the same ready and effective debater, still holding tenaciously to his convictions. As the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] has said, BILLY MASON was always for the under dog. He was built that way, and was the most popular and effective campaign speaker we had in Illinois through many years. He was intensely human, and the people responded to his human efforts and instincts. He is mourned by the Members of this House, and he is most mourned in Illinois, where the people loved as well as honored him.

Mr. DAVILA. Mr. Speaker, no tribute to the public life of WILLIAM E. MASON would be complete did it not contain an expression of the affection in which his memory will always be held by the people of Porto Rico.

We who live beyond the seas knew better than those residing nearer to his home the great qualities of his heart, his love for human liberty and the hatred of oppression in any form, which were the outstanding traits of his sterling character.

We had gained that knowledge of the man in our appeals to him for help in securing more liberal laws under the American flag, and be it said to his eternal credit we never appealed to him in vain.

Mr. MASON knew our problems. He was a Member of the other House when the original organic act was passed, and as aid to the smaller peoples of the earth was one of his principal aims in life he made a study of our needs, and never ceased to feel an interest in our affairs.

He was a Member of this body when I first came here in the Sixty-fifth Congress, and was one of the first Members from whom I received assistance in broadening our laws and thus increasing the opportunities of the Porto Rican people. The record of his able and active assistance is preserved in the records of this House. It will always be cherished by the people of that little island, who esteemed him no less than the people of his own beloved Illinois.

I never knew a more devoted champion of human rights. His heart went out to every people whom he felt suffered from oppression. I have seen this House kindle with enthusiasm as it felt the spell of his eloquence, whether discussing affairs in Ireland or the extension of American citizenship and more liberal laws to the island of Porto Rico.

I have often thought that if there was one man conspicuous in American public life to-day of whom it might be said that "the world was his country, and to do good was his religion," that man was WILLIAM E. MASON, of Illinois.

Peace to his ashes.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. Speaker—

But have I now seen death?
Is this the way
I must return to native dust?
O sight of terror, foul and ugly to behold!
Horrid to think, how horrible to feel!

Thus did Adam, in Paradise Lost, receive his first vision of death.

Akin were the feelings of the saddened friends of WILLIAM E. MASON, when first they learned of his demise. The fresh pangs poignant from the loss of our dear brother swelled in resentment within our bosoms as we visualized the lethal blow of Death, the Destroyer.

What a Moloch is death, we remonstrated, that he should cut down the rugged oak, under whose protecting branches all the oppressed of mankind found shelter.

To remove from our circle a giant brain, functioning with iridescent splendor, and to choke up the crimson current of sympathy and love within a heart as big as the mundane sphere itself were a tragedy "horrid to think, how horrible to feel."

BILLY MASON went over the top. His death was a national calamity. Summoned to the footstool of the Prince of Peace, the pen fell from his limped hand the very instant it was tracing, in bold characters, a theme upon the resolution of peace. His mammoth intellect closed its cells of treasured lore and quickened thought as the masterpiece of international good will was receiving its commission to posterity.

Oh, how yearningly did he look forward to the hour when his clarion voice would warble forth another lay upon concord in the human family.

With what abiding hope and blithe consciousness did he reckon the nearing day when the well of the House would impound the triumphant ayes declaratory of peace with our late foes!

As he measured the intervening time, he jealously weighed each crowding thought, even as the goldsmith balances the tiny atoms in the scales. The finger moved and the finger wrote. On and on it wrote. It expounded the golden rule of international amity and universal brotherhood. It wrote—but ere it finished the huge heart of the master burst. It reached the limit of expanding love for fellow man. The human container could no longer hold the spiritual essence.

BILLY MASON died as he had lived. His last act was the prolongation of his first. His whole existence was hallowed with the love of God and man, and consecrated with helpfulness of those in distress and cheer for those struggling out of despair. Ever dedicated to the cause of human freedom he struck off the shackles of unmerciful dominion wherever he found them. He was the Nemesis of despots and the palladium of the tyrannized.

To have known him was to love him. He was the truest exemplar of Nazarene teachings I have had the privilege of knowing. He was fundamentally right always because he was elementally Christlike. The decalogue meant more to him than a tablet of granite. They were God-given precepts which he ever exemplified in his daily life of contact.

When momentous questions arrested his cogitation, never did he render a decision calculated to square with popular approbation. He sought his Maker for his counselor and not his electorate. He was right with his God when oftentimes he was wrong with his constituents. He never espoused a cause on account of expediency, but ever championed truth even against the raging storm of public disapproval.

He said suzerainty over the Philippines must go, and his party said he must go. He went; but back again he came when popular judgment emerged from its drunken clamor. Anon and again he risked political oblivion for his views, when he could have had votes for his acquiescence.

How happy would he be to-day if he were standing as are we, upon the narrow margin of existence, looking over the seas where humanity has had its new birth of freedom in the Emerald Isle. He pleaded the cause of Irish liberty when other statesmen either held their craven breath or stammered out their opposition.

His soul is now with MacSwiney's, blended into the eternal sun, effulgent upon the countryside of old Erin, and Celts everywhere acclaim him as their own. With not a single drop of the blood of Ireland, of Cuba, of South Africa, of India, of the Philippines, coursing his veins, he yet enshrined their respective struggles for freedom in his courageous heart, and would have dipped them in his life's blood, if need be, to aid their victory.

It is gay to dance with the victors, but give me the man who will suffer with the vanquished.

Such a man was WILLIAM E. MASON, bold and kind, defiant and loving, strong and tender, fearless and merciful. A man's man was he. He ennobled the crust of this earth the while he tarried here. He now enriches it as he sleeps beneath the turf which wraps his clay.

I knew him and, thank God, I am the better that I did.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, it was my good fortune to know Senator MASON intimately during the last 35 years, and also to know many of those holding high places in the Government service, and I can truly say that none of them excelled him in manly virtues, statesmanship, or devotion to his country.

I had the honor to serve with Mr. MASON as a fellow Member of this body for six years, during which time he was like a father to me. I went to him as freely as I would go to my own father for counsel and advice, and his death was a deep personal loss to me. He took keen enjoyment in being helpful to others, and it was a particular pleasure to him to see his friends get along well. The willingness to assist those who asked his help and advice was one of his strongest characteristics, and there are few men who ever helped carry the hopes and ambitions of more people. Strong personal attachments drew to and about him hosts of ardent admirers. He was devoted to his family, kind and obliging to his friends, and generous to all. The precepts of the lowly Nazarene as expressed in the Sermon on the Mount constituted his rule of conduct toward his fellows. He believed in the brotherhood of man, and used his talents in public and private life for the betterment and uplift of humanity.

The work he performed in this body and in the Senate, as well as upon the platform in nearly every State in the Union during the last 40 years for his State and Nation, reflects great credit upon his ability as a statesman and student of public questions.

He was one of the best informed men on the problems confronting the country, and he amazed his hearers by his readiness and force in debate. There was never a more zealous, more indefatigable, or more laborious Member of Congress than Senator MASON, and he has contributed greatly to the progress and development of the country which he loved so well.

As a member of the congressional party I journeyed to his home in the great city of Chicago to attend the funeral of this remarkable man, and I was surprised to observe that the streets were crowded with admiring and sympathetic friends; and while we, his colleagues, loved and admired him, there are thousands of his neighbors and friends who feel this bereavement more keenly, and upon whom the blow has fallen with crushing weight.

On occasions such as this we are vividly reminded of the shortness and uncertainty of human life, and of the words of Lincoln's favorite poem:

Oh, why should the spirit of mortal be proud?
Like a fast-fleeting meteor, a fast-flying cloud,
A flash of the lightning, a break of the wave,
He passed from life to his rest in the grave.
The leaves of the oak and the willow shall fade,
Be scattered around and together be laid;
And the young and the old, and the low and the high
Shall molder to dust and together shall lie.

So the multitude goes, like the flower or the weed
That withers away to let others succeed:
So the multitude comes, even those we behold,
To repeat every tale that has often been told.

'Tis the wink of an eye, 'tis the draft of a breath,
From the blossom of health to the paleness of death,
From the gilded saloon to the bier and the shroud:
Oh, why should the spirit of mortal be proud?

Of the many beautiful encomiums, written and spoken of this distinguished man, the most beautiful, most touching, and most expressive was that of his personal friend and devoted admirer, David C. Bangs, of Oak Park, Ill., as follows:

A TRIBUTE TO LOVABLE "BILLY" MASON.

In poverty and affluence, in storm and sunshine, in joy and sorrow, he was the same unaffected, simple-hearted man. His life ran like a thread of gold through 40 years of remarkable political history.

He assumed nothing but duty; he pretended to nothing but integrity; boasted of nothing but the deeds of those who love our country and our flag.

"Native and to the manner born," polished, natural, void of affectation, he aped no foreign styles, discarded all the tinsels of life, never presumed anything upon the high positions to which the people had elevated him; was ever accessible to all and continued throughout his wonderful career the same transparent childish simplicity that characterized him when, a little lad 6 years old, he began his public career singing political songs.

He loved the beautiful in art and nature. He loved the flowers, the trees, the running brooks—all things beautiful, pure, and good—but most of all, he loved the little children. I have seen him break away from pressing legislative duties, walk through the corridors of the Capitol clasping the hand of a little boy, the child of a poor widow, intent upon getting him a position. This was only one of many similar deeds that crowded into his busy life. It was ever a joy to him just to be kind, just to be good to all.

He was a crusader for righteousness. His armor and his lance were in the thick of every battle against oppression; an intrepid fighter for liberty, in any form, in any worthy cause, for a nation or an individual.

"This brave and tender man, in every storm of life, was oak and rock, but in the sunshine he was vine and flower."

In material goods he was poor. In intellectual gifts and rugged honesty, in deeds of loving kindness, he was rich. He knew the joy of giving—the magic of kind deeds. His "love was as boundless as the sea"; the more he gave the more he had.

"The morning sun shone with softened luster on his closing eyes. Its evening beams played lightly on his brow, calm in the dignity of death. His passing was as gentle as an infant's sleep. * * * a long, lingering twilight, melting into the softest shade. He is indissolubly contained in the memory and affections of his countrymen. The weary head reposes now upon the lap of Mother Earth. The stranger guest no longer lingers at his hospitable home. He is not there; he whose classical taste and various conversation lent a charm to every leisure hour; whose bland manners and social simplicity made every welcome doubly dear; whose political sagacity read the fate and interests of nations as with a second sight, and scented the first breath of tyranny in the passing gale, whose love of liberty was inflexible, universal, supreme; whose devotion to his country never faltered in the worst and never wearied in the best of times."

Once he wrote a little book—"John, the Unafraid." Unconsciously he portrayed himself—lovable "Billy" Mason.

Upon the grave of "John, the Unafraid," we place the perfumed flowers of gratitude and love.

Tears suffuse our eyes. Speech can not contain the depth of grief that surges o'er our saddened hearts.

"John, the Unafraid," thou art no more. We shall not see thy smiling face again; nor note thy gentle mien, the joyous twinkle of thine eyes, hear the cadence of that kindly voice; nor e'er again behold and love thee in the living pulsing flesh.

Gentle, noble, generous, kindly genius, "John, the Unafraid," Thou wert indeed a man. "We shall not look upon his like again."

"His last breath committed his soul to God and his offspring to his country."

"Calmly he looked on either life, and here saw nothing to regret, or there to fear;

From nature's temp'rate feast rose satisfy'd,
Thank'd Heaven that he had lived, and that he died."

"God's finger touched him and he slept."

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, "the survival of the fittest" presupposes the existence of the unfit. Whenever the unfit have been given a chance it has proven many times that they in turn survive.

In plant life is it true, as everywhere else, that the fittest survive. The strongest take from the soil the sustenance that means life to the weak and the weak perish. But if the frail plant be given tender care, supplied by some outside agency with the sources of growth and life, it pushes up in renewed strength and unfolds into vigorous maturity.

So it is with human beings. Some are doomed to be disregarded, set aside, dwarfed, trodden under the heel of the stronger, oppressed. Too often these unfortunate ones reach imploring hands in vain to some one higher up, who, if he so willed, could not only lend them hope and courage but such substantial aid as would enable them to take their place at last among the fittest of the earth.

Do we really find many, when the truth is all told, who have that love for their fellow man, that pity for struggling, yearning humanity that makes them so sensitive to the cry of despair that they can not, that they do not, turn aside with deaf ears? Do we find many who devote the very best there is in them to the aid and the uplifting of these unhappy ones?

The man whom we eulogize to-day was such a man. No worthy one appealed to him in vain. If it was humanly within the power of Mr. Mason to help where help was needed, he gave the best he had in the championship of their cause. Whether a nation or an individual, mattered not to him. The humblest petitioner reached his big heart just as appealingly as the greatest. He was absolutely unafraid of censure and blame, if through his influence happiness might come into the life of some despairing soul.

He was a fearless thinker, and he had enemies, as what fearless thinker has not. He never hesitated for what he considered right and just. It would scarcely be the hope of a great man to live his life without bitter adversaries. Political recognition and aggrandizement were dear to him as to every man in public life, but he fearlessly jeopardized his seat among the rulers to lend his aid to the defenseless.

If there ever was a more effective and convincing speaker than Billy Mason I never heard him. Everyone who knew him was familiar with his delightful humor, wit, and his unflinching cheer.

But the outstanding characteristic about Mr. Mason was his tenderness, his gentleness, and his love for his family and for his friends. It was impossible to come in contact with him without feeling the warmth of his friendship. He brought out the very best side of everyone he met. To my mind that is one of the essentials to greatness of character. His buoyant spirit dominated every gathering of which he was a part.

We called him "Billy" Mason. That was our response to his tenderness. It did not detract from the dignity of his great soul. It expressed the love with which we walked beside him a little while.

One Sunday evening not long before he died he sang in a clear, appealing voice some of the old familiar songs we all love. It was a revelation to those who had never heard him sing.

My office being across the corridor from the one occupied by Mr. Mason furnishes opportunity for knowledge of many little instances of his kindness to people. Just the other day a colored boy came into my office with pitiful distress in his voice and manner because the man who had befriended him was gone. Life seemed hopeless and empty to the lad without the encouragement and help of his old friend.

I remember with great pleasure the almost daily chats I had with Mr. Mason in the mornings before office hours. He was usually at his office early, and he was always concerned for some one whom he was helping. It was his life.

We of Illinois have always known Billy Mason. He honored us in his life, and we honored him living, and we honor him dead.

He has gone where—

Only the Master shall praise us, and only the Master shall blame;
And no one shall work for money, and no one shall work for fame,
But each for the joy of working, and each, in his separate star,
Shall draw the thing as he sees it for the God of things as they are.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit herewith the tribute of Hon. Ernest Lundeen, formerly a Member of Congress from Minnesota, to the memory of Hon. William E. Mason.

The remarks are as follows:

We who remain remember the Senator. We can not forget our brilliant leader of the World War days. He spoke the eloquence of truth. His courage inspired. Time after time he took the floor to battle down the foes of our beloved America, but while many applauded, tear dimmed and convinced, their votes went elsewhere. If our boys died in frozen Russia, Mason rose to demand their immediate return to homeland. If conscription for foreign service periled, he voted and spoke a mighty no. If European entanglements threatened, he rose to denounce war to settle the real estate title to Europe. If liberty and independence of speech and assembly were threatened, then he rose a champion. And so it went all through those difficult, awful days. Years before that he was on the firing line ever faithful to his trust. He battled to the last, and where did he fail? Was he not a mighty warrior? The Halls of Congress still ring with his wonder speeches. Little men could not understand—small men could not see, but he understood and he saw. He understood the American people, and he saw to it that their interests were protected by his voice and vote. I owe him much more than

I can tell. He was a father to me in Congress. I loved him, and I wish to leave these few words to voice something from my heart.

We need more Senator MASONs—big hearted, courageous, lion hearted, broad minded, lovers of the America of Washington and Lincoln.

The traditions under which our country prospered and grew great, the foreign policy of Washington, Jefferson, and Monroe, dear to his heart, he rose daily to defend. Cheerful, eloquent, tireless, big hearted, brainy BILLY MASON. I love his memory, and I commend his speeches and his works to the careful study and meditation of my countrymen for he fought the fight of a good man.

ERNEST LUNDEEN,
Former Member Sixty-fifth Congress.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, we meet to-day to pay tribute to our departed colleague, WILLIAM E. MASON, whom I knew intimately and well for over 30 years.

BILLY MASON, as he was popularly known among his friends, was a kindly, generous, and courageous man, never hesitating to do what he believed was right. His life has been filled to the brim with deeds and acts that have endeared him to the hearts of all classes and creeds. His helping hand and sympathy were ever for the weak and oppressed, and his record in this House as a champion for the independence and freedom of small nations will ever serve as a monument to his sincere, earnest, and untiring efforts to those liberty-loving peoples that sought to throw off the shackles of tyranny and oppression.

During his service on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and especially during the last two sessions in which he served, no member of that committee worked more zealously and conscientiously to enact reconstructive legislation than he. No one except a member of that committee can realize or appreciate his courageous and valiant fight for the adoption of the Irish resolution. He led the fight of his party on this measure and, though some of the members of the majority were opposed to the purposes of the resolution, party lines were swept aside and with the cooperation of some of the minority the resolution was reported to the House and passed. This was practically BILLY MASON's last legislative action in behalf of oppressed peoples. Shortly thereafter he was taken ill. He recovered sufficiently to attend the sessions of the House and then came a relapse. He was removed to his hotel, in the shadow of the Capitol, and after a lingering illness on the 16th of June, 1921, he passed to the great beyond. Five months after his passing away came the partial fulfillment of what he advocated—the preliminary steps to the creation of the Irish Free State.

No greater tribute to a man was paid by the citizenry of Chicago than when the congressional funeral delegation arrived with the body of our colleague. A vast multitude lined the streets, with bent and bared heads, in heartfelt sympathy and feeling, in the realization that they had lost a friend.

I pay this tribute to BILLY MASON by reason of the fact that he stood close at all times to the people, and was in deed and truth a true representative of those who intrusted him with their commission. He served them, his State, and his country well; a life full spent, with duty done, he has earned his rest of sweet repose.

ADJOURNMENT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If no other Member desires to address the House, the exercises of the day are concluded, and in accordance with the resolutions heretofore passed, the House stands adjourned until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

Accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, February 27, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

MONDAY, February 27, 1922.

(Legislative day of Thursday, February 23, 1922.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

TREATY WITH JAPAN.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty between the United States and Japan with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator, in particular the island of Yap, signed at Washington on February 11, 1922.

Mr. UNDERWOOD obtained the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	McKinley	Rawson
Borah	Glass	McNary	Robinson
Brandegee	Gooding	Moses	Sheppard

Mr. CURTIS. I was requested to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] are detained at a hearing before the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] desires to have something inserted in the RECORD. I yield to him for that purpose.

BIRTHDAY OF HENRY W. LONGFELLOW.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, two of the greatest Americans who ever lived were born in the month of February. We have already observed and paid tribute to one in the Chamber, and in thousands of places all over the country we paid tribute to the other. A third was born 115 years ago to-day, one of the most beloved poets in America. I ask that a letter written by the president of the International Longfellow Society, of Portland, Me., and a poem written by Longfellow, known as The Arsenal at Springfield, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter and the poem were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE INTERNATIONAL LONGFELLOW SOCIETY,
LONGFELLOW BIRTHPLACE,
Portland, Me., February 22, 1922.

HON. BERT M. FERNALD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR FERNALD: Three of the greatest Americans were born in February. Washington and Lincoln have been honored this month in a thousand places. February 27 is the anniversary of the birth of the world's best-loved poet, our own Longfellow.

The noble old mansion in which he was born has been dedicated with impressive ceremony by the governor of Maine and a distinguished assembly as an international Longfellow memorial. It is being preserved for this and future generations by the International Longfellow Society with the assistance of more than a thousand women's clubs representing every State in the Union.

The Longfellow University has been founded for the promotion of world peace, Christian civilization, and brotherhood inspired by the splendid philosophy of the poet in The Arsenal at Springfield:

"Were half the power that fills the world with terror,
Were half the wealth bestowed on camps and courts,
Given to redeem the human mind from error,
There were no need of arsenals nor forts."

And the divine command: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."
No nobler peace poem was ever written than The Arsenal at Springfield. What could now be more appropriate than the reading of it into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the poet's birthday, February 27, and also the printing in the RECORD the Longfellow University Bible College invitation to join the college, without fees or dues of any kind, anyone, anywhere, regardless of age, sex, race, or religion.

Sincerely, yours,

ARTHUR C. JACKSON, President.

THE ARSENAL AT SPRINGFIELD. (Longfellow.)

This is the arsenal. From floor to ceiling,
Like a huge organ, rise the burnished arms;
But from their silent pipes no anthem pealing
Startles the villages with strange alarms.

Ah! what a sound will rise, how wild and dreary,
When the death angel touches those swift keys!
What loud lament and dismal Miserere
Will mingle with their awful symphonies!

I hear even now the infinite fierce chorus,
The cries of agony, the endless groan,
Which, through the ages that have gone before us,
In long reverberations reach our own.

On helm and harness rings the Saxon hammer,
Through Cimbric forest roars the Norseman's song,
And loud, amid the universal clamor,
O'er distant deserts sounds the Tartar gong.

I hear the Florentine, who from his palace
Wheels out his battle bell with dreadful din,
And Aztec priests upon their teocallis
Beat the wild war drums made of serpent's skin;

The tumult of each sacked and burning village;
The shout that every prayer for mercy drowns;
The soldiers' revels in the midst of pillage;
The wail of famine in beleaguered towns;

The bursting shell, the gateway wrenched asunder,
The rattling musketry, the clashing blade;
And ever and anon, in tones of thunder,
The diapason of the cannonade.

Is it, O man, with such discordant noises,
With such accursed instruments as these,
Thou drownest Nature's sweet and kindly voices
And jarrest the celestial harmonies?

Were half the power that fills the world with terror,
Were half the wealth bestowed on camps and courts,
Given to redeem the human mind from error,
There were no need of arsenals nor forts:

The warrior's name would be a name abhorred!
And every nation, that should lift again
Its hand against a brother, on its forehead
Would wear forevermore the curse of Cain!

Down the dark future, through long generations,
The echoing sounds grow fainter and then cease;
And like a bell, with solemn, sweet vibrations,
I hear once more the voice of Christ say, "Peace"!

Peace! and no longer from its brazen portals
The blast of war's great organ shakes the skies!
But beautiful as songs of the immortals,
The holy melodies of love arise.

DEATH OF CAPT. DALE MABRY.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a brief tribute printed in the Ocala (Fla.) Evening Star with reference to a very gallant Florida officer who lost his life when the Roma went down. He illustrated the highest type of an American officer.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The horror of the wreck of the Roma is brought close to the people of Florida by the death of Capt. Dale Mabry, of Tampa, second in command of the ill-fated craft. He belonged to a well-known and honored Florida family. Capt. Mabry was 30 years old and unmarried. He was born at Tallahassee, the son of the late Judge Milton H. Mabry. He was educated in the public schools of this State and graduated from Marion Military School, Marion, Ala. Capt. Mabry left his business in Tampa to enter the second officers' training camp at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., in August, 1917. Just before completing his training there he went to Atlanta and took the examination for the Air Service and was commissioned a lieutenant. He was sent to France in December, 1917, and remained there in active service until the armistice. He was promoted to captain, commanding the Tenth Balloon Company. He made a fine record for efficiency, and after he returned to the States, in 1919, he entered the Regular Army as captain. Capt. Mabry was sent to Rome last summer as one of the company of flyers to bring the Roma to this country, the United States having purchased the giant dirigible from Italy. He was on the Roma when it made its first trial flight.

INTERMENT OF SOLDIER DEAD.

As in legislative session,

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Acting Quartermaster General of the Army, transmitting lists of American soldier dead returned from overseas to be reinterred in the Arlington National Cemetery Thursday, March 2, 1922, at 2.30 p. m., which, with the accompanying lists, was ordered to lie on the table for the information of Senators.

FEDERAL FARM LAND BANK LOANS (S. DOC. NO. 137).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Federal Farm Loan Board, signed by Charles E. Lobdell, farm loan commissioner, transmitting certain information in response to Senate resolution 222, agreed to January 20, 1922, requesting the Federal Farm Loan Board to furnish the Senate information as to certain alleged commissions or fees unlawfully charged and the number and amount of applications by States for loans, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Assistant Secretary of Labor, transmitting, pursuant to law, a list of miscellaneous papers and documents on the files of the Bureau of Naturalization which are not needed in the conduct of business, and having no permanent value or historic interest, and asking for action looking to their disposition, which was referred to a Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments. The Vice President appointed Mr. STERLING and Mr. McKELLAR members of the committee on the part of the Senate and directed that the Secretary notify the House of Representatives thereof.

BONUS TO EX-SERVICE MEN.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a report of the committee on national affairs of the National Republican Club relative to the soldiers' bonus.

There being no objection, the report was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL REPUBLICAN CLUB (INC.)
54-56 West Fortieth Street, New York City.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL AFFAIRS ON SOLDIERS' BONUS.

The within report was presented to a regular meeting of the National Republican Club (Inc.), held February 21, 1922, and duly adopted.

OSCAR W. EHRHORN,

Recording Secretary.

COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL AFFAIRS OF THE NATIONAL REPUBLICAN CLUB.
REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON SOLDIERS' BONUS.

The committee on national affairs submit the following report and recommendations:

At the stated monthly meeting of the club held on January 17, 1922, the following resolution introduced by Col. Newbold Morris and seconded by Capt. Henry W. Goddard was referred to the committee on national affairs:

"Resolved, That the National Republican Club be opposed to the grant of a Federal bonus to any former soldier who can not show a wound."

The committee on national affairs, having given full consideration to this resolution at a meeting held on January 27, report it back with the recommendation that it be adopted in the following form:

"Resolved, That the National Republican Club be opposed to the grant of a Federal bonus to any former soldier who can not show a wound or who was not disabled in the service."

The committee are of opinion that the far-reaching principles and grave economic issues involved in the proposal for a Federal soldiers' bonus are not clearly understood. This proposal has nothing to do with the care of the wounded, the disabled, or the dependent. It is merely a proposal to grant, out of the Treasury of the United States, in one form or another, what is called adjusted compensation. This means increased pay to all who served in the military or naval forces of the United States between April 5, 1917, and November 12, 1918, except those who were dishonorably discharged, or were discharged on account of alienage, or were conscientious objectors, and this notwithstanding the fact that the pay of those in the military and naval forces of the United States was doubled at the outbreak of the war and that extra allowances for foreign service were also made.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in a letter addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives under date of January 24, 1922, makes it plain that the total cost of the proposed bonus would be about $3,330,000,000, of which at least $850,000,000 would fall in the first two years of its operation. The Secretary adds that the maximum cost might reach $5,250,000,000. These huge estimates take no account of expense of administration or the possible cost of vocational training aid, farm or home aid, or of Federal land aid to veterans who might elect such benefits. Moreover, the expenditures involved would be in addition to the sums already appropriated, chiefly for relief to disabled veterans, which now amount to $450,000,000 annually and constitute the largest single item in the Federal Budget with the exception of the interest on the public debt.

The Federal Government maintains numerous and admirably equipped hospitals for the care of sick and disabled veterans. The Federal Government is now spending large sums at rates ranging from $25 to $135 a month, for compensation to soldiers who are in those hospitals. In every northern State except Maine and Utah, comfortable soldiers' homes have been established, toward the maintenance of which the United States Government contributes $120 per year per inmate. The National Government itself maintains 10 splendidly equipped soldiers' homes, scattered over the country from Maine to California and from Wisconsin to Tennessee, where every honorably discharged soldier, be he Regular, Volunteer, or drafted man, who has served in any war in which the United States has taken part, is eligible for membership when unable by reason of accident, illness, or old age to maintain himself. At each of these national soldiers' homes there is provision for music, theater, library, club rooms, amusement halls, and billiard tables, as well as for hospital care and religious instruction. A member of one of these soldiers' homes finds all his needs met by the Government. He is clothed. He is given wholesome food. He is housed in clean, well ventilated barracks equipped with every modern convenience. At his death he is given a military funeral and a volley is fired over his grave. The United States Government erects a marble headstone, on which is inscribed his name, his regiment, and his State.

There is, therefore, involved in the proposed soldiers' bonus no question of the Nation fulfilling its obligations to its disabled veterans. That obligation is, as the Secretary of the Treasury pointed out, continuing and paramount, and the expenditures therefor will be very heavy for years to come. Moreover, a sum estimated at more than $550,000,000 has already been provided in bonus and other legislation for the benefit of ex-service men by the several States.

A Federal soldiers' bonus, on the other hand, is an attempt to appraise patriotic service in terms of dollars and cents, with the certain result of demoralizing the public spirit of the Nation by distributing hundreds of millions, even thousands of millions, of dollars as a gratuity. If the money were at hand with which to make this distribution, the proposal would be highly objectionable on grounds of public policy. It would entirely overlook the fact that it is the primary duty of the citizen, particularly in a self-governing Republic, to defend the State without expectation of compensation of any kind, and that in organized society there are duties owed by the citizen to the State, as well as benefits which flow from the State to the citizen. When, however, the money for such purpose must be raised by imposing new taxes at a time when the business, the labor, and the agriculture of the country are staggering under their tax burdens, it is unthinkable that steps should be taken that might well result in increase of unemployment, in still greater depression of agriculture, and in indefinitely postponing the revival of business, while the great army of taxpayers are compelled to provide the huge sums that would be needed for this unwise purpose.

As party politics, such action spells suicide; as public policy, it is madness.

This same question has been raised once before in recent American history, although in far smaller proportions. In February, 1875, the Congress passed a bill "to equalize the bounties of soldiers who served in the late War for the Union," and President Grant, a Republican and a former Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States, vetoed the bill in a message bearing date March 3, 1875, in words which rang throughout the country. President Grant objected to this bill because it appropriated from the Treasury a large sum of money at a time when the revenue was insufficient for current wants; because the issue of bonds authorized by the bill would seriously embarrass the refunding operations then progressing; and because, in his judgment, it would result more in a measure for the relief of claim agents and middlemen who would intervene to collect or discount the bounties granted by it. "The passage of this bill at this time," wrote President Grant, "is inconsistent with the measure of economy now demanded by the necessities of the country." These patriotic words are applicable with tenfold force to-day.

The committee believe that the National Republican Club should take the strongest possible ground on this subject and should strike a note of leadership that will be heard throughout the United States. The committee believe that the club should make an appeal to Republican Senators and Members of Congress not to be misled by the clamor of individuals and organizations which may have a personal interest in the proposed action, but to view this question in the light of the financial and economic conditions that have been pointed out by the Secretary of the Treasury, and to act solely from the viewpoint of the highest public interest. Moreover, Republican Senators and Members of Congress should be urged to put before the enrolled voters of the country a clear and simple statement of what this adjusted compensation or soldiers' bonus would mean to our public finances and to the burdens which the taxpayer must bear. In the light of this information they should then ascertain exactly how great is the demand for this action on the part of Republican voters, and how far it comes from those not in sympathy with the Republican Party, who would be only too glad to have that party assume responsibility for increased taxation and prolonged business depression.

In this connection the committee believe that it is opportune to press for an inquiry as to the detailed expenditure of the sums now appropriated by the Congress for the relief of disabled veterans. If there is faulty administration, it should be discovered and stopped. If there is waste, it should be discovered and stopped. If there is lack of sympathy and an excess of red tape, that should be discovered and stopped. The disabled veteran is entitled to the fullest benefit from the expenditure of every dollar that is appropriated on his behalf. If the amounts already appropriated for the purpose of doing all that can be done for the disabled veteran are not sufficient, then that fact should be made plain, for the people will certainly approve the appropriation of whatever sums may be shown to be needed for this purpose.

The committee therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the National Republican Club urge a speedy inquiry under the authority of the House of Representatives into the expenditure of the sums now appropriated in aid of disabled veterans, to the end that the country may be assured that the veterans are receiving the fullest possible benefit from the appropriations made in their behalf."

PRESENT AND FUTURE OF THE WORLD'S GOLD COIN.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have an article by Chester T. Kennan, of Spokane, on the question of the present and future of the world's gold coin. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Printing, with a view to having it printed as a Senate document.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO THE RULES—DEBATE ON APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, out of order I desire to give notice of an amendment to the rules and to the provision for amending the rules that is now on the calendar. I ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

I hereby give notice of my intention to propose the following amendment to Rule XVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate and to Senate resolution 213 now on the Senate Calendar and proposing to amend said rule:

Amend Rule XVI by adding the following paragraph:

"5. When an appropriation bill is under consideration by the Senate debate shall be confined to the bill, unless otherwise ordered by unanimous consent. A point of order that a Senator is not speaking to the bill shall be decided by the Presiding Officer and an appeal from his decision shall be decided without debate."

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

As in legislative session,

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a resolution adopted at a mass meeting held in Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., February 24, 1922, favoring prompt ratification, without change or reservation, of the treaties prepared by the Conference on Limitation of Armament, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and it was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Telegram.]

Boston, February 25, 1922.

PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Important mass meeting held last night in Symphony Hall, Boston, under auspices nonpartisan committee representing every walk in life to urge ratification of Washington conference treaties without reservations. Gov. Cox presided. Speakers were Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird, member of the advisory committee to the American delegation; John F. Moors, State chairman of the Woodrow Wilson Foundation; Walter L. Collins, former president Boston City Council; J. Weston Allen, attorney general of Massachusetts; John Jackson Walsh, State senator and Democratic candidate for governor in 1920; Municipal Judge Michael J. Murray; and A. Lawrence Lowell, president of Harvard University and of the League to Enforce Peace and chairman of executive committee of World Peace Foundation. All speakers agreed upon the vital importance and epoch-making character of the treaties, and urged prompt ratification without reservations.

The following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"We petition the Senate of the United States to ratify promptly, without change or reservation, the treaties of the Washington conference."

EDWARD CUMMINGS,

For the Committee, World Peace Foundation.

Mr. LODGE presented a resolution of the House of Representatives of the Legislature of Massachusetts, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, as follows:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

Whereas the Navy Department contemplates converting into aircraft carriers two of the six cruisers on which work has been suspended; and

Whereas the battle cruiser Lexington, under construction at the Fore River plant of the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation at Quincy, was 36 per cent completed when work was suspended; and

Whereas work of this nature would furnish employment for thousands of Massachusetts residents, especially in Boston and vicinity: Therefore be it

Ordered, That the House of Representatives of Massachusetts strongly urges that said cruiser Lexington be converted into an aircraft carrier and that construction on said cruiser be resumed without delay; and be it further Ordered, That copies of this order be sent by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the Secretary of the Navy and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from New England.

In house of representatives, adopted February 24, 1922.

A true copy.

Attest:

F. W. COOK,

Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. LODGE presented a resolution adopted by the city council of Lowell, Mass., favoring the passage of the so-called soldiers' bonus bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WARREN presented a resolution adopted by the Lions Club, of Sheridan, Wyo., favoring imposition in the pending tariff bill of an adequate tariff duty on sugar for the protection of the beet-sugar industry, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by members of the Williams Community Club, of Williams Township, Nelson County, at Mapes, N. Dak., favoring the enactment of legislation reviving the Government Grain Corporation so as to stabilize prices of certain farm products, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented the petitions of Conrad Berg and 27 others, of Columbus and vicinity; E. C. Thompson and 18 others, of Alamo; Thorvald Marstin and 15 others, of Watford City; John Birnbaum and 7 others, of Hankinson; William Shoenhut, of Belden, and 41 others, of Belden and vicinity; Isaac Veer and 4 others, of Langdon; and H. F. Overby and 19 others, of Tolna and vicinity, all in the State of North Dakota, praying for the enactment of legislation reviving the Government Grain Corporation so as to stabilize prices of certain farm products, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

AMENDMENT OF DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the amendment submitted by himself proposing to appropriate $5,000 for salary of the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, intended to be proposed by him to the Departments of State and Justice appropriation bill, reported it with amendments, submitted a report (No. 515) thereon, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed, which was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED.

As in legislative session,

Mr. SUTHERLAND, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on February 23, 1922, they presented to the President of the United States enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 29. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to grant to Lloyd E. Gandy, of Spokane, Wash., his heirs and assigns, the right to overflow certain lands on the Fort George Wright Military Reservation, at Spokane, Wash., on such terms and conditions with respect to improvements to be made on the present target range as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, or in lieu of such improvements to be made on the present target range the Secretary of War may accept a conveyance to the United States of such other lands to be designated by the Secretary of War as may be deemed suitable for a target range in exchange for such overflow lands; that to facilitate the acquisition of the necessary additional lands the Secretary of War is authorized to condemn land necessary and suitable for target-range purposes, such condemnation to be at the expense of said Lloyd E. Gandy, grantee, his heirs and assigns;

S. 52. An act for the relief of the Stevens Institute of Technology, of Hoboken, N. J.;

S. 160. An act for the relief of Kristina Furbak;

A bill (S. 3205) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to establish for farm products uniform standards of classification, an inspection service, and a market news service, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. MOSES:

A bill (S. 3206) granting a pension to Emma F. Carter;

A bill (S. 3207) granting a pension to Ellen Burt Slayton; and

A bill (S. 3208) granting a pension to Sarah Hardy; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CURTIS:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 168) in relation to a monument to commemorate the services and sacrifices of the women of the United States of America, its insular possessions and the District of Columbia in the World War; to the Committee on the Library.

TRANSFER OF TARIFF COMMISSION TO DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN introduced a bill (S. 3199) to transfer the functions of the United States Tariff Commission to the Department of Commerce, to enlarge the duties of the commission, and for other purposes, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In connection with the bill just introduced I ask that the following telegram be read at the desk.

There being no objection, the reading clerk read the telegram, as follows:

TRENTON, N. J., February 24, 1922.

Senator J. S. FRELINGHUYSEN,
1013 Sixteenth Street NW., Washington, D. C.:

At a regular meeting of the board of trustees of the Manufacturers' Association of New Jersey, which has a membership numbering over 2,000 manufacturing concerns engaged in diversified classes of production, among which are textiles spinning, pottery, silk, leather, sugar, metals, machinery, foodstuffs, hardware, and bleaching, a proposal for the development of a tariff of specified duties to be scientifically based on American conversion costs was presented and exhaustively discussed, and a resolution was unanimously adopted approving of the proposal and directing the executive committee of the board to take steps when, and as deemed advisable, to disseminate information in respect of, and to support, and further the adoption on the proposal, and its successful operation we urge you to give most careful consideration to the proposal and tender you all assistance in our power in creating a tariff of specific duties based on American conversion costs.

MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION OF NEW JERSEY,
By J. PHILIP BIRD, President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill and the telegram will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGES.

As in legislative session,

Mr. HARRISON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 9103) for the appointment of additional district judges for certain courts of the United States; to provide for annual conferences of certain judges of United States courts; to authorize the designation, assignment, and appointment of judges outside of their districts, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

As in legislative session,

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 1312) to amend the charter of the Potomac Insurance Co. of the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the House disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10267) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. CANNON, Mr. ANDERSON, and Mr. GALLIVAN were appointed managers of the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10329) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. CRAMTON, Mr. FRENCH, and Mr. CARTER were appointed managers of the conference on the part of the House.

TREATY WITH JAPAN.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty between the United States and Japan with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator, in particular the island of Yap, signed at Washington on February 11, 1922.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I desire to address myself very briefly this morning to the subject of the pending treaty. The consideration of the pending treaty depends entirely upon the viewpoint from which it is approached. In the debate so far as it has gone there has been a very great divergence of opinion as to what is in the treaty and what is not; as to whether we are getting anything out of the treaty or are giving anything up. My own viewpoint does not accord with the expressions in reference to the matter of most of those who have debated the treaty. I am, therefore, going to take the time of the Senate for a few moments to place in the RECORD my own opinion.

I am heartily in favor of the ratification of the treaty. So far as I am concerned, all I see in the treaty is that Japan yields to this Government the right to establish a cable station on the island of Yap, and to establish radio stations in the future if it shall desire so to do. I know there is somewhat more language than that in the treaty, but I think the language is supplemental to what has already been done.

As has been said heretofore, there is really not anything in the mandated islands that have been given to Japan which we want outside of the cable station at Yap, because everybody knows that some twenty-odd years ago, at the conclusion of the Spanish-American War, when we took the Philippine Islands from Spain, we could have included in our demand the islands which have been mandated to Japan, and we could have gotten them. They are really, however, of so little interest commercially or otherwise that, after the close of the Spanish-American War, and following our failure to demand them, Spain sold them to Germany for the small sum of $4,000,000.

As I understand, the islands have no commercial value; they have a scattered population, and are practically unable to establish anything except a very primitive local government. Very few of the islands have harbors of any value whatever. The only reason we are involved in the situation at all is that at the close of the Great War we acquired one of the German cables. Our end of it had to land on the island of Yap in order that at some time in the future we may extend the cable into China. Where it now rests, the cable is of no value; there is no business on Yap. It brings us in contact with no part of the world; it is not of any real service to the Navy; because the radio stations at other points could reach a naval vessel that was in the neighborhood of Yap; but if we acquire a cable station at Yap we can extend the present cable into China. Then it will be of real and great commercial value to the people of the United States.

Why do I say that is all which is involved in the pending treaty, when it embodies language that goes considerably further? I say so because, in my judgment, what is carried in the remainder of the treaty is already foreclosed. If we do not ratify the treaty there will be no change of status whatever from the effect which will follow if we do ratify the treaty. If that is the case, and the ratification of the treaty will not change the status at all from what it would be if we rejected the treaty, then as to the supplemental provisions I am right in the statement that they really are not of any importance and that the only meaning phrase of the treaty is the concession of the island for cable purposes.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I was absent from the Chamber when the Senator began his speech, and I do not know whether or not he has covered the matter to which I wish to refer; but I desire to say there is one provision of the treaty in which I am interested, and that is as to what will be the effect of the treaty with reference to transferring or yielding up our undivided one-fifth interest?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We have not any undivided one-fifth interest, if the Senator will allow me. The Senator understands this is not a treaty made by the conference which recently met at Washington, as to the action of which I am somewhat bound.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. This is a treaty which was made by the State Department, and I am in no way connected with it, except as a Senator of the United States whose vote must be cast in its ratification. Therefore, I feel perfectly free to say, although I am heartily in favor of the treaty, that I entirely differ from the Secretary of State as to the terms upon which the treaty was negotiated, for I contend that there is no undivided one-fifth interest; there can not be. I am sure the Senator from Idaho will agree with me that sovereignty is sovereignty, that it can not be divided; that there can not be a divided one-fifth interest in sovereignty. It is an impossible term; it is not only impossible in thought, in theory, in understanding, but it would be impossible to carry it out. Sovereignty is the supreme essence of government, and no two separate governments can function over the same territory at the same time, except they do so with armed forces in the field, each claiming the right to control.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Assuming, for the sake of the argument, that we had an undivided one-fifth interest, what has become of it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not assume that, because we never had it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator take the position that the United States by virtue of the victory which she assisted in achieving during the late war acquired no interest whatever in the German islands north of the Equator?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I do not take that position; I say that we acquired no undivided one-fifth interest.

Mr. ROBINSON. I should like to have the Senator define for us what interest she did acquire. I presume he intends to do so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am coming to that; I desire to take that question up. First, however, let me say that it has been contended by some that Japan acquired an interest in these islands by reason of the fact that she took them from Germany by force of arms, and that as she subsequently became one of our allies we acquired an interest through Japan. There certainly is nothing in that contention, for two reasons: Japan conquered the islands—if we can use that word properly—because after she sunk the German Fleet in the Pacific Ocean opposite the coast of Chile and took Shantung there was no more fighting about the matter; she merely ran her gunboats in front of these islands and sent a row boat ashore and put up her flag. She took possession of them long before we entered the Great War. When she took possession of those islands she was not an ally of ours, and, therefore, if any title is claimed by reason of force of arms we have no right to the islands at all. But Japan did not get her title to the islands by conquest, because the only way conquest can give title is by taking possession and maintaining it for an indefinite time against those who might rightfully claim it and against the world until it becomes recognized by international law or by the other nations as an existing fact. That has never occurred so far as Japan is concerned.

More than that, Japan recognizes that she has no title that she acquired by force of arms because she is one of the signatory powers to the treaty of Versailles and took her title from Germany, if she had any title or claim. Now, part 4, article 18—

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. Adverting to the question raised by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], it is the opinion of the Senator from Alabama, I understand, that there can be no undivided sovereignty?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. That all of the island possessions and other possessions of Germany outside of Europe were ceded under the treaty of Versailles to the five principal allied and associated powers. Whether it is proper to speak of it as the sovereignty or not is neither here nor there, but we were given, as one of the five principal allied and associated powers, whatever interest Germany had.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am coming to that point.

Mr. POMERENE. Let me finish the question. Whatever that interest was, whether it was an interest of sovereignty, a proprietary interest, or what not, that undivided one-fifth interest seems to remain with us; at least President Wilson and the State Department now take that position. What has become of that under the so-called Yap treaty that is before us now?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I was just coming to that; but I can not answer him directly, because I have got to lay my premise first or I can not make the argument. Of course, so far as the question of sovereignty is concerned, I do not suppose there is a Senator in the Chamber who will contend for a moment that sovereignty can be divided. Some may contend that the one-fifth interest meant title to the islands. If it is sovereign title it can not be divided. If it was title of ownership of land it would be an outrageous construction, because the land of those islands did not belong to Germany. It belonged to the people of the islands. Their towns, their farms, their fishing smacks, the individual property there belonged to the individuals who lived upon the islands. All that Germany had was the sovereign right of government that she acquired from Spain; and to say that we took an interest in the property would be unconscionable.

I think what we did take is very clear, and if my friends will be patient with me for a minute I shall try to show what, in my judgment, we took; but I shall have to read what is in the treaty before I can make my statement.

Part IV, article 118, reads as follows:

In territory outside her European frontiers as fixed by the present treaty Germany renounces all rights, titles, and privileges whatever in or over territory which belonged to her or to her allies, and all rights, titles, and privileges, whatever their origin, which she held as against the allied and associated powers.

Then, in article 119, immediately following, it is said:

Germany renounces in favor of the principal allied and associated powers all her rights and titles over her overseas possessions.

Whatever she gave to the allied and associated powers she gave to them all, and whatever she gave related to her entire overseas possessions, not merely to these mandated islands that went to Japan. It related to her possessions south of the Equator in the Pacific; it related to her possessions in the Near East; it related to all her possessions around the world.

I am free to say that if you read that clause alone it looks as if Germany had intended to convey a joint sovereignty of some kind over her overseas possessions—a proposition, of course, very impossible of execution. Every lawyer knows, however, that in construing a treaty you must make the words conform to their simple and ordinary meaning, and that you can not take one clause of a treaty and read it by itself, but you must make the various clauses of the treaty so coordinate that they all mean something.

What I have read you in articles 118 and 119 is not the only thing in the treaty of Versailles relating to this question. The League of Nations was a very material part of the treaty of Versailles and is the living entity of the treaty of Versailles in very much the larger number of countries in the world; and article 22 of the covenant of the League of Nations reads as follows:

To those colonies and territories which as a consequence of the late war have ceased to be under the sovereignty of the States which formerly governed them and which are inhabited by peoples not yet able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world there should be applied the principle that the well-being and development of such peoples form a sacred trust of civilization, and that securities for the performance of this trust should be embodied in this covenant.

The best method of giving practical effect to this principle is that the tutelage of such peoples should be intrusted to advanced nations who, by reason of their resources, their experience, or their geographical position, can best undertake this responsibility and who are willing to accept it, and that this tutelage should be exercised by them as mandatories on behalf of the league.

The character of the mandate must differ according to the stage of the development of the people, the geographical situation of the territory, its economic conditions, and other similar circumstances.

Certain communities formerly belonging to the Turkish Empire have reached a stage of development where their existence as independent nations can be provisionally recognized, subject to the rendering of administrative advice and assistance by a mandatory until such time as they are able to stand alone. The wishes of these communities must be a principal consideration in the selection of the mandatory.

Other peoples, especially those of central Africa—

And, in passing, let me ask where these other peoples in central Africa came from into this mandatory. The only place in central Africa where the League of Nations acquired any mandatory rights was from German title, named here.

Other peoples, especially those of central Africa, are at such a stage that the mandatory must be responsible for the administration of the territory under conditions which will guarantee freedom of conscience and religion, subject only to the maintenance of public order and morals, the prohibition of abuses such as the slave trade, the arms traffic, and the liquor traffic, and the prevention of the establishment of fortifications or military and naval bases and of military training of the natives for other than police purposes and the defense of territory, and will also secure equal opportunities for the trade and commerce of other members of the league.

Then it goes on to say this:

There are territories, such as southwest Africa—

German possessions—

and certain of the South Pacific Islands—

German possessions—

which, owing to the sparseness of their population, or their small size, or their remoteness from the centers of civilization, or their geographical contiguity to the territory of the mandatory, and other circumstances, can be best administered under the laws of the mandatory as integral portions of its territory, subject to the safeguards above mentioned, in the interests of the indigenous population.

Then it goes on to say, skipping a paragraph:

The degree of authority, control, or administration to be exercised by the mandatory shall, if not previously agreed upon by the members of the league, be explicitly defined in each case by the council.

Here is your contract. The treaty of Versailles conveys the title. I do not think anybody can deny that the title, whatever it is, that Japan has to these particular islands came through the treaty of Versailles; but that same treaty in the league provisions not only recognizes that mandatories shall be established but directly refers to this territory that has been yielded. What does it say that it was conveying? Does it say that it was conveying sovereignty? No. Does it say, with that in mind, that it was conveying the land to be exploited and divided into five parts? No. Here is what it says. In the first paragraph it says:

There should be applied the principle that the well-being and development of such peoples form a sacred trust of civilization and that securities for the performance of this trust should be embodied in this covenant.

Can there be any doubt in the world, unless you reject this language of the League of Nations entirely from the treaty, that when Germany conveyed this title to the allied and associated powers she conveyed the title to them as trustees, and trustees alone, for a specific purpose?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think it is proper to call the attention of the Senator to the language that he used on Friday, in an interruption of my remarks at that time. At that time he quoted the paragraph—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Which I have just read.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; defining the mandates under class C; and then, at that time, he said this:

What I wanted to call attention to was that under this particular kind of mandatory which has been declared these particular territories are put in this class, and they are to be administered under the laws of the mandatory as an integral portion of its territory; in other words, the sovereignty of the mandatory power is recognized, so that it is entirely within the covenant of the League of Nations that this is done.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly. I am not saying anything in contravention of that now. I am merely tracing the title. There are some of these mandatory territories where the sovereignty does not go; but in this particular case the right of government, which is sovereignty, undoubtedly goes to Japan under the mandate, not independently of the mandate, but under the terms of the mandate as I read them the other day, and the Senator from Nevada agreed with me that the sovereignty did go under this mandate.

What I contend is that the five allied and associated powers received the territory of the overseas possessions of Germany, not for themselves but as a trust to administer for the benefit of the people who live within the ceded territory.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, what does the Senator understand by the express language in that character of mandates, that the mandated territory shall become an integral part of the territory of the mandatory?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that as to some of these mandated territories those who negotiated the treaty of Versailles expected that the people of such territories could set up governments of their own, and that all they needed the mandatory to do was to hold out a protecting arm and keep off outside interference. That applied to some of the mandatories, for instance, Armenia; but in reference to others they contemplated that the condition of the inhabitants was such that they could not set up an independent government, and in such cases they authorized the mandatory to govern them as a part of its own territory, which, of course, carried sovereignty, because government and sovereignty are synonymous terms.

Of course, that sovereignty is limited to this extent, that the mandatory acts under the League of Nations, derives its powers from the League of Nations, and is subject to the control of the League of Nations; but I say that if you take this treaty of Versailles, carrying the title to these islands, and reconcile the clauses in the covenant of the League of Nations which relate to them with the grant of title by Germany you can reach but one conclusion. I am not talking about what Germany intended, because she was told to sign on the dotted line, but you can reach only the conclusion that in the grant the men who made the treaty intended that this conveyance should be a conveyance of a trust, and the allied and associated powers were merely to act as trustees in the administration of this trust.

I think that statement is in entire accord with the position which Mr. Wilson took in reference to this matter when he came back. As far as I know, he has never claimed that we got an undivided fifth interest in anything except the right to be a trustee.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator wants to misrepresent the position of the former President.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not.

Mr. PITTMAN. While the Senator may be correct in stating that Mr. Wilson never claimed the one-fifth interest, I would like to read the language of the ex-President, which is very brief, if the Senator has no objection, because I think we should be very careful in a matter of that kind.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am reading from the note of Mr. Hughes of April 21, 1921, in which Mr. Hughes quoted the language of former President Wilson. Mr. Hughes said in that note:

The attitude of President Wilson is sufficiently shown by the following statement which he made to the Department of State on March 3, 1921.

Mind you, this is a statement by Secretary Hughes in a note to the four powers who attempted to allocate this mandate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, I do not agree with Secretary Hughes's position, as I stated in the beginning of my remarks.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am now quoting from Secretary Hughes's note to the four powers with regard to the attitude of President Wilson, and Secretary Hughes is now quoting President Wilson's language:

I beg to return the note received yesterday from the Japanese Government, which I have read, in relation to the proposed mandate covering the island of Yap.

My first information of a contention that the so-called decision of May 7, 1919, by the council of four assigned to Japan a mandate for the island of Yap, was conveyed to me by Mr. Norman W. Davis in October last. I then informed him that I had never consented to the assignment of the island of Yap to Japan.

I had not previously given particular attention to the wording of the council minutes of May 7, 1919, which were only recently called to my attention. I had on several occasions prior to the date mentioned made specific reservations regarding the island of Yap and had taken the position that it should not be assigned under mandate to any one power, but should be internationalized for cable purposes. I assumed that this position would be duly considered in connection with the settlement of the cable question and that it therefore was no longer a matter for consideration in connection with the peace negotiations. I never abandoned or modified this position in respect to the island of Yap, and I did not agree on May 7, 1919, or at any other time, that the island of Yap should be included in the assignment of mandates to Japan.

As a matter of fact, all agreements arrived at regarding the assignment of mandates were conditioned upon a subsequent agreement being reached as to the specific terms of the mandates, and further upon their acceptance by each of the principal allied and associated powers. The consent of the United States is essential both as to assignments of mandates and the terms and provisions of the mandates, after agreement as to their assignment or allocation.

The consent of the United States, as you know, has never been given on either point as to the island of Yap.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is entirely in line with the argument I am making. I stated that President Wilson had never claimed we got an undivided one-fifth interest, or any interest of that kind.

Mr. PITTMAN. He does claim, does he not, that we have whatever interest, whatever rights, the allied and associated powers have?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. He claims in that letter that they could not exercise this mandate; but I will refer to that in a moment, if the Senator will allow me.

The whole letter of the former President sustains just what I have been saying, that the title which came out of Germany came into these powers so that they might establish mandates for their Governments as a sacred trust, as the treaty of Versailles denominates it, a sacred trust for the administration of these Governments for these people.

This document does not say that there shall be only one mandatory to a particular territory. Although Mr. Wilson did not want to take the responsibility, probably, of having a mandatory established for the United States in the island of Yap, although the control of the island was very important to the commercial interests of the United States, he had stated all along that he desired that the island should be internationalized; that is, that the rights there should belong to all of the powers in the League of Nations, and each should have equal rights for cable purposes, and, of course, that is the only value the island has. It is worthless for any other purpose.

I contend that the President of the United States who signed the treaty of Versailles never contended that we had an undivided fifth interest in anything. His very letter shows that his only claim was that it was through the mandates under the League of Nations that the power or control over these islands should be passed.

If the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], all sitting here in front of me, and myself are appointed trustees to administer a peace of property, a sacred trust, and I kick myself out; I say I will not administer it, that I will not go in, and the other four trustees qualify, I do not see how anybody can say or contend for a moment that the other four trustees can not administer the property. That is my position.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, President Wilson denies that they refused to accept the trust as a mandate over Yap. He denies that they ever considered the terms of the mandate. He alleges that it was expressly excluded for future consideration. Unless the ex-President's word is accepted in that matter, we must get other evidence.

Mr. ROBINSON. It was also expressly stated in the notes to which the Senator from Nevada has referred that the terms of the mandate should have been submitted to the United States before the mandate was authorized, and it appears this was never done.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, I do not put the interpretation on the ex-President's letter which my friend from Nevada does; but that is not really material in this case.

The governing thing in this case is the treaty of Versailles. It is not the understanding which any of the signatories to the treaty might have had, because they foreclosed their understanding when they signed the treaty, and it was the last thing they did. The day after the treaty was signed the President of the United States took his ship and came home.

Mr. PITTMAN. Let me ask a question there. I think there is a great deal of strength in the Senator's contention that the authority now existing over this island is derived from the treaties with Germany.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Surely.

Mr. PITTMAN. Does the Senator contend that it can only be derived through one treaty, the Versailles treaty, and that nothing is derived through the separate treaty with Germany?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. So far as I can see, there is nothing in the separate treaty with Germany which fixes our status as a trustee. Of course, if I am wrong about this, there is no argument. The whole thing turns on one question, whether I am right that what we got when we were named one of the allied and associated powers was a trusteeship. If that was what we got, of course the late treaty with Germany does not affect it at all. If we did not get a trusteeship; if we got either a division of sovereignty or a division of a piece of land, then it can be affected by other things. I am not arguing that point. If I am wrong about our getting only a trusteeship, then I concede the argument of the other gentlemen; but I contend that there can not be any doubt about the proposition that all we did get was a trusteeship—nothing more or less than the right to act under a sacred trust for the benefit of the people of the territory ceded by Germany.

Mr. PITTMAN. Can any other power divest us of that sacred trust if we have been granted it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; but we divested ourselves of it.

Mr. PITTMAN. We did not sign the Versailles treaty.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We divested ourselves of it in the only way a trustee does divest himself of it. We by our own action refused to administer the trust. That divested us of it.

Mr. PITTMAN. Does not that depend on the language of the treaty itself?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not mean to say that we can not go back in the trust.

Mr. PITTMAN. But I want to know whether we did divest ourselves. Has the Senator looked at article 118? He has read article 119.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I read article 118. I read them both.

Mr. PITTMAN. In the separate treaty with Germany which we ratified this language is used, and I wish to call attention to it. This is article 1 of the separate treaty with Germany:

Germany undertakes to accord to the United States, and the United States shall have and enjoy, all the rights, privileges, indemnities, reparations, or advantages specified in the aforesaid joint resolution of the Congress of the United States of July 2, 1921, including all the rights and advantages stipulated for the benefit of the United States in the treaty of Versailles which the United States shall fully enjoy notwithstanding the fact that such treaty has not been ratified by the United States.

Then article 2 refers expressly to part 4, in which articles 118 and 119 are found, as being articles which are for the benefit of the United States. Is it the position of the Senator from Alabama that we could not accept the benefits of the Versailles treaty in such a manner?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; not that we could not accept it, but that we have not accepted it. There is a difference between "we could not accept" and "we have not accepted." As I understand the Senator, he is contending that we got some division of sovereignty or some division of land, of property, of territory. If he is right about that, I do not contend at all that the late German treaty did not secure those rights. My contention is that we do neither, that what was conveyed to us under the Versailles treaty was a sacred trust to administer this territory for the benefit of the inhabitants of it, and the only thing that could convey the right of our interest in that trust was our acting, and when we refused to act we had no rights in it.

I do not mean to deny now that if the Government of the United States chose to ask for admission to the League of Nations and became a member of the council of the League of Nations it could not come back and again exercise a trust. It could do that. The trust still exists. But as long as we refuse to administer the trust and stay out of it, we are no part of it.

Mr. PITTMAN. What does the Senator think of this situation? Under article 118, which he has read, it is agreed that the direction with regard to former German property shall be in the allied and associated powers. Of course we are one of them. Article 119, which the Senator has read, says that Germany renounces in favor of the principal allied and associated powers all rights, and so forth, in her overseas possessions. Waiving the proposition that that conveys title to a part of the territory, what I am getting at is this: The council of the League of Nations, which rendered this mandate on the approval of the four powers, gets its sole authority from the treaty.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. PITTMAN. The treaty not only grants the League of Nations the right to grant these mandates, but limits it upon the direction or the allocation of the allied and associated powers, and we are one of the allied and associated powers. The Senator may answer that, and I want to know if he does so answer it, by saying we forfeited our rights to designate this allocation by not joining the League of Nations or ratifying the Versailles treaty.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thought I had made myself clear. I distinctly say that from my standpoint we had nothing to do with it. I read those two clauses, and said if we take those two clauses, 118 and 119, alone as the only thing by which to determine the question, it would look as if Germany had ceded something—it is difficult to determine what, but some specific title of something—to the allied and associated powers for them to have and to hold as nations. I conceded that.

Mr. PITTMAN. Suppose we had ratified the Versailles treaty, then what would be our position?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But I said all the time that according to my construction we can not construe the power of cession from articles 118 and 119 alone, but we have to take the intent of the parties by determining all that was in the treaty of Versailles, and a part of that treaty was the League of Nations, which expressly, in so many terms, stated that they were going to exercise a mandate over the territory that was ceded, and saying that it should be exercised as a sacred trust. How could we define that the grant of this power was intrusted to these nations, rather than in fact granted by the language of this article?

Mr. PITTMAN. I will waive that question. What I am trying to get at is this: At the time we refused to ratify the treaty, suppose we had in fact ratified the Versailles treaty, would then sections 118 and 119 come into force and effect for our benefit?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Except as trustee.

Mr. PITTMAN. Would they come into effect for our benefit?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the Senator mean that we are to be benefited by being a trustee?

Mr. PITTMAN. Would we have had as much right to say with regard to these islands as France, England, or Japan?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We would have a right to sit in the council of the League of Nations and determine on how the mandates should be administered.

Mr. PITTMAN. As a matter of fact, the four powers referred to ignored the United States and attempted to allocate this to Japan before we had ever acted on the Versailles treaty.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That may have been bad faith on their part.

Mr. PITTMAN. If it is bad faith, are we going to affirm that bad faith?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not saying that they did or did not ignore the United States. I know that before the League of Nations was created there was a secret agreement between some of those powers that Japan should have the islands belonging to Germany north of the Equator in the Pacific Ocean; but rather than look at that as bad faith on their part I am inclined to construe the proposition as though the agreement had been made before we went into the war, and I am inclined to believe that when they signed the Versailles treaty with us they waived their former agreement and accepted the mandates here, because the first agreement did not contemplate a mandate. It contemplated actual possession, under which, if carried out, Japan would have had the entire sovereignty. If she holds as a sovereign now, it is as a sovereign mandate; but, of course, that sovereign mandate can be taken away from her by the League of Nations. However, if the understanding to which my friend from Nevada refers had been carried out, she would have held the sovereignty without dispute.

Mr. PITTMAN. We were invited into the supreme council with all the responsibilities of the supreme council. That council consisted of representatives of the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan. Does the Senator doubt that in the supreme council, when they were discussing these very mandated islands, the President of the United States obtained an exception with regard to Yap?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. He was not in the supreme council, of course. The supreme council was not organized until long after Mr. Wilson came home.

Mr. PITTMAN. The five powers were represented when he was there.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I mean the council of the league.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am not talking of the council of the league; I am talking about the supreme council representing the allied and associated powers.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is where the Yap thing was done. Does the Senator doubt that the President of the United States, when they were discussing those mandates with regard to islands north of the Equator in the Pacific, at that time expressly reserved the island of Yap for future consideration and action?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I do not doubt that at all.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then, has not there been a violation of the trust and confidence that we had a right to have in those four powers when they proceed immediately afterwards to do something they had agreed with our country not to do?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator may not have as high an opinion of them as otherwise, but they had no power in the supreme war council.

Mr. PITTMAN. Did they not have the power of recommendation?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No. According to the terms of their own agreement that they signed, and which is on the Senator's desk before him now, it was the council of the League of Nations that controlled this matter.

Mr. PITTMAN. But the council of the League of Nations recognized the fact that the allied and associated powers were granted the right under article 118 to allocate the mandates, and that the council would subsequently determine the terms.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; the council of the League of Nations did not recognize that.

Mr. PITTMAN. It is recognized in express terms in the treaty with Austria.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was not the council of the League of Nations that recognized it; it was the signatory powers who signed the treaty at the peace table who wrote it in the treaty. The council of the League of Nations was an entirely subsequent matter. I do not doubt for a minute, I know it is a fact, that the then President of the United States, Mr. Wilson, expected to have the island of Yap set apart under this mandate as an international island for the use of all the powers in the treaty. I have not a doubt about that. But when the hour came for us to make our claim that the island of Yap should be internationalized, we were not there. We made no claim. It had gone to the wreckage.

Mr. PITTMAN. Great Britain, as I remember, ratified the treaty first. Suppose the day after she had ratified the treaty with Germany, or the minute the league was created, and before France had an opportunity to ratify the treaty, Great Britain had run in there, without France and the United States having representation on the council of the league, and had allocated all of the conquered territory, and then said to us that we were not there and had forfeited our rights. In other words, to take the position of the Senator, as I see it, he has to hold that if we did not ratify the treaty just as fast as the 30 or 40 other nations did, those nations, before we had time to ratify it, could have cut us out of consideration.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I do not agree to that at all, and it was not done in this case.

Mr. PITTMAN. It was done before we acted on the Versailles treaty.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator has the dates before him. It was done December 17, 1920.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The vote in the Senate on the ratification of the treaty took place in November, 1919. The final vote in the Senate, when, instead of rejecting the treaty in so many words by a vote of the Senate, we sent it back to the President of the United States, which was a rejection, took place somewhere in the early months, January, February, or March, of 1920, and this allocation occurred in the fall of that year. So we had rejected the treaty. We rejected it by returning it to the White House.

Mr. PITTMAN. There was no rejection of the treaty, so far as France, Great Britain, Japan, and Germany were concerned, until this Government had acted one way or the other, and notified those powers. Now, this Government never notified those powers of anything until we ratified a separate treaty of peace with Germany, and when we did ratify that treaty we adopted all the benefits of the Versailles treaty.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think my friend is right about that. I think we could reject the treaty by action of the Senate, and that the powers who were dealing with us would not have to wait an indefinite period, until we had sent them an official communication, to find out what we had done.

I think when the Senate of the United States—

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I shall do so in just one moment. I think when the Senate of the United States, as a part of the treaty-making power of the United States, rejects a treaty that those who are dealing with us can take knowledge of the fact without waiting for the information to come through official channels.

Mr. JOHNSON. I merely wish to inquire if the Senator from Alabama has the dates of the various decisions which have been made respecting the mandated islands?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The mandate in reference to Yap, as set out in the memorandum of Secretary Hughes, as read by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] a moment ago, was some time in the fall of 1920.

Mr. ROBINSON. The final decision was in December, 1920. That was by the league council.

Mr. JOHNSON. May 17, 1919, I think, was the first allocation.

Mr. ROBINSON. That was the first allocation or proposal of the supreme council.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then there was a subsequent allocation. The allocation of May 17, 1919, as the Senator from Nevada stated, was prior to any action by us upon the treaty.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is true. The final decision by the league council was made on December 17, 1920, but the first action respecting the matter was in May, 1919, by the council of four, usually called the supreme council.

Mr. PITTMAN. It was on May 19, 1919.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not remember the date when the Versailles treaty was sent back to the White House, but I think it was before the date in 1920 to which reference has been made, although I am not sure. My recollection, however, is that it was some time in February or March.

Mr. ASHURST. The Versailles treaty was finally rejected on the 19th of March, 1920. I do not think it was sent to the White House that night, but it was sent early the next morning.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is what I thought. I am not here, however, to argue that question; it is immaterial, in my judgment. I say that when we sent the treaty back to the White House it was a rejection of it, and the other nations had a right to take into consideration the fact that the treaty had been rejected. If they were acting as trustees they had a perfectly legitimate right to go on and administer the trust. So far as I know they made no attempt to do so until after the Senate had sent the treaty back to the White House; and that is the material question.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the Senator that the Senate had that matter before it for some six months, and it could not expect the world to stand still while we were discussing here for an indefinite time the question of ratifying the treaty. They had a right to make a guess, and they made a very good guess that we were not going to ratify it.

Mr. PITTMAN. Is it assumed here that the supreme council of the war powers when they were considering the allocation of those islands were acting without any authority?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; they were acting under the authority of the League of Nations.

Mr. PITTMAN. When the League of Nations appointed five trustees, one of whom was the United States, and the other four powers recognized the United States as one of the trustees, one of the allied and associated powers, is it fair and just, because it did not sign a specific treaty, to say that it shall not participate or be considered in the distribution of conquered territory?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator looks at the proposition, as I said before, from the standpoint that this territory was conquered and was to be distributed between the five powers, of course that is a different question. I am not consenting to that at all.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. If I understand the Senator correctly, in the beginning of his statement he asserted the proposition that sovereignty by its nature is single.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is not divisible, though it may sometimes be exercised by two Governments.

Mr. ROBINSON. May it be exercised by more than one Government concurrently?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes, I think it could, if the process could be arranged.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then, if that is the case, why is not the position of the Senator from Massachusetts correct, that the United States, by virtue of conquest or otherwise, took an undivided one-fifth interest in these islands and became entitled to participate in the exercise of the sovereignty over the islands?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is contended that there is an undivided one-fifth interest, but I say there can not be an undivided one-fifth interest in sovereignty; there can not be a division of sovereignty; sovereignty is a concrete fact that must exist as it is. That, however, is not the material question.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think I understand the Senator. May I ask him a further question to illustrate the thought that is in my mind?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. To whom did the sovereignty over these islands pass from the German Government, and when and by virtue of what act did it pass?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the sovereignty passed over from the German Government by the treaty of Versailles to the allied and associated powers as trustees to administer the trust as mandates according to the terms of the League of Nations. That is all, I contend. If I am wrong about that, if the League of Nations did not have anything to do with it, if we were not a trustee, then all my argument is mere idle talk; but if I am right about it, that it did pass to the allied and associated powers to administer under the League of Nations, and then we refused to do our part and to administer the trust, I say we are estopped from having anything further to say about the administration of the trust.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course, if the title passed by act of conquest so that Germany could not control the sovereignty thereafter, all the parties to the conquest would have an interest in the territory conquered, and no parties to any subsequent agreement less than the whole number could deprive of such interest any one of those to whom such rights passed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Unless the agreement so provided—and of course the agreement could do that—and that is what I am contending for.

Mr. ROBINSON. But the United States was not a party to that agreement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; but title passed under that agreement.

Mr. ROBINSON. Wait a moment. No; the title had already passed by conquest. The United States and the other allied and associated powers had acquired these islands by conquest. No agreement between some of the conquerors could deprive the United States of such rights as she acquired by conquest, whatever they may be, and it does not become necessary for the purpose of my argument to define those rights.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In the first place, the argument of my friend from Arkansas, if he will allow me to conclude, is purely theoretical. We have no rights over these islands by conquest, because we never conquered them. If the assumption is based on the right of conquest, Japan conquered them and the title had passed out of Germany before we ever became an associated power. We had nothing to do with them if the title came from that source. The only way that we became involved in the title at all was by reason of becoming an associated power. We never had a gunboat in front of the islands or a marine on their shores. The only way that we became recognized in any way was through the treaty of Versailles, and that is the only title that we could make any claim to. What I am contending is that the title, whatever it is, came to us as trustee, and we declined to act. Now—

Mr. ROBINSON. Just a moment. The Senator's contention would inevitably lead to the conclusion that the United States neither acquired any title nor any interest in the islands because she never became a party to the instrument by which the title was conveyed, and there is no privity between her and the party conveying title. So the Senator's conclusion must be, if his argument be followed to its logical end, that the United States never acquired any right, title, or interest in these islands for the reason that she did not participate in their conquest, and for the further reason, as asserted by the Senator from Alabama, that the only way in which the title was conveyed was through the treaty of Versailles, to which the United States refused to become a party.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly; I did not raise any question about that. The Senator is clearly right about it. I am sure he is right as a lawyer about it, and I will illustrate to him—

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to say that I do not agree to that conclusion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will illustrate my view of it.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator will permit me for a moment, I am not stating my conclusions; I am stating what I understand to be the Senator's conclusions.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then the Senator is right in drawing that conclusion as mine. If I own a piece of land in Washington and leave a will conveying it to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], as trustees, to administer for my heirs, and the Senator from Arkansas declines to have anything to do with the trust, and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] qualifies as trustee, there is no doubt in my mind that the Senator from Arkansas takes no title whatever. I say the same principle applies in this matter. My contention is that under the treaty of Versailles Germany ceded her overseas possessions to the allied and associated powers as trustees; any man who reads the treaty, in my judgment, can come to no other conclusion than that it was ceded to them as trustees. If we decline to administer the trust, then we take no part in it. We had a right to decline to administer the trust, and the Government of our country did decline to administer it, and therefore we had no more rights in the matter, but those who did administer the trust selected Japan as a mandatory and conveyed such title to her as a mandatory has. There can be no question about that. We did not function in the matter because we declined to function. I am not going into the argument as to whether we ought to have functioned or we ought not to have functioned; that is water that has gone over the wheel, and there is no use going into past history about it.

The real thing that is to be considered is that we did not function; we declined to act; and those who had the power to act gave this mandate to Japan. If they did—and there is no doubt that they did—Japan is in possession; she is recognized by those powers that are in the League of Nations; she is recognized by the council of the League of Nations; she gets her title in that way and she will hold it in that way. There is no way that we could take it away from her except by going to war with the world, because it is the League of Nations which is holding this title; Japan is only the mandatory, the agent, of the League of Nations. If we should attempt to take it away from Japan, we would be taking it away from the sacred trust in which it was reposed, taking it away from the nations that belong to the League of Nations, and we would have the world to fight. Everybody knows that we are not going to fight the world over the isle of Yap.

Mr. NORRIS. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. If that be true, this question has arisen in my mind: Assuming that the title is really in the League of Nations and that Japan is only an agent to carry it out in the way of a mandate—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. An agent exercising some sovereignty temporarily.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but she is acting for the League of Nations.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Then how can Japan, being only an agent, give any sovereignty or any other rights to the United States? Ought not the treaty, then, to be made with the persons who hold the real title, rather than with the trustee?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That may or may not be true. The trustee holds the title and the trustee is in possession, and what we want is possession. More than that, there are two practical questions involved here. We are theorizing. This whole debate about the Yap treaty has consisted of theories about our giving up something. What I contend is that we had nothing to give up. They are theorizing about the proposition that we are confirming the title, when we had no title to confirm. It has already been confirmed in Japan by the trustees that possessed the title.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Just a minute and I will yield. The practical proposition is that Japan is in possession of the mandated islands north of the Equator and that when this treaty is made she will give us the right to a cable landing.

Mr. NORRIS. Which she has not any authority to do.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. She might not have the authority to surrender sovereignty, but she is acting as a sovereign mandatory, and she has a right to give us permission to buy land.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to say to the Senator, if he will permit me, that I do not regard the treaty as of very great importance. I would not take all these islands, including Yap, if they would give them to me, and I think everybody is going to acquiesce in the treaty. There is no objection on the part of the people; but if we wanted to be real technical, I do not believe that Japan has any authority to grant us any of the rights that she has granted in this treaty. I suppose that those who do have the authority are going to acquiesce in it; and, if they do, whatever title there is will probably be good.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, somebody has to exercise the authority. Japan is exercising sovereignty and has the right to say, "You can build a railroad; you can put in docks and wharves," and she certainly can say, "You can land a cable." I agree with the Senator, however; I do not think there is anything very material here except a cable landing.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. Let me call attention to a few dates. I want the attention also of the Senator from Nebraska.

On May 1, 1919, the supreme council was in session. The minutes of the council show that. At that meeting, under the provisions of article 118 of the Versailles treaty, the representatives of the allied and associated powers were in session for the purpose of allocating the mandates. The question of the allocation of the German islands north of the Equator was then under consideration. The minutes of that meeting disclose the fact that the President of the United States was not opposed to the allocation of those islands to Japan under a mandate, with the exception of the island of Yap; and, according to those minutes, it was then agreed, on May 1, 1919, that for the time being the island of Yap should be excluded from those mandates.

On May 19 following the minutes of the supreme council disclose the fact that the islands formerly owned by Germany north of the Equator were allocated to Japan under a mandate, subject to the action of the council.

It is evident from the correspondence with the allied powers that on May 19 they either simply forgot to exclude the island of Yap or the minutes fail to show it; but, in any event, it is evident that a mutual mistake was made on the 19th of May, two weeks following the exclusion of the island of Yap. Great Britain and France do not deny that; but they have answered our Government and simply said to us, as you will see from the notes, that they are sorry that a misunderstanding took place, and that we should now look to Japan to correct it.

There is one thing that is a fact, and that is that the United States was recognized at that time as having a right to participate in the allocation of those mandates. There is no doubt of that. It was recognized by the other powers.

Let us say, for instance, that the President did agree that the island of Yap should go with the other islands in the mandate. As the President himself says, at that time the terms of the mandate were not disclosed; and this country, if it was recognized as having the authority to join in the allocation of the mandate, certainly had the implied authority to join in the terms of the mandate. It was understood in May with regard to all of these German islands that while they were going to be allocated to Japan, the particular terms of the mandate should be considered later, and that the United States should be a participant in that consideration; but it was not a participant in that consideration. It knew nothing about the terms of the mandate until the Council of the League of Nations had ratified it; and from that time on the former administration and the present administration have protested that that mandate could not exist without the United States concurring in its terms. Japan knows that that mandate is not worth the paper it is written on, or Japan would not be here to-day seeking to have us ratify it.

We should grant a mandate to Japan. It should be a trust; but the terms of that trust should be agreed to by the United States, and they never have been agreed to. If, however, we agree to this treaty, then we agree to the terms of the mandate that both administrations have protested against since the very time it was first published.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I am glad to have my friend make his statement, but I do not think it affects this situation one particle—not a particle—because the treaty of Versailles was signed on the 28th day of June, 1919, and while I have no doubt at all that the conversations and memoranda to which the Senator is referring are all true, they were merely the preliminary understandings in the process of making a treaty. The Senator knows as well as I do that, although those preliminary notes might be used in the interpretation of the treaty, they could not be used in contravention of the treaty; and although at the time he refers to, in May of 1919, the allied and associated powers were probably considering putting the mandates of this territory into the treaty of Versailles as a direct treaty provision, subsequently they provided for a mandate under a League of Nations; so that anything that occurred before the 20th day of June does not affect the situation a particle.

There is no dispute about Mr. Wilson's position. I know it. I agree with the Senator. Mr. Wilson wanted this island internationalized, and that is the only thing he cared about or anybody else cared about. There is nothing to the proposition. He wanted it internationalized to protect our own people. I do not care anything about the reasons that are given in this treaty as to why the Secretary of State had approached the subject. I admit that he has approached the consideration of the subject from a different standpoint than I do; but he has secured from Japan the identical thing that President Wilson contended we were entitled to have. What do we care about the mandates of the other islands? We once refused the title to them. They are not important to us. We would not take the burden now if it were offered to us, either the direct sovereignty or the mandatory rights over them.

Mr. PITTMAN. Have we the right to erect aerial transmission lines on the island of Yap under this treaty?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. So I understand.

Mr. PITTMAN. The treaty does not so read. It expressly states that we shall not do so so long as Japan conducts a radio station there, and she has one there now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is a side question, not of any very great moment, but I will tell the Senator what my viewpoint is about it. I do not regard it as of moment, and I will tell the Senator why. We are given the right to establish radio telegraph stations on the island of Yap whenever we think the Japanese Government is not giving us adequate service. As there is no limitation on the term "adequate service," of course we have the right to determine that ourselves, and nobody else has. As I say, however, it is utterly unimportant, and I will explain to the Senator in a moment why it is.

What we wanted was a cable station. That is important, because we must have a landing place to start on with that cable to China, and that is of real commercial value. I suppose they put in the treaty the right about a cable station on the island of Yap because we were preserving our rights. We have a cable station now in China, within a few hundred miles of this island of Yap. We have radio stations on the Pacific coast that throw their radio messages clear across the Pacific. We do not have to relay them. It would be an utterly useless waste of money for the Government of the United States to build a radio station on the island of Yap, because there is no commerce to be gotten there. I do not remember the number of people living there, but it is only a few hundred.

Mr. KING. Eight thousand.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Eight thousand. They are ignorant people, poor people, without any commerce; certainly not the class of people to send radio messages. The only purpose in the world that a radio station could accomplish there would be to notify our naval vessels, all of which can be done from the radio station in China right now.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then why does Japan expressly prohibit us from building a radio station there as long as she is maintaining one?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not construe the treaty in that way. My friend from Nevada puts upon it a different construction from mine. My construction is that we have the right to build a radio station, but we say to Japan that we will not do it as long as she gives us satisfactory service.

Mr. PITTMAN. This is the language:

Provided, however, That so long as the Government of Japan shall maintain on the island of Yap an adequate radio-telegraphic station, cooperating effectively with the cables and with other radio stations on ships or on shore, without discriminatory exactions or preferences, the exercise of the right to establish radio-telegraphic stations on the island by the United States or its nationals shall be suspended.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In other words, we say that, but who is to determine it? The United States is, of course.

Mr. PITTMAN. What would be the result if there were a protest against the Japanese communications with the Orient, as there have been for several months, and we should start to build on that island? Would it not be a source of trouble from the very beginning?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I have not a doubt in the world that Japan construes that treaty as all treaties are construed. The determination of the event is not fixed in the treaty. When it is for the right or benefit of one of the parties, the parties to it determine it. As they grant us the right to erect a radio station, we would have the perfect right to determine when that event should take place. There is no doubt in my mind about that. I realize that the Senator does not agree with me about it.

Mr. PITTMAN. Does not the Senator think these things should be definite and that where there is a probable cause of dispute somebody should be designated to settle that dispute and determine it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the best way, in this case of the building of a radio station, is to leave it as it is—that is, that the United States Government determine it for itself. But it is not important. It evidently was put in there to retain a right. It is absolutely unimportant.

Mr. PITTMAN. If we want to land additional cables on that island, how are we to get a landing site?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand this treaty, we are entitled, if the treaty means anything at all, to land our cables, to acquire a site even by condemnation, and the Japanese Government agrees to recognize that power. It is to have the entire control and possession of the territory, but we are to decide where our cables are landed and where we carry on our operations, without let or hindrance from anybody.

Mr. PITTMAN. I read it very much as the Senator does, with this exception. Japan is not required to use her power of expropriation to get us the landing sites, except as "shall be arranged between the two Governments according to the requirements of each case." If Japan disagrees with us with regard to the decision we make as to where the cables shall be landed, then she is not under obligation to use the power of condemnation.

Mr. OVERMAN. In what position will we be if we do not ratify this treaty? If we had to make another treaty with Japan, Japan being in possession, in what position would we be?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is what I was coming to. I was about to complete my argument. There is nothing in what I have to say about this treaty, unless I am right about the matter, that these German overseas possessions were conveyed to the allied and associated powers as trustees, and that under that trusteeship the only powers who accepted the trusteeship, acting under it, gave the mandate to Japan, who has been in possession since she took them away from Germany. We are not going to war to oust her. We do not confirm her title by signing this treaty, because she already has a title we are not going to interfere with, and do not want to. I have not a doubt in the world that if somebody tried to force us to take these little islands which dot the Pacific, and govern them, we would refuse to do it.

As my friend from Nevada said, Mr. Wilson, when President of the United States, indicated his desire that this island of Yap should be internationalized, so that we could use it for the landing of a cable which we owned. The other powers expressed their regret that they had overlooked that wish, but said, "We have already mandated these islands to Japan, and you must go to Japan to get what you want."

Our Government, through the Secretary of State, went to the Government of Japan, and Japan grants us all we ask and all we need with reference to the landing of this cable. There is nothing else in the treaty, in my judgment.

If we reject the treaty, we will have a loose cable out in the Pacific. I believe its end is still on the island of Yap, but I think it could be ordered off if we do not ratify this treaty, and we certainly would not have any right to connect it up with a cable connecting with China, as we want to do. We certainly have no right in the world to do that, unless we ratify this treaty.

Mr. PITTMAN. We have a right to build from China to Yap, have we not?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We have no rights except under this treaty.

Mr. PITTMAN. Of course, if the Senator is going to put us in the position of a suppliant to Japan, then everything he says is true. I have read all the arguments I could find in favor of Japan, but I have never heard the argument the Senator is making to-day, that Japan owns this island and that we have to beg her for some rights. Let me read what the former President of the United States said, through his Secretary of State, in regard to that, because the Senator has been agreeing with the former President so far. President Wilson, through his Secretary of State, on February 21, 1921, in his address to the Council of the League of Nations, said:

While this Government has never assented to the inclusion of the island of Yap in the proposed mandate to Japan, it may be pointed out that even if one or more of the other principal allied and associated powers were under a misapprehension as to the inclusion of this island in the reported decision on May 7, 1919, nevertheless the notes above mentioned of the Government of the United States make clear the position of this Government in the matter.

At the time when the several notes were addressed to the respective Governments above mentioned a final agreement had not been reached as to the terms and allocation of mandates covering the former German islands in the Pacific.

Therefore the position taken in the matter by the President on behalf of this Government, and clearly set forth in the notes referred to, necessarily had the result of effectively withdrawing any suggestion or implication of asset, mistakenly imputed to this Government, long before December 17, 1920, the date of the council's meeting at Geneva.

As one of the principal allied and associated powers, the United States has an equal concern and an inseparable interest with the other principal allied and associated powers in the overseas possessions of Germany, and concededly an equal voice in their disposition, which it is respectfully submitted can not be undertaken or effectuated without its assent. The Government of the United States therefore respectfully states that it can not regard itself as bound by the terms and provisions of said mandate and desires to record its protest against the reported decision of December 17 last of the Council of the League of Nations in relation thereto, and at the same time to request that the council, having obviously acted under a misapprehension of the facts, should reopen the question for the further consideration which the proper settlement of it clearly requires.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. From what is the Senator reading?

Mr. PITTMAN. I am reading from Mr. Colby's note to the Council of the League of Nations under date of February 21, 1921, setting forth the position of the President of the United States. In the face of that position, taken by our former administration and by the President of the party to which the Senator then belonged and now belongs, the Senator stands upon the floor of the Senate and says, "All that I see is that Japan yields the United States certain rights."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is all I do see, and I do not think there is any doubt about it. The Senator says I am putting the United States in the position of going and begging this from Japan. Did we beg anything from Great Britain when we asked certain concessions in the northern Atlantic in the way of rights to our fishermen to get bait and supplies, which were granted by treaty rights, and which we insisted on for many years? Do other powers, when they want certain commercial concessions in the United States, beg for them? No; they ask for them, and they get them as a matter of comity between nations. Mr. Colby is entitled to his viewpoint, but it was only Mr. Colby's viewpoint.

Mr. PITTMAN. Was it not the President's viewpoint, too?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not know whether it was the President's viewpoint or not. That is something about which I am not informed.

Mr. PITTMAN. He certainly said that it was.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. He had to make that statement, as he was speaking as the head of the Government. It was Colby's viewpoint. I say that any man who looks at this treaty can come to but one conclusion, in my judgment, if he takes the ordinary rules of interpretation, and that is that the title passed according to the terms of the treaty, not on what somebody said on the inside or the outside, but according to the terms.

The title to these German possessions was conveyed as a sacred trust, to be administered by the League of Nations, and under that administration the title has been conveyed to Japan, and the declaration of this treaty does not strengthen or weaken the title of Japan one bit. We give Japan nothing; and that is susceptible of proof. If we decline to ratify this treaty, will Japan still continue to exercise the mandate over these islands or not?

Mr. PITTMAN. That is exactly the question. There is only one thing I see in the whole argument, and that is fear, nothing but fear. You are afraid not to accept what Japan offers for fear you could not get more unless you had trouble. That is the whole argument.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, I know my friend comes from Nevada, and the idea on the Pacific coast has always been that there was danger from Japan, and I am not critical of that. Probably, if I lived there, I would have the same apprehension; but that is a purely local viewpoint. The balance of the people of the United States have not been apprehensive we were going to war with Japan all the time, and that anything we did would involve us in hostilities with Japan. I regret that this treaty should be considered from that standpoint, because if it is considered from that standpoint by all Senators they will reject it, of course.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, by remaining silent I do not want the Senator to think I am committed to the proposition that I am arguing this question as I do because of fear of the Japanese Government or by reason of prejudice against the Japanese people. I do not think there is anything in my argument so far which has indicated that. There is only one thing we are afraid of in regard to the Japanese people, and that is we are afraid they think we are afraid. We are afraid also to have any contract between the two peoples that is not extremely definite, because of the inability of the Japanese people sometimes to understand agreements unless they are very definite.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, I think all international agreements should be very definite. If they are not, they are likely to cause trouble.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. A little while ago the Senator had reached a point in his argument which I think is probably the most important question connected with this whole matter; that is, as to what we are to get from Japan under this treaty. The Senator said that the treaty granted us everything we wanted, everything we had asked for, everything that it was valuable for us to have in connection with the island of Yap, namely, the right to establish there radio stations.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The main right is the right of cable communication.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, cable communication and radiotelegraphic stations. The Senator is correct in his statement that the treaty grants that right in express terms, but the treaty then proceeds to qualify that grant. It imposes limitations upon that grant. It imposes conditions in the nature of a defeasance. Unless those conditions occur the right to erect a radio station would not exist under the treaty.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suppose the Senator was not in the Chamber when I was discussing that question with the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I was here, and that is the reason why I am asking the Senator the question. I am making these preliminary statements in order to make my position clear. I am apprehensive that the condition of defeasance provided in the treaty is so broad and so obscure that it may practically render the grant of the right nugatory and of no value. The Senator has read the condition, but I want to read it to make my question clear. After granting the United States this right there follows this proviso:

Provided, however, That so long as the Government of Japan shall maintain on the island of Yap an adequate radiotelegraph station co-operating effectively * * * the right to establish a radiotelegraphic station on the island by the United States or its nationals shall be suspended.

Now, the Senator knows very well that a remedy without a means of enforcement is no remedy at all. A right without a means of enforcement is no right at all. The Senator says that the United States under this proviso has the sole and exclusive right, if I understand him, to determine the question whether Japan is maintaining an adequate radiotelegraph station. If the Senator is right about that, then, of course, there is nothing in what I am saying; but is the Senator right about that?

If the language used had been "so long as the Government of Japan shall maintain on the island of Yap a satisfactory radiotelegraph station," then undoubtedly the United States would have been the sole judge as to whether that station afforded adequate facilities; but where it uses the words "so long as Japan shall maintain an adequate radiotelegraphic station," I think it leaves it very doubtful as to whether the United States would have the right to determine, according to its own judgment, the question whether the station maintained by Japan was adequate or not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is the Senator ready for me to answer his question?

Mr. SIMMONS. If it had been intended that the United States should settle this question for itself, it seems to me it ought to have stated it. It would have been very easy for it to have been stated or to have been made clear by using the word "satisfactory"; but it does not use the word "satisfactory"; it uses the word "adequate" referring to the radiotelegraphic station. Who is to determine whether it is adequate or not? The Senator says the United States. I hope he is correct. I am inclined to think he is not correct. If the Senator is correct, then who is to decide that question? Japan and the United States in conference? If that is the way of deciding it, then there must be mutual assent that the radiotelegraph station is inadequate.

Can it be said that it is the five powers who are to determine it? It can not be the five powers, because they have nothing to do with the treaty. This is a treaty exclusively between Japan and the United States. It seems to me that the Senator, while he has expressed himself with great positiveness about this matter, ought probably to look more closely into that question, because it is a very important question as to whether Japan and the United States must jointly agree that it is inadequate, or whether the United States may determine that it is inadequate, or whether Japan may itself determine that it is inadequate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I shall be glad to answer the Senator's question, though I do not like to interrupt him.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not interrupted the Senator in any captious spirit. I am really troubled about it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am really troubled about it. I think it is a very serious question. I was a little disappointed when the Senator dismissed it a little while ago simply by the ipse dixit of his own reference to it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am glad to yield to the Senator. I have held the floor much longer than I intended or wanted to hold it, because I have yielded to my brother Senators so frequently. I wish to conclude now, as I desire to yield the floor, but I am glad to make my answer to the Senator on this question.

In the first place, as I said, I wish the Senator to understand that I do not regard the radio provision as of any real value, as we have a radio station in China, we have one in Hawaii, and we have one in the Pacific.

Mr. SIMMONS. Pardon me; if this is of no value, then what is there in the treaty that is of any value?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is the cable landing which is of great commercial value. I do not regard this of any real value, but that is not an answer to the Senator's question.

If I understand the English language, I think this clause answers itself very clearly. It reads:

Provided, however, That so long as the Government of Japan shall maintain on the island of Yap an adequate radiotelegraphic station, cooperating effectively with the cables and with other radio stations on ships or on shore, without discriminatory exactions or preferences, the exercise of the right to establish radiotelegraphic stations on the island by the United States or its nationals shall be suspended.

When it says "adequate," does it mean adequate for China, Great Britain, or France? Certainly not. When the question is whether it is adequate or not, and the suspension of our building a station depends on the adequacy of the service, it could not possibly mean adequacy of service to the five powers. Could it mean adequacy of service to Japan? No. It can not mean Japan, because Japan will regulate the question of adequacy of her own service to herself. When it uses the term "adequacy of service," it can not mean anything else but adequacy of service to the nationals and Government of the United States.

Mr. SIMMONS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, if it is adequacy of service to the people of the United States or to our Government, how could Japan determine whether we were getting adequate service? How could she know whether we were getting adequate service? There would be no way in which Japan could ascertain whether we were getting—

Mr. SIMMONS. But suppose that—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the Senator please allow me to answer his argument?

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall be glad to do so, of course.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. How could Japan know we were not getting adequate service unless we notified her? Therefore, the determination whether the service is adequate or not, according to the terms of the treaty, must rest within the United States. It leaves us, when we say the service is not adequate, to take action ourselves. It seems to me it is just as clear and just as plain as human language can make it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Undoubtedly the word "adequacy" there refers to adequate service to the United States. There can be no question about it. Undoubtedly the Senator is right that the United States would be the party that would make complaint, but when the United States makes the complaint that the service is not adequate Japan may answer, "You are mistaken, the service is adequate." Who is to settle that question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, well, of course, Japan first agreed with us that if the service is not adequate we can build our own station, so all we have to do is to go and build a station according to contract, and that ends it unless Japan repudiates her contract, and that I do not assume she will do.

Mr. SIMMONS. Japan provides that we shall not build these stations if the service is adequate—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no.

Mr. SIMMONS. The right to build is suspended.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Japan does not provide it. We have agreed, and that is what makes it so clear. We have been granted the right, and we agree that we will suspend our right as long as we get adequate service.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; Japan has granted us a right. Japan has conferred upon us a right, and we recognize Japan's right to control the matter.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. The treaty recognizes Japan's right to control the matter because we are accepting a favor from Japan with reference to this. In other words, we are accepting at the hands of Japan the right, first, to build the radiotelegraphic station. Japan, who grants us that right, attaches a condition to it, and the condition is that as long as she furnishes us adequate facilities and does not discriminate, the right she has granted is suspended. Japan certainly has as much right to determine whether she has complied with her promise as we have to determine whether she has failed to comply with her promise. In that condition of things there must be some authority or tribunal outside of these two disputants to determine as to which is right about it, whether Japan has complied with her promise to give us adequate service, or whether she has failed to comply with her promise to give us adequate service.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not agree. If the Senator will allow me to conclude, I shall be glad to yield the floor to him.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will not interrupt the Senator any further.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If I make a contract with the Senator to sell him a barrel of apples and he has to carry them off I think he has a right to come and get them from my store or place of business whenever he gets ready. He has the determination as to when he will come and get the apples, and not myself.

Japan agrees here to grant us a right. We agree to suspend the right as long as a certain thing takes place—that is, the granting of adequate service. It is as clear to my mind as the sound of a bell that when the right has been granted and we agree to the suspension the control of the suspension is not in the hands of Japan but with us. We have a right to exercise and enforce our right whenever we determine that we are not getting adequate service. Although I had nothing to do with the making of this treaty, I have no doubt that that is the full understanding of those who negotiated it. However, I do not regard the radio proposition as of any importance whatever except as a mere claim of right, because our radio sparks jump around the world, and, in my judgment, it would be a waste of money for us to erect a radio station on Yap when we have one in China, a few hundred miles away. If we are going to erect a radio station in that neighborhood we had better put it on our own soil in the Philippines.

The single thing in this treaty which is of any value is the right to control a landing for a cable which belongs to us. If we reject the treaty we lose that right, and if we ratify the treaty we secure that right. In my judgment, that is all there is in the treaty.

Mr. JOHNSON obtained the floor.

Mr. NEW. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the Senator to not make that suggestion. I desire to proceed.

Mr. NEW. Very well.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Indiana did suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. JOHNSON. Pardon me. I do not yield.

Mr. President, I do not propose to indulge in any extended answer to the very interesting and rather bizarre argument that has been presented by the Senator from Alabama. It is rather too late, in my opinion, sir, at this time to repudiate the action of two administrations and two Secretaries of State. Not only is it too late to repudiate what two administrations have done, but, after all, the source of the title or the source of the rights of either Japan or our country is exactly the same. The source of Japan's rights is no better, no higher, than is ours. Both arise from the same circumstances; and a realization of that fact will demonstrate very readily the vice of the argument that has been indulged in by the Senator from Alabama.

I am glad, Mr. President, that we may discuss this little treaty without being subjected to the epithets or the stinging adjectives that come to us from some of the advocates of peace and disarmament. We are permitted in the case of this treaty, I assume, because it is no part of the work of the disarmament conference, because it is wholly unconnected with what was done by our representatives there, to proceed with its discussion in the usual and orderly fashion, without being subjected to what we shall be subjected to, doubtless, in the future when we come to discuss the new quadruple alliance. I am glad that it is announced by the leader upon the Republican side and by the leader upon the Democratic side as well that this treaty had naught to do with the disarmament conference; that our delegates did not in any degree negotiate it; that it is, indeed, apart from the work which recently has been done in the city of Washington and is substantially unconnected with it.

The treaty, perhaps, Mr. President, is inconsequential. I do not care much for the island of Yap, and I presume that there are very few others in our country who care much for that particular isle. The treaty is inconsequential in nearly every aspect to me, but it has one aspect of importance, and because it has that one aspect of importance, and because it is the prelude, it is the dismal prologue to what will come to us within a very few days, I want, in the interest of historical accuracy, of intellectual clarity, perhaps of intellectual honesty, to review the facts.

It is important to us, Mr. President, because this treaty is the initial bluff and the first surrender, and, being the initial bluff and the first surrender, though it be inconsequential, and though we might in our generosity and the consciousness of the rectitude of our intentions and our strength pass it by, yet we ought to know just exactly what it portends and just exactly what the facts are that lead up to it.

It is useless here to discuss sources of title, whether arising from the treaty of Versailles or arising out of the action of the council of four during their activities just prior to the ratification of the treaty of Versailles. It is useless for us to divide a hair twixt the north and the northwest side in talking of what the rights are, or were, under any of the decisions that were rendered either by the council of four, by the League of Nations, or under the Versailles treaty.

Japan acquired these islands, Mr. President—and the ugly truth must be faced—because Japan made secret agreements for the spoil of the Pacific Ocean just before we entered the great World War. Without those secret agreements which then were made and which the nations that were parties to the war believed it was their duty to carry out, there would not be any dispute to-day here over the isle of Yap or over any of the mandated islands of the Pacific Ocean. So let us dismiss the attenuated technicality as to whether or not we have one source of title and Japan another; whether Japan has a superior right and we an inferior right; whether, indeed, from the council of four or whether from the League of Nations a mandate in behalf of civilization has been accorded. All that may be of one kind or the other; but the ugly fact faces us, nevertheless, that Japan gets the island of Yap and Japan gets the other mandated isles in the Pacific Ocean, not because of a legitimate title, or of a legitimate determination, but she gets those islands because of a stealthy piece of duplicity in the matter of secret agreements that were entered into just prior to the time when we became a party to the war.

You recall, Mr. President, that just before we went into the World War these secret agreements were made; you recall that Japan had been a party to the war for some years prior to that time. You remember that along in the early part of 1917 Japan addressed communications to the other nations with which she was allied, and you recall the replies that were made to Japan's request. You remember that this occurred just prior to our entry into the war, and when it was known the world over that it was more than likely—indeed, quite practically certain—that we were about to enter into the war. You recall, Mr. President, the peculiar wording of the communications which passed between Japan and Great Britain in relation to the isles of the Pacific. Oh, yes, Mr. President, Japan founds her title upon the holy League of Nations; Japan has her rights under the supreme council of the four powers, she asserts. Oh, yes, Mr. President, she insists that she derives from this concert that was in behalf of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man her title to the isles of the Pacific; but, after all, her real title, the real reason that she was given the isles in the Pacific, rests upon the agreements made in secrecy in 1917, and the agreements then entered into in secrecy were concealed from the Secretary of State of the United States and from the President of the United States and from the United States Government.

There is no chapter in history, Mr. President, that has to me such elements of tragedy and of humor as well as the secret dealing and those secret bargains, and in order that our record may show it, let me read the last communications which passed between the British Embassy on the one hand and the Japanese Government on the other. There is a naiveness about it that may cause a smile while arousing our indignation. The British ambassador, after the approaches had first been made by the Japanese, wrote to the Japanese minister of foreign affairs on February 16, 1917, as follows:

With reference to the subject of our conversation of the 27th ultimo, when your excellency informed me of the desire of the Imperial Government to receive an assurance that on the occasion of a peace conference of His Britannic Majesty's Government will support the claims of Japan in regard to the disposal of Germany's rights in Shantung and possessions in the islands north of the Equator, I have the honor, under instructions received from His Britannic Majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, to communicate to you the following message from His Britannic Majesty's Government:

"His Britannic Majesty's Government accede with pleasure to the request of the Japanese Government for an assurance that they will support Japan's claims in regard to the disposal of Germany's right in Shantung and possessions in the islands north of the Equator on the occasion of the peace conference, it being understood that the Japanese Government will in the eventual peace settlement treat in the same spirit Great Britain's claims to the German islands south of the Equator."

Then, on the 21st of February, 1917; the Japanese Government replied to this communication. This was sent a month and a half prior to our entry into the war. Obvious it was that we were going to become a part of this world conflict. Japan had been in the war for two and a half years. Our interest, we have recently been told repeatedly, lies in the Pacific Ocean; Japan's interest, we have recently been told again and again, lies in the Pacific Ocean; and just as we are about to become a part of the World War upon the side of Japan and Great Britain and France, Japan, France, Great Britain, and Italy arranged, Mr. President, for the disposition of the spoils situated in the Pacific Ocean that shall be derived from the war.

They dispose of it in these charming notes. Japan says in substance to Britain: "We trust that when the peace settlement comes you will agree with us that we shall have the islands north of the Equator." Britain in substance replies: "Why, certainly; we are delighted to accede to the request of Japan, of course Japan acceding to our request for the islands south of the Equator." Just after that, Mr. President, we saw here upon the dais, at the very chair that you, sir, occupy, the representative of Great Britain, the representative of Japan, the representative of France, the representative of Italy. We listened to their eloquent words. We learned how they were fighting this war just as we were, without hope of territory, without the desire to subjugate peoples, wishing only to preserve the world safe for democracy, and to aid in civilization's great struggle, all of them telling us then of their views just as we were stating ours, and not one of them, sir, saying to our President or our Secretary of State that already they had divided up the peoples of the earth and every particle of spoil and booty which might come out of the war.

Mr. President, it is well for us to remind ourselves of these things at this time. It is well that we should not forget them, because we are asked to do some things now upon the theory that we should never have a thought except that which may be given to us, and that the independent judgment which the Senate under the Constitution should exercise should be yielded without information, for that is denied us; without knowledge, for we have not it; but that it all shall be yielded to a superior wisdom and a superior judgment.

A man fooled once, Mr. President, may not blame himself; but if he be fooled a second time, under like circumstances, the blame entirely rests with him.

I am not speaking with undue suspicion to-day. I am not speaking with the desire of harrowing up the sacred feelings that some of our colleagues insist are theirs, and that we lack.

I am not speaking to-day, Mr. President, with the design of arousing prejudices, or even voicing prejudices of my own. I am speaking from the historical standpoint of what has occurred in the past, because from what has occurred in the past we may better know what to do in the present, and we may determine in a measure what we ought to do in the future.

Of course, it will be useless for anyone, in recalling what has happened, to insist that he does it with a desire that there may be adequate information for present or for future action. I realize, Mr. President, the penalty that a man pays to-day in this body, or in any political party, for independence. I realize to-day that in this body it is almost an impossibility for one to stand his ground for what he believes to be right without meeting with that sort of condemnation, with those epithets and those adjectives with which we have become familiar in the past, and that now are again being heaped upon individuals who hold views honestly varying from the views of those who may be in power.

Mr. President, I recall these historical incidents so that we may understand, and so that we may not forget what has happened in the past in dealing with what may happen in the next few days in this body.

Japan, therefore, I repeat, received these islands, not because Japan had a right to the islands, but because secretly the spoil in the Pacific was agreed upon by the various belligerents in the war. I pass, Mr. President, the various notes that were part of the negotiations with the other countries. It is unnecessary to deal with them; but the character of the negotiations, the actuating motives, are demonstrated by the two notes I have read, passing between Great Britain and Japan.

There is the genesis of the isles of the Pacific so far as Japan's rights or title may be concerned.

What are these islands? We have heard to-day, we heard from the leader upon the Republican side that they are of no consequence and of no importance. We have heard it stated that we abandoned them when we had an opportunity of taking them; that we do not care for them now, and that neither to us nor to any other nation do they possess any consequence at all. That may be so; I do not deny it; but I recall, Mr. President, that when we were before the President of the United States discussing the League of Nations there was one all-important subject upon which the leader on the Republican side interrogated Mr. Wilson, and that one all-important subject was the island of Yap. If my memory serves me correctly, sir, in all the world controversies that then existed, with all the matters of supreme consequence then impending, there was just one concerning which the leader upon the Republican side asked the President, and that was the island of Yap.

Unimportant these islands may be. They were of sufficient importance, Mr. President, to have the Empire of Japan secretly dicker for them just before we entered into the war. They may be all that the Senator from Alabama describes, or all that the Senator from Massachusetts said; they may be of such a character that we do not want to deal with them at all; but they were of sufficient value economically, they were of sufficient importance from the military standpoint for Japan to make them the basis of the secret agreements, and for England to exchange them for the islands south of the Equator; and they were of sufficient importance and sufficient consequence to have all of the allied powers stealthily conceal from us that they had bargained regarding them.

Mr. President, these islands consist of three groups—the Caroline Islands, the Marshall Islands, the Ladrões. I realize that our distinguished leader says "Ladrões," but I do not know exactly the authority for that pronunciation. The Caroline Islands have an area of about 560 square miles. My information is derived from the encyclopedias, and, of course, I assume it to be correct. They embrace 525 islands or islets. Their population is about 55,000. Their commerce formerly, of course, was mostly in the hands of the German Jaluit Co., which had stations on every important island.

In 1885 the German flag was raised over Yap. The dispute was submitted to the Pope as arbitrator. There must be some importance somewhere to these islands. As I shall show you later, two administrations deemed that some importance attached to them. In 1885 the Germans hoisted the German flag over Yap and the dispute following with Spain, the Pope was selected as arbitrator. He decided in favor of Spain, reserving special trade privileges to Germany. In 1899 Germany purchased for $3,300,000 the Caroline and the Pelew Islands, and all of the Ladrões but Guam.

The Marshall Islands have an area of about 154 square miles. Copra is the only commercial product. These islands were in possession of Germany from 1885 until the World War. The population in 1913 was estimated at 16,000.

The Ladrões consist of a group of 16 islands north of the Carolines, 1,500 miles east of the Philippines. Their area is about 250 square miles. They produce rice, sugar, maize, indigo, coffee, and tobacco. Their chief inhabitants, singularly enough, are settlers from Mexico and the Philippines, too. All except Guam were sold to Germany in 1899. Their estimated population is 15,000. Mr. President, these are the islands that are affected by this treaty. This treaty is a misnomer. This is not a treaty relating to Yap. This is a treaty confirming the Japanese title, under the secret agreements, to the isles of the Pacific north of the Equator. That is what this treaty is. Later I shall come to this boon that it is said we receive; but, sirs, in the first analysis of this treaty, bear in mind that under article 1 we confirm Japan in whatever title or rights, if you will—call it by whatever name you wish—we confirm Japan in whatever rights or title she may have in the islands north of the Equator that were accorded under the various mandates. That is article 1 of the treaty. Read it:

Subject to the provisions of the present convention, the United States consents to the administration by Japan, pursuant to the aforesaid mandate, of all the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator.

You say that we do not want them, and that we do not care for them, and that they are of no importance and of no value. They are a condition precedent, even in this so-called Yap treaty, to according us a right for a station for cables upon the island of Yap.

Yesterday there was a very illuminating part of the story of Ray Stannard Baker in the New York Times. It dealt, singularly enough at this particular period, with secret treaties. It was very interesting, because it showed what secret treaties were, and it showed, too, what all of us were familiar with, what President Wilson's position had been regarding secret treaties.

So that Senators may understand something of what these secret agreements were, I want to read just one extract relating to Serbia, and the secret treaty which dealt with that country. Serbia was our ally during the war, and therefore I present this portion of the particular article. Said the writer:

It would be impossible, for example, to understand the situation under which such small nations as Serbia and Rumania came into the conference, and the attitude, the duplicities of the great powers toward them, without knowing fully of the existence of the secret treaty with Rumania and of the manner in which it had been concealed even from Serbia, an ally then fighting to the limit of its ability against the Central Empires, and whose interests were directly affected by that treaty. Consider this colloquy, exhibiting one of the most shameless acts of the entire war, which took place in council of 10 soon after the conference opened (secret minutes, Jan. 31, 1919).

I pause, Mr. President, to suggest to the Senate that when the treaty of Versailles was under consideration request was made for all of the information concerning that treaty, and all of the minutes in relation to the activities of the various representatives assembled at Versailles. It seems to me I recall that we were denied the minutes, or perhaps it was said that there were no minutes of the meetings of the representatives of the powers. At any rate, the information was denied. I read with some astonishment now that a distinguished journalist is publishing what he designates the secret minutes of the proceedings of the meeting of the representatives of the powers who were assembled in France during the making of the treaty.

I recall, Mr. President, that the other day we asked for information concerning the four-power treaty. I recall that the information was denied us, and somewhat testily I was told that treaties could not be made by having a stenographer ever at the elbows of the negotiators, and that it would be an impossibility for negotiators ever to reach a conclusion if what they did was made a matter of record and kept for future consideration. Yet, Mr. President, we find 900 pages of the minutes of the meetings when the treaties were negotiated which are now being submitted to us, and we find the care with which we are told, and with which an anxious and an expectant posterity may read, the peculiar things which were said concerning those treaties.

We see in these minutes that carefully it has been preserved that Mr. So-and-so has said that the sentiments of the right honorable gentlemen do him infinite credit, and are a tribute to the lofty purposes which actuate his noble country. We can read that in the minutes, carefully preserved. We can read Mr. Root's words that there was an old nursery rhyme "leg after leg the dog went to Dover," and we and those who follow us can regale ourselves with gems like these in relation to unimportant treaties meticulously preserved by minutes, and not a single, solitary thing, unfortunately, has been preserved by minutes or written record of the four-power treaty, at least nothing that we can have.

I am sure there can not happen again such a singular instance as we observe in the publication of the serial of Mr. Baker, and that there never will be a time in the future when somebody again will reach into the strong box and publish the secret minutes of what transpired relating to the four-power treaty. That was possible in relation to the proceedings at Versailles, perhaps, but it is not possible in relation to any of the proceedings which recently transpired in Washington.

I follow now with the dialogue concerning which I read the instruction:

M. Vesnitch (the Serbian delegate) had heard with regret that the Rumanian delegation based their country's claim in part on the secret treaty of 1916. When this treaty was being negotiated, Serbia was fighting on the side of the Allies, without asking for any assurances, in the firm belief that after the war settlement would be made on the principles of justice, on the principles of the self-determination of nationalities, and in accordance with the promises of the Allies.

M. Clemenceau said that he was not aware that the treaty of 1916 had been secret.

M. Vesnitch replied that not only had the treaty never been published but that as a representative of a power fighting with the Allies, he had several times asked here in the ministry for foreign affairs to know the terms of the treaty. He had been told that the contents of the treaty could not be divulged.

M. Bratiano (the Rumanian delegate) stated that the discussion of the claims of Rumania had been begun in London in 1916, and had then been transferred to Petrograd as a place where examination of eastern questions could be more conveniently carried on, especially in regard to Serbia.

M. Pichon (the French minister of foreign affairs) then read the last paragraph of the treaty, which required the maintenance of its secrecy to the end of the war.

I am reading this merely in illustration of the fact not alone that there was this mode of disposition on the other side of the water, but that Senators may, in corroboration, have it in mind, in connection with what was done in the Pacific by Japan and her allies.

The President, Mr. Wilson, took a very firm position concerning these secret treaties. He said—he did not know and did not feel at liberty to ask whether France and Great Britain considered the treaty (the secret treaty of London) as consistent with the principles on which the peace treaty was being based. He was at liberty to say, however, that he himself did not. To discuss the matter on the basis of the pact of London would be to adopt as a basis a secret treaty. Yet he would be bound to say to the world that we were establishing a new order in which secret treaties were precluded. * * * The pact of London was inconsistent with the general principles of the settlement. He knew perfectly well that the pact of London had been entered into in quite different circumstances, and he did not wish to criticize what had been done. But to suggest that the decision should be taken on the basis of the treaty of London would draw the United States of America into an impossible situation.

Again, he declared upon a different occasion:

As the United States of America are not bound by any of the (secret) treaties in question they are quite ready to approve a settlement on a basis of facts.

Our associates in the war conceived that they were bound by the secret treaties, and because of that conception upon their part, they gave life, indeed, to the secret treaties regarding the Pacific, and yielded to Japan, first, in the council of four, and subsequently in the later proceedings, what they termed the mandate over these islands.

Japan has stood her ground ever since. Japan has stood upon her secret agreements, first, and the awards which were made, which really followed the secret agreements, after the war had been concluded. Japan has insisted that she was entitled to the islands in the Pacific. But what has been our position during that period?

As I said in the beginning, we derived our title from the same source from which Japan derived her title. She had no more right to the islands in the Pacific than the United States had to the islands in the Pacific. Each possessed, from exactly the same source and by reason of the same set of circumstances, certain rights—call it title, if you will—to those islands which Germany had north of the Equator. Neither had a paramount or a superior right over the other, and no council of four, no League of Nations, no treaty to which we were not a party, no gathering or association which did not deal with us, could, of course, dispose of our right or our title or affect that which belonged to us, and it was that position which was taken, first by a Democratic administration, and subsequently even more forcefully by a Republican administration.

I shall not read the various communications upon the subject which demonstrate the position of our Government. I ask, however, that I may insert in the RECORD the various communications, first, by the Democratic Secretary of State, and secondly, the letter of Secretary Hughes in April, 1921, upon the same subject.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The full text of the American note to the council of the League of Nations in Paris was made public by Secretary Colby on February 24. It read as follows:

FEBRUARY 21, 1921.

To the president and members of the council of the League of Nations:

GENTLEMEN: The Government of the United States has received information that the council of the League of Nations at its meeting which is to be held in Paris on this date (February 12) proposes to consider at length the subject of mandates, including their terms, provisions, and allocation, and accordingly takes this opportunity to deliver to the council of the League of Nations a copy of its note addressed, under date of November 20, 1920, to His Excellency Lord Curzon of Kedleston, the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in which the views of the United States are quite fully set forth regarding the nature of the responsibilities of mandatory powers.

The attention of the council of the League of Nations is particularly invited to the request therein made on behalf of this Government that the draft mandate forms intended to be submitted to the League of Nations be communicated to this Government for its consideration before submission to the council of the league, in order that the council might thus have before it an expression of the opinion of the Government of the United States on the form of such mandates and a clear indication of the basis upon which the approval of this Government, which is essential to the validity of any determinations which may be reached, might be anticipated and received.

It was, furthermore, stated in said note that the establishment of the mandate principle, a new principle in international relations, and one in which the public opinion of the world is taking special interest, would seem to require the frankest discussion from all pertinent points of view, and the opinion was expressed that suitable publicity should be given to the drafts of mandates which it is the intention to submit to the council, in order that the fullest opportunity might be afforded to consider their terms in relation to the obligations assumed by the mandatory powers and the respective interests of all Governments who deem themselves concerned or affected.

A copy of this note was transmitted to the Governments of France and Italy, requesting an interpretation by each Government of the provisions of the agreement between Great Britain, Italy, and France, signed at Sevres on August 10, 1920, relating to the creation of spheres of special interest in Anatolia, in the light of this Government's note to the British Government of November 20, 1920.

A reply has thus far been received only from the French Government, in which attention is directed to article 10 of the so-called Sevres treaty, which provides in favor of nationals of third powers for all economic purposes free access to the so-called zones of special interest.

THE PACIFIC MANDATE.

This Government is also in receipt of information that the council of the League of Nations at its meeting at Geneva on December 17 last approved, among other mandates, a mandate to Japan embracing "all the former German islands situated in the Pacific Ocean and lying north of the Equator." The text of this mandate to Japan, which was received by this Government, and which, according to available information, was approved by the council, contains the following statement:

"Whereas the principals of the allied and associated powers agreed that, in accordance with article 22, part 1 (covenant of the League of Nations) of the said treaty, a mandate should be conferred upon His Majesty the Emperor of Japan to administer the said islands and have proposed that the mandate should be formulated in the following terms," etc.

The Government of the United States takes this opportunity respectfully and in the most friendly spirit to submit to the president and members of the council of the league that the statement above quoted is incorrect and is not an accurate recital of the facts.

On the contrary, the United States, which is distinctly included in the very definite and constantly used descriptive phrase "the principal allied and associated powers," has not agreed to the terms or provisions of the mandate which is embodied in this text, nor has it agreed that a mandate should be conferred upon Japan covering all the former German islands situated in the Pacific Ocean and lying north of the Equator.

The United States has never given its consent to the inclusion of the island of Yap in any proposed mandate to Japan, but, on the other hand, at the time of the discussion of a mandate covering the former German islands in the Pacific north of the Equator, and in the course of said discussion, President Wilson, acting on behalf of this Government, was particular to stipulate that the question of the disposition of the island of Yap should be reserved for future consideration.

Subsequently this Government was informed that certain of the principal allied and associated powers were under the impression that the reported decision of the supreme council, sometimes described as the council of four, taken at its meeting on May 7, 1919, included or inserted the island of Yap in the proposed mandate to Japan.

This Government, in notes addressed to the Government of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan, has set forth at length its contention that Yap had, in fact, been excepted from this proposed mandate and was not to be included therein. Furthermore, by direction of President Wilson, the respective Governments above mentioned were informed that the Government of the United States could not concur in the reported decision of May 7, 1919, of the supreme council.

The information was further conveyed that the reservations which had previously been made by this Government regarding the island of Yap were based on the view that the island of Yap necessarily constitutes an indispensable part of any scheme or practicable arrangement of cable communication in the Pacific, and that its free and unhampered use should not be limited or controlled by any one power.

POSITION WAS MADE CLEAR.

While this Government has never assented to the inclusion of the island of Yap in the proposed mandate to Japan, it may be pointed out that even if one or more of the other principal allied and associated powers were under a misapprehension as to the inclusion of this island in the reported decision on May 7, 1919, nevertheless the notes above mentioned of the Government of the United States make clear the position of this Government in the matter.

At the time when the several notes were addressed to the respective Governments above mentioned a final agreement had not been reached as to the terms and allocation of mandates covering the former German islands in the Pacific.

Therefore the position taken in the matter by the President on behalf of this Government, and clearly set forth in the notes referred to, necessarily had the result of effectively withdrawing any suggestion or implication of assent, mistakenly imputed to this Government, long before December 17, 1920, the date of the council's meeting at Geneva.

As one of the principal allied and associated powers, the United States has an equal concern and an inseparable interest with the other principal allied and associated powers in the overseas possessions of Germany, and concededly an equal voice in their disposition, which it is respectfully submitted can not be undertaken or effectuated without its assent. The Government of the United States therefore respectfully states that it can not regard itself as bound by the terms and provisions of said mandate and desires to record its protest against the reported decision of December 17 last of the Council of the League of Nations in relation thereto, and at the same time to request that the council, having obviously acted under a misapprehension of the facts, should reopen the question for the further consideration which the proper settlement of it clearly requires.

Accept, gentlemen, the assurance of my high consideration.

BAINBRIDGE COLBY,
Secretary of State.

[From Current History, New York Times, April, 1921, vol. 14, No. 1.]

The following is the text of the note sent to Great Britain April 6, 1921, by Secretary Hughes, which is similar to those forwarded to France, Japan, and Italy:

"With respect to the mandate to Japan, purporting to have been confirmed and defined in its terms by the supreme council of the League of Nations, of the German possessions in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator, this Government deems it appropriate to state the fundamental basis of its representations and the principles which, in its view, are determinative.

"It will not be questioned that the right to dispose of the overseas possessions of Germany was acquired only through the victory of the allied and associated powers, and it is also believed that there is no disposition on the part of the British Government to deny the participation of the United States in that victory. It would seem to follow necessarily that the right accruing to the allied and associated powers through the common victory is shared by the United States, and there could be no valid or effective disposition of the overseas possessions of Germany now under consideration without the assent of the United States.

"[This Government must, therefore, point out that as the United States has never vested either the supreme council or the League of Nations with any authority to bind the United States or to act on its behalf, there has been no opportunity for any decision which could be deemed to affect the rights of the United States. It may also be observed that the right accruing to the United States through the victory in which it has participated could not be regarded as in any way ceded or surrendered to Japan or to other nations, except by treaty, and that no such treaty has been made.]

"The fact that the United States has not ratified the treaty of Versailles can not detract from rights which the United States has already acquired, and it is hardly necessary to suggest that a treaty to which the United States is not a party could not affect these rights. But it should be noted that the treaty of Versailles did not purport to secure to Japan or to any other nation any right in the overseas possessions of Germany, save as an equal right therein should be secured to the United States. On the contrary, article 119 of the treaty of Versailles provides:

"Germany renounces in favor of the principal allied and associated powers—

"in whose favor Germany renounced her rights and titles in the United States. Thus not only could the position of the Government of Japan derive no strength from the treaty of Versailles or from any discussions preliminary thereto, but the terms of that treaty confirm the position of the Government of the United States.

"Further, the draft convention relating to the mandate for the German concessions in the Pacific Ocean north of the Equator, which was subsequently proposed, proceeded in the same view, purporting, on behalf of the United States as one of the grantors, to confer the mandate upon Japan, thus recognizing the right and interest of the United States, and the fact that the proposed action could not be effective without the agreement of the United States as one of the principal allied and associated powers.

"As the United States did not enter into this convention or into any treaty relating to the subject, this Government is unable to understand upon what grounds it was thereafter attempted to confer the mandate without the agreement of the United States. It is manifest that the League of Nations was without any authority to bind the United States, and the confirmation of the mandate in question and the definition of its terms by the council of the League of Nations in December, 1920, can not be regarded as having efficacy with respect to the United States—

"all her rights and titles over her overseas possessions."

"It will not be questioned that one of the 'principal allied and associated powers'—

"It should be noted that this mandate not only recited article 119 of the treaty of Versailles, to the effect that 'Germany renounced in favor of the principal allied and associated powers all her rights over her overseas possessions, including therein the groups of islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator,' but also recited that 'the principal allied and associated powers agreed that in accordance with article 22, part 1 (covenant of the League of Nations), of the said treaty a mandate should be conferred upon His Majesty the Emperor of Japan to administer the said islands, and have proposed that the mandate should be formulated,' as set forth. While this last-quoted recital, as has already been pointed out in previous communications by this Government, is inaccurate in its terms, inasmuch as the United States, as one of the principal and associated powers, had not so agreed and proposed, the recital again recognizes the necessity of the participation of the United States in order to make the proposed disposition effective.

"[As, in the absence of any treaty with the United States relating to the matter, there was no decision on May 7, 1919,] [binding the United States, it is deemed to be unnecessary again to examine the brief minutes of the meeting of the supreme council on that date. It may, however, be proper to say that the minutes of this meeting, although obviously without any finality, could not properly be construed without due regard to the other proceedings of the supreme council and without taking account of the reservations which President Wilson had already made in the previous meetings of the supreme council on April 21, April 30, and May 1, 1919.

"The attitude of President Wilson is sufficiently shown by the following statement which he made to the Department of State on March 3, 1921:]

"I beg to return the note received yesterday from the Japanese Government, which I have read, in relation to the proposed mandate covering the island of Yap.

"My first information of a contention that the so-called decision of May 7, 1919, by the council of four assigned to Japan a mandate for the island of Yap, was conveyed to me by Mr. Norman W. Davis in October last. I then informed him that I had never consented to the assignment of the island of Yap to Japan.

"I had not previously given particular attention to the wording of the council minutes of May 7, 1919, which were only recently called to my attention. I had on several occasions prior to the date mentioned made specific reservations regarding the island of Yap and had taken the position that it should not be assigned under mandate to any one power, but should be internationalized for cable purposes. I assumed that this position would be duly considered in connection with the settlement of the cable question, and that it therefore was no longer a matter for consideration in connection with the peace negotiations. I never abandoned or modified this position in respect to the island of Yap, and I did not agree on May 7, 1919, or at any other time, that the island of Yap should be included in the assignment of mandates to Japan.

"As a matter of fact, all agreements arrived at regarding the assignment of mandates were conditional upon a subsequent agreement being reached as to the specific terms of the mandates, and further upon their acceptance by each of the principal allied and associated powers. The consent of the United States is essential both as to assignments of mandates and the terms and provisions of the mandates, after agreement as to their assignment or allocation.

"The consent of the United States, as you know, has never been given on either point as to the island of Yap."

"Apart from the expressed purpose of President Wilson in relation to the island of Yap, inasmuch as the proceedings of the supreme council on May 7, 1919, did not, and in the nature of things could not, have finality, this Government is unable to perceive any grounds for the contention that it was the duty of this Government to make immediate protest with respect to the so-called decision of May 7, 1919, and certainly it can not be said that an omission to do so operated as a cession of its rights. It may be added, however, that when the matter was brought to the attention of this Government in connection with conference on communications in October last this Government informed the Government of Japan and other Governments (by notes of November 9, 1920) that it was the understanding of this Government that the island of Yap was not included in the action of May 7, 1919. Its position was subsequently stated at length.

"It is a cause of regret to this Government that after and despite this protest there should have been any attempt to pass upon drafts of mandates purporting to deal with the Pacific islands, including Yap, and that a mandate should have been approved, or attempted to be put into effect, which while purporting to be made in the name of the United States was without the assent of the United States. This Government trusts that this action, which it must assume was taken under a misapprehension, will be reconsidered.

"[In particular, as no treaty has ever been concluded with the United States relating to the island of Yap, and as no one has ever been authorized to cede or surrender the right or interest of the United States in the island, this Government must insist that it has not lost its right or interest as it existed prior to any action of the supreme council] [or of the League of Nations, and can not recognize the allocation of the island or the validity of the mandate to Japan.

"In this view this Government deems it to be unnecessary at this time to consider the terms of the so-called 'C' mandates, or the discussion with respect thereto.

"This Government, as has been clearly stated in previous communications, seeks no exclusive interest in the island of Yap and has no desire to secure any privileges without having similar privileges accorded to other powers, including, of course, Japan, and relying upon the sense of justice of the Government of Japan and of the Governments of the other allied and associated powers, this Government looks with confidence to a disposition of the matter whereby the just interests of all may be properly conserved."

Mr. JOHNSON. In the last communication our rights are clearly and very succinctly set forth. The demand is made that those rights shall be respected. During these two or three years, Mr. President, this question has been one between Japan on the one hand and our country upon the other. It has been one not alone in which President Wilson desired to internationalize Yap but has been one in which the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate, under a Democratic administration and under a Republican administration, too, desired to internationalize the island of Yap.

I recall, and the members of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate should recall, that in December, 1920, there came before us Mr. Norman H. Davis, who related what was occurring in the conference then being held upon communications. He related to us the importance of Yap. Our friends say it is of no importance. Mr. Davis, Senators will recall, said then that it was almost a necessary part of the cable communication of the United States. He told how the storms affected Guam; how it was impossible to depend upon connected cable facilities at Guam, but how at Yap those storms were not of the like character, and that our communications might be continued uninterrupted from Yap.

Where does the cable run which lands at Yap? One would think, from what has been said on this floor, that it was a Japanese cable. Not so. The only cable which has come to Yap is substantially an American cable by operation. I may not state the name accurately, but it is a cable operated by the Pacific Commercial Telegraph Co., a company American in character. Whence goes the cable from Yap? To Japan? Not a bit of it. The cable goes in one direction from Yap to the Philippines and in the other to Shanghai, in China.

If I am in error I ask that I may be corrected, but there is no cable from Yap to Japan at all, and the cable that has been subsisting upon that island is a Pacific company cable, is it not?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President—

Mr. JOHNSON. I am very glad to yield to be corrected.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think the Senator is mistaken in that. The cable that goes to the island of Yap is the Dutch-German cable—

Mr. JOHNSON. That is true.

Mr. KELLOGG. Running from the island of Yap to Guam, with a branch running to the southwest, and running north to Shanghai. It was not the Pacific Cable Co.'s cable at all, and the American company does not own any line to Yap. That was operated as a German line when the war broke out.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is true; it was operated as a German line when the war broke out. I was under the impression the Pacific company had acquired some interest there. I may be in error.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Pacific company had a contract of some kind to operate it. I do not know what the contract was.

Mr. JOHNSON. Perhaps I confused the operating contract of the Pacific company with the cable itself. That may be so. At any rate, it was connected. The cable, at any rate, bear in mind, runs to Yap from Guam. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON. It runs from Guam to Yap, from Yap to the Philippines, from Yap then north to Shanghai. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. KELLOGG. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is the cable which has been there in the past, and the right to maintain that cable we are receiving now as a great boon from Japan.

Mr. President, for the last two years, until the present, the dispute has continued—the dispute on the one hand by the American Government, on the other hand by the Japanese Government. The five allied and associated powers were in the city of Washington a few days ago. The five allied and associated powers could then have determined just exactly what ought to be done with Yap, with its cable facilities, and with the islands north of the Equator in the Pacific. When there was all over the world the feeling of good will and desire to do what was just and right and what would inure to our benefit in the hereafter, then there was ample opportunity, with the five allied and associated powers here to determine just exactly what might be done with the islands of the Pacific, with Yap, and with our cable communications thereon.

We enter into a contract, however, with Japan which our friends say is beneficial, a contract by which we accept a moiety of a right that is ours. I do not say we ought not to enter into it. They say to us it is the best we can do, and they ask us, "Do you want to go to war about Yap?" Why, of course we do not want to go to war about Yap. I would not go to war for many, many Yaps. That is not the question. Mr. President, that is the same argument that was made concerning Shantung. Do you not recall that the President of the United States and every advocate of the League of Nations, when we were opposing the settlement of Shantung, went up and down the country saying, "What is your alternative? Are you going to have war with Japan over Shantung?" We answered then as we answer now, "Of course we are not; but you do not need to yield a right, you do not need to give away a principle, in order to stand your ground and in order to endeavor to do your best to obtain what is right and to see the triumph of that principle."

Because I disagree with some things which have been done by the conference which has met here in Washington I would not have you believe that I disagree with very, very many. I recognize that there has been very great accomplishment by that conference. I glory in much it has done. I am delighted that in the matter of Shantung so very, very much has been wrought. But, Mr. President, because I recognize its virtues, because, indeed, I stand ready to give the full meed of praise to its accomplishments, I can not shut my eyes to that which I believe is wrong, nor can I waive the independent judgment that it is mine to exercise upon this floor in regard to any particular part of the work of the conference.

Mr. President, we used to have our controversy over Shantung, in which, even more eloquently than has been asked concerning Yap, the query was put, "What would you do, and would you go to war?"

Of course, it is obvious the answer that should be made in either instance. "Take what you can get," said one gentleman to me recently. Not so! Upon what theory? What self-respecting nation, insisting, as we have insisted, upon our rights in regard to Yap and the isles in the North Pacific, shall go hat in hand and beg as a matter of grace from Japan that we be permitted to have a cable station on the island of Yap?

I am not ready, sir, to pay the price by turning over 100,000 souls or less in the mandated islands in the Pacific for a cable station on the island of Yap. I would not go to war over them or over the failure to get that station, either, but we may with self-respect insist firmly upon the rights that are ours without getting into any undue or undignified wrangle and without having any war at all with any power on the face of the earth.

Mr. President, these islands are of little consequence, perhaps. How we have forgotten! They have peoples upon them. In dealing with the spoil of war how easy it is to forget that in that spoil of war there is not only territory but there are peoples. Oh, yes, peoples not as good as we, peoples who do not stand as we do, who do not believe as we do, whose looks are different and whose color and complexion may vary from ours. But after all, Mr. President, there are peoples—fifty, sixty, seventy, eighty, or a hundred thousand, as the case may be—upon those islands.

I am not ready, with the lesson of Korea before me, to turn over fifty, sixty, seventy, eighty, or a hundred thousand human beings to the rule of Japan.

My friend from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] thinks that is a western prejudice. He is wrong! He is wrong! He speaks as if it were a local problem alone out there in the State from which I come. Ah, Mr. President, that is no local problem. Long since it has developed from being a mere local problem into a national problem. That problem, which confronts us away out upon the western frontier of our civilization, will have to be solved in the Congress of the United States finally, and solved as a national problem.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the Senator has probably misinterpreted my position without understanding it. I am not advocating the allocation of these islands to Japan as a mandatory. I say that according to the treaty of Versailles they have been made the mandatory, and so far as our Government is concerned when we refused to take our seat at the table of the League of Nations we lost our opportunity to control the situation. That was the only time we had a right to speak, the only time we could speak. I am not contending that something should have been done, but my argument is that we have foreclosed our Government by its own action from its opportunity to protect the situation.

Mr. JOHNSON. Of course I have, in common with my fellows, the greatest respect for the opinions of the distinguished Senator from Alabama. I am sorry, indeed, that the Democratic administration disagreed with his view. I am very glad that a Republican administration disagreed with them, because until the enunciation of that view to-day there has not been a single solitary individual who has been a part of this controversy or this dispute who has ever suggested it. Mr. Hughes takes the position that is impregnably logical when he says that no League of Nations to which we are not a party can deal with our rights. I can not understand how a lawyer can insist that an extra judicial gathering of individuals, without the consent of another apart from them, may take that other's rights and property and deal with them as they see fit.

Mr. Hughes, Mr. Colby, Mr. Lansing I think, President Wilson I know, and the present administration all took the attitude that neither a council of which we were not a party nor a league of which we were not a member could take our property, our rights, inchoate or otherwise as you may put them, and deal with them at all. Of necessity that must be so; otherwise we would give to the power that may have possession for the instant the right to do just as it sees fit with what is ours without our knowledge or consent. You give them jurisdiction to take yours and do with it as they may desire when in fact they have no jurisdiction over you.

Mr. President, I referred a moment ago to Mr. Norman Davis coming before the Foreign Relations Committee and his testimony then given on the importance of Yap. The Foreign Relations Committee at that time was in thorough accord with Mr. Davis. On December 10, 1920, the Foreign Relations Committee united in a letter to Mr. Davis for use in the communications conference that then was being held. What was the position then of the Democratic Secretary of State, the Democratic President, and the Republican Foreign Relations Committee? Here it is, expressed by the chairman of the committee:

DECEMBER 10, 1920.

HON. NORMAN H. DAVIS,
Acting Secretary of State.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Having considered carefully the information you have given the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate relative to the status of the negotiations concerning the disposition of the ex-German cables, and the position taken by the American delegation in reference thereto, I desire to inform you that the opinion of the committee is that the United States should firmly and as a minimum insist upon the restoration of the direct cable service it enjoyed prior to the war, with an equitable and logical distribution of ownership and operation; that the island of Yap should be internationalized for the purpose of cable communications, and that if an interruption of the present conference is desired, this Government should not consent to the continued operation of the cables as at present existing except under an arrangement equitably providing for the interests of the United States therein.

Very truly, yours,

That was our position December 10, 1920. We have never altered it since until now, and that is why I said in the beginning of my remarks that this treaty's importance comes not from its intrinsic or its extrinsic value. This treaty's importance comes because it is the initial bluff and the first surrender.

Now, Mr. President, I have spoken as I have upon this treaty because I believe it is a prelude of what may follow. It is my purpose in the future, wherever I can, to explain as best I may be able the four-power treaty which soon will be before the Senate. I shall endeavor in the future, sir, to show its origin. I want to attempt indeed to construe and interpret its terms. I wish, sir, if I may be able, to point out the possibilities that are contained within it.

I desire, if the opportunity shall be mine, to show how it departs from that which has been ours in the past and enters upon a new, perilous, and untried path. All this I desire to do, sir, not because I am the one who should do it—and I trust that there may be somebody else in this body who will attempt it and who will do it, too—but because I feel that upon this body rests finally the exposition of that sort of thing which is coming to us under the four-power treaty, and upon this body rests the duty and the obligation to inform the American people.

I understand very well, Mr. President, all that this entails and all that it means; but in this body, upon a subject as to which we are given common jurisdiction, in respect to treaties in international affairs, we ought to be willing to go forward as best we can, seeing the light as God gives us to see that light, and, without fear and without favor, to go on to the end, wherever that end may lead.

Mr. President, it is because of these facts in view of the important matters that are coming before us soon that I have spoken at all upon this treaty with respect to Yap.

This is the first time that the United States of America has recognized the duplicity of secret agreements dealing with territories and peoples. This is the first occasion when it has been proposed that we stamp with our approval the bargains that were made before we entered into the World War and that were stealthily withheld from our Government, bargains in relation to peoples who were helpless, and their territory. This is the first submission to the gesture, the face that has been made by the island empire across the Pacific, at us. Mr. President, this is the time when we are called upon first to indorse what it did in secrecy and to yield to its bluff or to stand upon our ground and insist upon our rights; and, insisting upon them, I do not mean to do so otherwise than diplomatically of course, for the importance of the subject merits no more.

I ask that the Senate in the initial step, therefore—not because it will mean much in the end, but because it is the initial step—decline to follow by putting our approval upon Japan's secret bargains.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KING. If the Senate should ratify this treaty, could it be considered as a confession that Japan holds these islands under a title which is indefeasible, a sovereign title, not subject to the duty of a trustee such as is contemplated by the provisions of the League of Nations? May I ask one other question, in order that I may not interrupt again? If it be conceded that Japan's title is unaffected by the trusteeship created by the League of Nations, and that the allied and associated powers, excluding the United States, may dispose of the ceded Provinces of Germany as they see fit, does it not seem to the Senator that France, Great Britain, Japan, and Italy might parcel out Mesopotamia and all the renounced German Provinces, entirely ignoring the trusteeship duties prescribed by the League of Nations?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly, Mr. President; mandates do not vastly appeal to me. The mandate, for instance, which is given to Japan over the little isle of Yap is substantial sovereignty. We recognize the fact, because, Senators will please observe, the concluding clause reads:

(7) The Government of Japan will exercise its power of expropriation in the island to secure to the United States or its nationals needed property and facilities for the purpose of electrical communications if such property or facilities can not otherwise be obtained.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion to the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] in regard to the proposition of mandates?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Mandates were provided for in the treaty of Versailles for a very commendable purpose. They were designed to protect dependent peoples from exploitation. In other words, the American delegation seems to have discovered after they reached Versailles that there were a number of secret treaties which had disposed of a vast amount of territory, and that those secret treaties could not be wholly disregarded; that is to say, the nations which had made secret treaties were not willing wholly to disregard them. So the mandate theory was adopted for the purpose of administering that territory. It so happened that those who were given mandates acquired the same territory that they had been given by the secret treaties, except in one or two instances where the situation became a little mixed. For instance, with reference to some of the oil lands in Mesopotamia, under the secret treaties France was to have had Mosul, but in the distribution which took place at Versailles Mosul, for some reason or other, got into the possession of Great Britain.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator let me interrupt him right there?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. KING. I think it is fair to state, although I do not know the facts, that the contention was made by Great Britain that concessions had been made to Britishers anterior to the treaty with respect to certain oil lands in Mosul, and that the interests of Great Britain were merely those to which title had been acquired anterior to the war.

Mr. BORAH. What I was going to say was that when France and Great Britain came to settle their differences they did not go to the League of Nations nor did they go to the Versailles treaty, but they went back to the original secret treaties and readjusted their holdings according to those secret treaties; in other words, they recognized the claim of France to Mosul because it had been provided for in the secret treaty. Then Great Britain agreed to give France 25 per cent of the oil produced from the Mesopotamian fields to satisfy her demands for what she had lost in regard to Mosul.

Now the question arises by what authority did Great Britain undertake to dispose of 25 per cent of the oil lands for Mesopotamia? She certainly could not dispose of the property of her wards, the people of Mesopotamia, under any mandate theory or any power which was given her by reason of any mandatory. She was to administer that territory for a specific purpose—to wit, for the benefit of those people—to preserve it in order that afterwards they might enjoy it; but she disposes of it and transfers it or agrees to transfer it to another nation. Why? Because they both recognize their authority or their title as running back to the original secret treaty. That, in my judgment, Mr. President, has been the guide of these nations throughout in regard to these mandates. While the mandates have been imposed upon them and while they for public purposes recognize the mandate, for all practical purposes they go back to the very terms of the secret treaties.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, just a word apropos of the suggestions made by the Senator from Idaho. As I view the matter in the light of the discussion, the safe and proper course for the United States, in dealing with the renounced German territories, would be to regard the Versailles treaty as a living and vital instrument at least so far as it relates to the title of the territories ceded by Germany. As I understand the treaty of Versailles, Germany's overseas colonies were transferred to the principal allied and associated powers. Germany's rights and titles were, by the treaty, conveyed to the principal allied and associated powers, but the transfer did not confer unlimited and unrestricted authority to the so-called grantees to do with the territory and peoples residing therein as they saw fit.

Article 22 of Part I of the Versailles treaty specifically declares that because of the conditions existing in the territories referred to there should be applied the principle that the well-being and development of such peoples "form a sacred trust of civilization, and that securities for the performance of this trust should be embodied in this covenant." The article further declares that "the character of the mandate" should differ according to the stage of the development of the people, the geographic situation of the territory, its economic conditions, and other similar circumstances. And speaking of the islands in the Pacific, it is declared that the transfer is subject to the safeguards mentioned in article 22 and to the interests of the "indigenous population." The mandatory is also required to render an annual report to the council of the league with reference to the territory "committed" to its charge; also, the degree of authority or control or administration to be exercised by the mandatory, where not agreed upon by the members of the league, shall be explicitly defined in each case by the council. These provisions taken together clearly mean that no matter where the naked or strictly legal title rests the territory and the people are to be controlled by a mandatory whose powers and authority are to be defined by the council, but keeping in mind always the "interests of such inhabitants" and their moral and material welfare.

If this treaty means that we recognize in Japan a complete and unrestricted sovereign power over the islands north of the Equator formerly belonging to Germany, then we concede a title not granted or conferred by the Versailles treaty and which, in my opinion, Japan does not possess. If Japan, Great Britain, France, and Italy could enter into valid and binding agreements respecting German territory which was subsequently ceded by Germany to the principal allied and associated powers, and pursuant thereto claimed or declared title—unrestricted, indefeasible, and unlimited—in whichever of the nations the balance might agree should have such title, then the treaty of Versailles is meaningless in so far as it deals with the question of the overseas possessions renounced by Germany.

I deny that the German possessions, title to which was renounced, may be bartered or disposed of by one or all of the great powers just named as they may see fit and subject to no limitations or restrictions whatever, no matter what the provisions of any treaty, secret or open, that may have been entered into between Great Britain, Japan, France, or Italy, respecting territory which might be ceded by Germany as the result of the war. I contend that any such treaties, in so far as they contravene the Versailles treaty and the provisions of the League of Nations, are void. If the powers just named may divide the islands of the Pacific which were ceded by Germany and give to the nations obtaining them absolute and unqualified sovereign power and authority, then the same course may be taken by these nations with respect to all other possessions renounced by Germany. Under this view the German possessions in South Africa could be transferred to any one of these nations and such transferee could do with the people and with the territory as it pleased. The limitations of the Versailles treaty and the trusteeship established by the league would be of no avail. The theory that the inhabitants of these German territories should have "tutelage" exercised in their behalf, or over them by mandatories of the league, would be disregarded and the whole spirit of the treaty, in so far as it relates to the territories and their inhabitants renounced by Germany, would be destroyed.

I insist that Great Britain holds territory in Asia Minor, as does France, as a mandatory of the league. These nations must observe the letter and the spirit of article 22, to which I have referred. Such nations are trustees and must exercise the trust in a humane and in a proper and legal manner and conformable to the terms of the trust. If we concede that Japan may take the islands referred to in the pending treaty and regard them as territory belonging to Japan and freed from the trusts prescribed by the Versailles treaty, then to be consistent we must concede to Great Britain, France, and Italy the same rights, authority, and power, unrestricted and unrestrained with respect to lands and peoples over which they are now exercising control.

Is it the position of the proponents of this treaty that Japan has obtained complete sovereign rights over the islands north of the Equator which formerly belonged to Germany, and that the League of Nations may not call her to account for the manner in which she treats the inhabitants of such islands? Is it contended that Germany has no right to appeal to the league in behalf of peoples who formerly were under her flag? While it is true Germany renounced title to her overseas possessions, it is likewise true that in the same instrument by which such title was renounced provision was made for the treatment to be accorded to the inhabitants of such renounced territory, and then was defined the character of the title under which the nation or nations exercising governmental and administrative authority should hold and exercise the same.

It seems to me that a reservation should be adopted, if the treaty is to be ratified in its present form, to the effect that in ratifying it the United States does so with the understanding that Japan's control over the islands in question is limited and is such as is derived from the Versailles treaty, that she holds the islands as a mandatory, not as a sovereign with unrestricted power, and must render an account to the League of Nations of her stewardship or trusteeship with respect to such islands and their inhabitants.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask permission to take from the desk, as in legislative session, the appropriation bills that are here awaiting the appointment of conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHORTRIDGE in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10267) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, that the request of the House of Representatives for a conference be granted, and that the Presiding Officer appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. JONES of New Mexico conferees on the part of the Senate.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10329) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, that the prayer of the House for a conference be granted, and that the Presiding Officer appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. OVERMAN conferees on the part of the Senate.

TREATY AND PROTOCOL BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND HAITI (S. DOCS. NOS. 135 AND 136).

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have before me a copy of the treaty between the United States and Haiti signed at Port au Prince on September 16, 1915, and also the protocol between the United States and Haiti signed at Port au Prince on October 3, 1919. I am advised that the prints of this treaty and protocol have been exhausted; and I therefore ask unanimous consent of the Senate, as in legislative session, that reprints be ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio? If not, it is so ordered.

ACQUISITION OF REAL ESTATE BY THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I present the conference report on H. R. 7158, and move concurrence by the Senate in it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the report will be read.

The reading clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill H. R. 7158, an act to amend the Army appropriation act approved July 11, 1919, so as to release appropriations for the completion of the acquisition of real estate in certain cases and making additional appropriations therefor, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 2.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 3: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 1 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out the figure "3" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "4"; and the Senate agree to the same.

HARRY S. NEW,
SELDEN P. SPENCER,
H. L. MYERS,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN C. MCKENZIE,
FRANK L. GREENE,
W. J. FIELDS,

Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the conference report? If not, the question is on agreeing to it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, is that some matter that is sought to be acted upon as in legislative session?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request has been made and granted that it may be so considered.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I have a motion that I want to make regarding a resolution that is pending. If the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me to do that and to have the Senate go into legislative session and take up that matter and consider it; I should like to have that done. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] has made a motion regarding the resolution to which I refer.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I shall be glad to oblige the Senator. I shall be glad to have the conference report taken up by unanimous consent, but I can not consent to it if it is going to lead to debate. I think it is my duty to keep the treaty before the Senate.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I think the situation is this: Unanimous consent was granted for the consideration of this conference report.

Mr. HEFLIN. While that was pending I addressed the Chair. I have no objection, however, to having the conference report agreed to.

Mr. NEW. I think there will be no objection. I simply ask the Senate to vote concurrence in the report.

Mr. LODGE. If there is to be no debate, I have no objection to taking it up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is under the impression that he inquired whether or not there was objection, and, no objection being heard by the Chair, the order was that the report might now be considered as in legislative session. What is the motion of the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. NEW. I move concurrence by the Senate in the report of the conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the Senate agree to the conference report.

The motion was agreed to.

FEDERAL RESERVE BANK AT ATLANTA.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I think I shall not make my motion at this time. The Senator from Massachusetts wishes to go along with his treaty, and I will wait until to-morrow morning to make the motion.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Alabama, if he desires to expedite action upon the resolution—which I assume he does, naturally—he request its reference to the Committee on Banking and Currency, so that they can officially consider it?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HEFLIN. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. As a counter suggestion, may I bring to the attention of my friend the Senator from New Jersey the fact that the Senator from Alabama, when he prepared this resolution, consulted a very high authority in the Senate as to the proper course to take with reference to having it committed to a committee; that he pursued the unofficial advice of the President pro tempore of the Senate and asked that the resolution be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate? During an experience of some eight years in the Senate I have never known an instance where permission was refused to make such a reference. The law and the practice of the Senate require that all resolutions which contemplate an expenditure from the contingent fund of the Senate shall be referred to that committee. The Senator from Alabama, pursuing the course that is usual here, made that request, and it was denied him.

Before the resolution can be acted upon by the Senate finally it is necessary that it be considered by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. It is true that after that committee has reported any Senator may move to have the resolution referred to another committee of the Senate for consideration upon its merits; but the usual course has been first to refer such resolutions to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The Senator from Alabama sought to take that course.

I suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that the controversy respecting this subject can be relieved by his consenting to the reference that is usually made in such cases, namely, to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President—

Mr. ROBINSON. Just a moment. When that committee has reported, then the Senator, if he desires to do so, may move to have the resolution referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, or to any other appropriate committee of the Senate. In this connection I think I ought to say that, considering the character of the resolution, there is no reason why it should go particularly to the Committee on Banking and Currency. It might go to any one of a number of committees, since it involves the investigation of an alleged expenditure of trust funds for a quasi political purpose by a Government banking institution.

I ask unanimous consent that the resolution of the Senator from Alabama may be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, the Senate has already passed upon that question. It was debated for three or four hours of session recently, and the Senate voted against referring the resolution to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The question has already been decided by the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. EDGE. Just a moment. I think I may say, in very brief reply to the Senator from Arkansas in regard to the question of precedent, as to whether a resolution shall be referred first to that committee or first to this committee that would naturally consider the subject matter, that it has been done both ways. The Chair, upon being asked for his opinion at the time, stated very positively that the Senate could make either order, and in their judgment they voted against it. The situation now before the Senate, therefore, is the simple one that a motion is pending to refer the resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency. My suggestion to the Senator from Alabama, the other question having already been decided, is that if he wishes to expedite the consideration of his resolution it should go to the committee which has charge of this subject, namely, the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. HEFLIN. It depends altogether on what the Senator means by expediting it. If he means expediting my resolution on the way to its final rest in the Committee on Banking and Currency, then, of course, he is using the right term.

Mr. EDGE. Of course, the Senator is entitled to his judgment, as far as that is concerned, but I insist that the Committee on Banking and Currency should first consider the resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the request for unanimous consent be put.

Mr. ROBINSON. Just a moment; I should like to make a further statement regarding it. The Senator from Alabama has the floor, and has yielded to me for that purpose.

The Senator from New Jersey has the habit of stating his opinion as an absolute finality. It is true that the Senate, after somewhat prolonged discussion, voted by a majority of one—33 to 32—not to refer this resolution to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. Every Senator knows that it must be referred to that committee. It may or it may not be necessary, after that committee has considered the matter, to refer it to another committee. If the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate should report the resolution adversely, then in all probability the debate which is inevitable if the Senator from New Jersey persists in his attitude and insists upon his motion would be avoided.

The Senator from New Jersey has stated that the Senate has the power to refer the resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency first rather than to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. Of course, the Senate has absolute authority over the matter. The Senate can refuse to refer it to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and thereby prevent the passage of the resolution or the consideration of the resolution by the Senate. Since the statutes require that such resolutions shall be considered by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, what reasonable objection can the Senator from New Jersey or any other Senator urge to the reference of this resolution which the statutes require? By referring it to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate we can escape the very prolonged debate which is certain to result if the Senator from New Jersey insists upon his motion, which is out of the usual course of procedure in the Senate, to refer it first to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

There has already been quite a prolonged debate upon the subject, but there will be a very much longer debate if the Senator from New Jersey objects to the request for the usual reference and urges an unusual course in connection with this matter. Why not let the resolution take the course which resolutions of its character usually take?

With the approval of the Senator from Alabama, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution offered by him be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. EDGE. To that I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is objection.

Mr. LODGE. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is the consideration of the treaty with Japan in open executive session.

THE FOUR-POWER TREATY.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed two reservations to the so-called four-power treaty. I ask that they may be read at the desk and printed, and that they lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the request will be granted, and the Secretary will read.

The reading clerk read as follows:

Reservations intended to be proposed to the four-power treaty by Mr. ROBINSON:

"The United States understands that each of the high contracting parties will refrain from entering into any secret treaty, agreement, or understanding with any other power or powers during the life of this treaty."

"The United States understands that each of the high contracting parties will respect the rights and possessions of all other nations and refrain from all acts of aggression against any other power or powers. If there should develop between any of the high contracting parties and any other power or powers a controversy which is not satisfactorily settled by diplomacy and is likely to affect the harmonious accord subsisting between any party or parties to this compact and any other power or powers, the high contracting parties shall invite all powers claiming an interest in the controversy to a joint conference to which the whole subject will be referred for consideration and adjustment."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the request or desire of the Senator from Arkansas in regard to the reservations just proposed by him?

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that they be printed and lie on the table. I have no objection to their reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LODGE. There is no need of referring them.

Mr. ROBINSON. The treaty having been reported, the appropriate action is to direct that they lie on the table. That was my request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed reservations will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. POMERENE. I offer the reservation to the four-power treaty, which I send to the desk, as a substitute for the one which was reported by the committee, and ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MOSES. Has any reservation been reported by the committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not advised.

Mr. MOSES. The treaty itself has not been reported; I will say to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I assumed that it had been reported. In any event, there is no reason why this reservation should be referred to the committee.

Mr. LODGE. None in the world. It can be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. POMERENE. That was my understanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reservation will be received as suggested, be printed, and lie on the table.

The reservation was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

It is, however, understood that any adjustment provided for under article 1 hereof, and any understanding contemplated under article 2, in order to be binding upon the United States shall be ratified and executed in accordance with the constitutional methods of the United States.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—THE FOUR-POWER TREATY.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, being a newspaper publisher myself, I very rarely take notice of the mistakes which are ordinarily and inevitably made with respect to public matters, because I readily understand how easy it is to make mistakes in the rush and hurry of a daily paper's routine; but there appeared yesterday in the Washington Herald a statement to this effect:

Senators GLASS and ROBINSON, Democrats, are considering the advisability of attempting to organize Democratic opposition and hold the 29 in line. GLASS has recently had a talk with Woodrow Wilson and is said to have brought back word that the former President remained firm in his decision not to fight the treaty openly. Wilson opposed it, however, GLASS was reported by Democrats to have told them.

Mr. President, that is the purest invention that ever appeared in a public print. I have seen former President Wilson but for a moment in perhaps three months. I called at his home on his birthday to offer my congratulations. He has never opened his lips to me on the subject of any one of these treaties, nor have I sought in any way, directly or indirectly, to ascertain his view of any one of them. I do not know what his view is, and he does not know what my view is. I imagine that he does not greatly care what my view is, if I may be said to know myself what is my view. I have wanted to hear the discussion and to take my position in accordance with my best judgment. It is shameful for a newspaper deliberately to print a falsehood of that nature upon so important a question as that to which the Senate is now addressing itself.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I had heard of the press report which has just been quoted by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], and characterized by him as without any foundation whatever, but I had not seen it. Inasmuch as my name is coupled with that of the Senator from Virginia in an alleged undertaking on the part of the Senator from Virginia and myself to organize political opposition in the Senate to the four-power treaty, I deem it appropriate to say that no such proposal has ever been discussed between us, and that there is no foundation whatever for the statement, so far as my knowledge or information goes.

TREATY WITH JAPAN.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty between the United States and Japan with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator, in particular the island of Yap, signed at Washington on February 11, 1922.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to article 1 of the treaty, which the Secretary will read.

The reading clerk read the article, as follows:

Subject to the provisions of the present convention, the United States consents to the administration by Japan, pursuant to the aforesaid mandate, of all the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harrell	McNary	Robinson
Borah	Harris	Moses	Sheppard
Broussard	Harrison	Nelson	Shortridge
Bursum	Heflin	New	Simmons
Cameron	Johnson	Newberry	Smith
Capper	Jones, N. Mex.	Nicholson	Swanson
Caraway	Jones, Wash.	Norbeck	Townsend
Coff	Kellogg	Norris	Trammell
Edge	Kendrick	Oddie	Underwood
Elkins	Keyes	Page	Wadsworth
Ernst	King	Pepper	Warren
Fernald	Ladd	Phipps	Watson, Ga.
Fletcher	Lenroot	Pittman	Weller
France	Lodge	Polindexter	Will's
Gerry	McCormick	Pomerene
Glass	McKellar	Ransdell
Hale	McKinley	Rawson

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, many Senators feel that consideration of the treaty now before the Senate might with propriety be postponed until other treaties which are the result of the Washington conference, particularly the four-power treaty, shall have been disposed of. The discussion of the treaty has proceeded for some days. I do not believe any Senator will controvert the statement that while it is no part of the work or result of the Washington conference proper, yet the Yap treaty is, in some respects at least, inseparably connected with or intimately related to the program contemplated in the Washington conference.

I concur in the statement that has been made by other Senators that this treaty of itself is not of paramount importance. It seems relatively unimportant, yet, in my opinion, as implied by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], it represents a distinct and emphatic diplomatic victory for the Empire of Japan.

The nature of the title under which the former German islands in the North Pacific Ocean are held by Japan has, for the first time during the debate, been the subject matter of serious dispute. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], in presenting the treaty to the Senate, stated that the United States had unquestionably acquired title to an undivided one-fifth interest in the islands, and, indeed, as I understood him, in all the former German overseas territory which Germany in fact renounced to the allied and associated powers. In making that statement the Senator from Massachusetts adopted the viewpoint of President Wilson's administration as clearly defined in the note of February, 1921, signed by Secretary Colby and transmitted to the League of Nations council. This position on the part of the United States Government was subsequently unqualifiedly approved and reiterated by the present Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, acting for the present Republican administration.

I do not believe it would be fruitful of any material results to discuss at any great length the nature and source of the title by which these islands are now held. I can not agree with my friend, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], if it was his intention to say this, that the practical effect of the mandatory and the confirmation of the same in this treaty is to intrust the Empire of Japan with control of these islands and the administration of the affairs of the people on them under the direction and supervision of the League of Nations. A careful study of the history of the subject and of the terms of the treaty warrant, I believe, the conclusion that we are giving to Japan what in practical effect will amount to an absolute title to the islands and the power to govern them at will.

It does seem to me that the weight of the argument is in favor of the conclusion asserted by Secretary Hughes in his note of April, 1921, when he reaffirmed the position taken by former President Wilson. It will be recalled that Mr. Wilson, recognizing the importance of the island of Yap as a relay center for cable communication with the Orient, had insisted before the supreme council that the island be withheld from any mandatory in contemplation and that it be internationalized—that is, put under the control of agencies fairly representing all the allied and associated powers—so that the instrumentalities for communication with the Orient, which were then and may hereafter become available, might be used for the practical benefit of all the nations which might seek to use them or which might be entitled to use them.

I make the proposition now, with no offense to any person or to any people, that to confirm this mandate, leaving Japan in the unqualified control of the island of Yap, with unlimited powers of sovereignty over that island, and necessarily with the power to supervise and control the manner in which these agencies or instrumentalities of communication may be used, will result in no practical benefit to the United States.

If Senators imagine that American merchants can secure or place orders to the trade in China, Russia, Siberia, or any other part of the Orient through the instrumentality of a cable controlled as this must be by Japanese power and Japanese influences, they are wasting their time. I understand that the express terms of the treaty forbid censorship of messages sent by the nationals of the United States through these cables, but I know that whenever it becomes essential to the interests of Japan to censor or prevent the transmission of American cable messages, the censorship must occur and the messages will not be transmitted. I realize that is a plain statement, but mark my words, within the next few years the question may become acute.

Considering this treaty and its relationship to other proposed treaties, we are giving the Empire of Japan absolute and unlimited domination of the Orient.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Did I understand the Senator to say we had no American cable to Japan?

Mr. ROBINSON. No; I said nothing about an American cable. I said that in so far as Senators may imagine that the use of any cable which this treaty gives us the right to employ will be beneficial to the trade of the United States is concerned, they are making a grave mistake.

Mr. LODGE. The only cable of course, as the Senator knows and as he said in fact, that passes through Yap is the German-Netherlands cable, which runs from Yap to Mindanao, thence to China and thence to Guam. We have a direct American cable that runs from Hawaii to Guam, from Guam to Manila, and from Manila to China.

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly, and I am asserting the proposition, and I believe if Senators will follow me closely they will conclude the statement is correct, that we are getting nothing of substantial interest or benefit to the people or the commerce of the people of the United States by the terms of this treaty. Our contemplated arrangement not to further fortify territory in the Pacific Ocean and not to establish naval bases coupled with this treaty will strongly tend to give Japan control of the Orient. Our naval vessels can not go to those waters without coaling stations are provided.

It may be that rather than prolong the controversy the United States should agree to this arrangement. It is a difficult question. It is interrelated with other more important questions. I am not ready to concede the proposition of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that this arrangement, by which we confirm Japan in the exercise of its sovereignty over the Caroline Islands, is a great humane enterprise in the interest and for the benefit of civilization. I do not believe that Japan so regards it, neither do I believe that the other nations, France, Italy, and Great Britain, so regard it.

Considering the language of the Versailles treaty under which this mandate was created, considering it as a whole, the conclusion seems to me irresistible, and I implied from the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts that such was his conclusion, that Japan already has what may be termed, although the statement is not strictly accurate in a legal sense, a four-fifths right in these islands and unquestionably by this treaty we are giving up to Japan whatever we may have there. If we have nothing, there is no occasion for our entering into it, for the cable concession is of little value.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] said that, in his opinion, this treaty would not affect anything; that it would not change the status at all; that, without regard to this treaty, Japan will go on controlling these islands indefinitely and governing them absolutely as an integral part of her territory; and that the only difference between letting the matter take that course and ratifying the treaty will be that under the treaty the United States would have cable rights on the island of Yap, whereas if she does not agree to the treaty she will be denied those rights. I have already said that, in my opinion, any cable rights that we may acquire under this treaty will not prove of practical benefit to American commerce.

The United States at the close of the World War had an interest as one of the conquerors in all the territory that was conquered from Germany. It may be that under the rules of international law the particular nation which took possession of enemy territory acquired exclusive rights by conquest in that particular territory, but the policy has been pursued by the Allies since the signing of the armistice of recognizing all German territory surrendered as the joint property of the allied and associated powers; that is, of the four allied powers and of the United States. For the most part this principle was recognized by the various powers, although Japan never seemed to have recognized that the United States had any right or any interest in the island of Yap. If the United States wants to use Yap as a base for cable communications with the Orient, the correct plan would be the Wilson plan, the plan that Secretary Hughes approved, to internationalize the island. Of course I recognize that the term "internationalize" is more or less indefinite; but, considering the status of political and commercial affairs between this Nation and Japan, considering the course of conduct that Japan has pursued toward China and Siberia, and the policy of aggression that she long ago initiated when she first woke from the sleep of centuries and began to feel her strength, the policy of commanding and dominating the spheres of influence into which she entered, I have not the slightest doubt that it would be better for the United States to wash her hands of these islands and to give Japan unlimited rights there rather than to sow deeply the seeds of controversy which may arise hereafter to confuse us. In this respect this treaty may prove of the utmost importance.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield at that point?

Mr. ROBINSON. I take pleasure in yielding.

Mr. ASHURST. Along that very line the Senator from Arkansas will not forget that one of the blackest pages in history was written by Japan respecting Korea. Chosen (Korea) was an independent sovereign nation for 4,215 years; in 1882 she made a treaty of amity and commerce with the United States, which was recognized by Japan, by which she was recognized as an independent power, and the claims of China to Korea were distinctly rejected and disapproved. In the Chino-Japanese War in 1895 the Japanese felt that it was necessary for them to penetrate China through Chosen, or Korea. Japan distinctly agreed on her honor, so far as faith and honor and treaties could bind a nation, that as soon as the war was over she would withdraw from Chosen, or Korea, but with damnable treachery, with unspeakable duplicity, within a few years thereafter she seized Korea and holds it and its 20,000,000 people by a firm hand; she spat upon her treaties, connived at the murder of the Korean Queen, and now expects us to take her word and believe her promises.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have already said that one reason which makes me loath to support the pending treaty is the fact that I do not believe any practical benefit will come through it to the United States, and that controversies may arise by reason of the treaty. There is another proposal that I think worthy of consideration in this connection. The claim of the United States to the right to be consulted in connection with the disposition of these islands, and particularly the island of Yap, was brought to the attention of the supreme council by former President Wilson, and that claim was totally ignored. Repeated requests were made that the terms of the proposed mandate be submitted to the United States before final action, which was a reasonable request, if it be conceded that the United States had any interest in the controversy, but all of those requests were ignored.

The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has asserted that this course, in utter disregard of any rights of the United States, or any claim of the United States, was taken by the supreme council and the league because it was necessary to consummate secret treaties, which were entered into in 1916 and 1917, before the United States became a party to the World War.

But, Mr. President, the United States had the right to have its request in this matter considered. It had not claimed, as the result of the victory to which her services had so greatly contributed, any reward; our Government had renounced all substantial indemnity; the Chief Executive had said that for the convenience of our commerce we wanted the instrumentalities of communication on the island of Yap so arranged and controlled that all nations seeking business in the Orient might have equal rights and equal opportunities. That proposal could not have been repugnant to the sense of justice of any fair mind, but it was discarded and disregarded. The United States was informed by France, Italy, and Great Britain, substantially, that a mistake had been made, and that, having already made the mistake, they were powerless to remedy it, and that the United States must go to Japan to secure any right or concession in the matter. That is exactly what we do in accepting this treaty. We abandon a valid claim of right for a humiliating concession.

Our blood and our resources contributed to the wresting from Germany of this territory. She recognized that fact, and all of the Allies recognized that fact, when in the treaty of Versailles Germany renounced not to them alone but to the United States and to them her overseas possessions. We wanted no territory; we wanted no foreign dominion. The one thing we did want was an opportunity to carry on trade with the Orient, an opportunity to vitalize and make mean something the policy of the open door with China. In practical results that is denied us by the terms of this treaty. Having a right equal to Japan in the first instance, a right to dictate terms to Japan with as much confidence as she might suggest terms to us, we have been placed in the pitiable attitude of approaching Japan for a concession, and accepting at her hands under her terms the right to build a cable and to send messages by cable to those in the Orient who trade with our nationals.

So long as American commerce does not compete with Japanese commerce no conflict need be feared as the outcome of this treaty, but the first day that Japan realizes that American goods are supplying the demands of the Orient in preference to Japanese goods, that day will witness the beginning of a distressing controversy growing out of this treaty and its construction.

It is said that during the war when nationals of Holland sent cablegrams to the United States offering orders for merchandise they were intercepted by a power friendly to the United States and that before the delivery of the cablegrams in the United States English merchants had visited Holland and offered their goods to the proposed purchasers.

Does anyone here think that Japan, with the power to control this subject, will encourage or promote the commerce of the United States in the Orient? Does anyone here feel that our commerce would be able to compete with that of Japan if we were compelled to rely for communication on the Yap cable?

If the Senator from Alabama is correct, if it be true that this treaty accomplishes nothing except to give the United States the consent of Japan to land and operate a cable at Yap, then it accomplishes nothing of benefit to the United States.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. It seems that this cable company is a private corporation, and it is urged as a reason why we should ratify this treaty that it is to be extended into China. The Senator knows the relationship just now between China and Japan. I should like to have him, if he will, address himself to this proposition: Is there not some danger that Japan, with her wonderful diplomacy, of which we have had such an illustration here at the recent conference, would secure control of that privately owned cable?

Mr. ROBINSON. Not only is that true, Mr. President, but through the control of that cable Japan would dominate Chinese commerce and prevent Americans from engaging successfully in Chinese commerce. The Senator from Georgia has expressed the very point I had in mind—that instead of this proving helpful to us, whenever our business becomes competitive with that of Japan in China we shall get no benefit from this cable or any other instrumentality of communication that Japan has the power to control, so that we are doing a useless thing as well as a thing that may prove dangerous in the end.

I have not the slightest prejudice against Japan or the people of Japan. Every student of history must be amazed at the progress which the Japanese have made during the last three-quarters of a century. We have seen them swarm out of their little island, cross the seas, and seize control of empires. Take the map of Europe and of Asia. Compare the area of the Japanese Empire at the beginning of its advancement with its present area. Take into consideration the foreign territory stretching over thousands of miles that she now controls.

Think of the ingenuity that her people have displayed, and then tell me where she ever turned back for a single day's march the measured tread and steady advance of her millions moving to the dismemberment of empires and to the domination of trade and commerce wherever she desired.

I have not the slightest disposition to see my country involved in controversy or in conflict with Japan; but I have no disposition, sir, to aid her or give encouragement to her in her advance against other peoples. I have no radical prejudice against the brown man, the Japanese; but, God knows, I have no disposition to aid the yellow race or any other race to overcome the men and the nationalities of the Caucasian race. By these treaties we are making Japan's dominance supreme throughout the Orient. By these treaties—and I refer particularly now to the four-power treaty—we are tying our hands and beating back our forces while Japan advances through Siberia, Manchuria, Korea, and other portions of the Orient.

Oh, no! The armament conference treaties are parts of a program by which Japan will become supreme in the Orient. I would not put my country at war to stop Japan's advances; but, on the other hand, I am not in haste to facilitate an arrangement which means her intrenchment in power over territory which in justice belongs to other friendly peoples.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the first article of the treaty.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	Moses	Reed
Brandeggee	Harris	Nelson	Robinson
Broussard	Hedlin	New	Sheppard
Bursum	Jones, N. Mex.	Newberry	Shortridge
Cameron	Jones, Wash.	Norbeck	Simmons
Capper	Kellogg	Norris	Smith
Caraway	Kendrick	Oddie	Sterling
Colt	Keyes	Overman	Swanson
Curtis	King	Page	Townsend
Ernst	Ladd	Pepper	Underwood
Fernald	Lenroot	Philpotts	Wadsworth
Fletcher	Lodge	Pittman	Warren
France	McKellar	Poindestler	Watson, Ga.
Gerry	McKinley	Ransdell	Weller
Gooding	McNary	Rawson	Willis

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] are detained from the Senate in attendance upon the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the first article of the treaty.

Mr. REED addressed the Senate. After having spoken some time,

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). The Senator from Arkansas suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Cameron	Cummins	France
Ball	Capper	Curtis	Frelinghuysen
Brandeggee	Caraway	Elkins	Gerry
Broussard	Colt	Ernst	Glass

Gooding	McKellar	Pepper	Swanson
Hale	McKinley	Phipps	Townsend
Harris	McLean	Pittman	Underwood
Harrison	McNary	Pomerene	Wadsworth
Heflin	Moses	Rawson	Warren
Jones, Wash.	Nelson	Reed	Watson, Ga.
Kellogg	New	Robinson	Watson, Ind.
Keyes	Newberry	Sheppard	Weller
King	Nicholson	Shortridge	Willis
Lenroot	Oddie	Smith
Lodge	Overman	Sterling

Mr. McNARY. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BURSUM], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] on account of official business connected with the Public Lands Committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who lives in the country some distance from the city, has been compelled to go to his home, and is unable to be in attendance upon the Senate at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I was reading—

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, would the Senator from Missouri prefer continuing his remarks to-morrow?

Mr. REED. I certainly should.

Mr. SWANSON. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not insist upon holding the Senate in session later to-night.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if I can get no agreement for a vote in a reasonable time, I must ask either for a vote now or that the discussion shall continue.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will yield to me, I should like to move that we take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator can make that motion, of course. I hope the motion will be defeated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator make that motion?

Mr. SWANSON. If I am permitted to do so, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia moves that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HARRISON and Mr. REED called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and vote "yea."

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW], and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANDELL]; and

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK].

Mr. KELLOGG (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. Not being able to obtain a transfer, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. GLASS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], and vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON of Indiana (after having voted in the negative). I have voted, but I discover that my pair, the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], is not in his seat. Therefore I transfer my pair to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], and permit my vote to stand.

Mr. HALE (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS].

Not being able to obtain a transfer, I am compelled to withdraw my vote.

Mr. COLT (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL]. In his absence I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BALL (after having voted in the negative). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. Not being able to obtain a transfer, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to ascertain whether the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have a general pair with that Senator and I will withhold my vote.

Mr. ERNST (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with my colleague [Mr. STANLEY], and in his absence I am compelled to withdraw my vote.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "yea."

Mr. KENDRICK (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted.

Mr. KENDRICK. I have a general pair with that Senator and I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 40, as follows:

YEAS—23.

Ashurst	Harris	Overman	Smith
Broussard	Harrison	Pittman	Swanson
Caraway	Heflin	Pomerene	Underwood
France	Jones, N. Mex.	Reed	Walsh, Mont.
Gerry	McKellar	Robinson	Watson, Ga.
Glass	Myers	Sheppard

NAYS—40.

Brandeggee	Jones, Wash.	New	Smoot
Bursum	Keyes	Newberry	Stanfield
Cameron	Ladd	Nicholson	Sterling
Capper	Lenroot	Oddie	Sutherland
Cummins	Lodge	Page	Townsend
Curtis	McKinley	Pepper	Wadsworth
Elkins	McLean	Phipps	Warren
Frelinghuysen	McNary	Polindexter	Watson, Ind.
Gooding	Moses	Rawson	Weller
Harrell	Nelson	Shortridge	Willis

NOT VOTING—33.

Ball	Edge	King	Simmons
Borah	Ernst	La Follette	Spencer
Calder	Fernald	McCormick	Stanley
Colt	Fletcher	McCumber	Trammell
Crow	Hale	Norbeck	Walsh, Mass.
Culberson	Hitchcock	Norris	Williams
Dial	Johnson	Owen
Dillingham	Kellogg	Ransdell
du Pont	Kendrick	Shields

So the Senate refused to take a recess.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I think it is very evident that every effort is going to be made to prevent the transaction of business on the part of the Senate, and it is probably impossible to amend the rules of the Senate so that a majority can legislate. There are, however, certain rules of the Senate which, if enforced, can possibly expedite its business. One of those rules is that no Senator shall speak more than twice on any measure during the same day. Another rule is that no Senator shall yield to another Senator except for a question.

The Senate can remain in recess. We can enforce those rules of the Senate, and I propose for one to try to enforce them. I dislike very much to do so, because no one hesitates more than I to do anything which seems to be contrary to the legitimate wishes of a Senator, but we sit here day after day and day after day waiting to get a vote on some matter which has been up for discussion for a long time and yet no result is reached. We try to have night sessions, and we are told that Senators who wish to talk are weary and do not want us to remain here any longer, and all kinds of tactics are employed to prevent action on the part of the Senate. It seems to me it is a gross misuse of senatorial courtesy. We have a rule of the Senate which says—

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. ROBINSON. I invoke the rule to which the Senator from Michigan has just referred, that the Senator from Missouri has no right to yield to the Senator from Michigan to make a speech, and that the Senator from Michigan is not asking the Senator from Missouri a question.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator from Missouri has not the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri yielded the floor for a motion to take a recess, and did not ask for recognition when the result was announced.

Mr. REED. I thought the Senator from Michigan had risen to make some suggestion with reference to an adjournment, and that is the reason why I did not. I did not understand that he was going to make a speech.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator from Missouri has forfeited the floor, my point of order does not apply. I understood that he was claiming the floor.

Mr. REED. I had the floor.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan declines to yield.

Mr. REED. There is a question of order pending. Let me state the situation. I had the floor when a Senator rose and suggested the absence of a quorum. Immediately after the announcement of the result of that quorum call, before I had any opportunity to resume the floor, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] made a motion to take a recess. As soon as that motion was disposed of, and when I was rising to my feet, the Senator from Michigan rose, and from his opening sentence I thought he was going to make a suggestion about an adjournment. Whatever advantage there may be in it, if the Senator wants to stand upon it, he may have it, but I assure him it will not be a very great one.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President—

Mr. TOWNSEND. I decline to yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to speak on the point of order.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I shall have to yield to the Senator for that purpose if the Chair desires to hear the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. I merely wish to say that I thought the entire Senate understood that the Senator from Missouri had not concluded his address, and that he expected to continue the discussion of the subject before the Senate. Of course, if the Chair holds that the Senator from Missouri failed to resume the floor, that he abandoned it, my point of order is not well taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] to state that if the Senator from Missouri would yield to him to make a motion to take a recess, he would make the motion. The motion to take a recess was made. The Chair looked toward the Senator from Missouri when the result was announced, and he did not rise. The Senator from Michigan did rise and address the Chair, so the Chair recognized him. That was all the Chair had to do.

Mr. REED. Let me state that when the suggestion of the absence of a quorum was made and the roll was called, I rose to my feet. The RECORD will not show that, but it is a fact. The Senator from Virginia then asked me if I desired to proceed to-night. I said I would prefer not to proceed, and thereupon he made a motion to take a recess. After that vote was taken I was rising to my feet when the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] took the floor, and, as I have stated, from his opening remark I thought he was going to make a suggestion that it was better to adjourn. He then proceeded with his speech. I kept my feet, and I did not protest out of politeness. Of course, if anyone desires to take advantage of my act of courtesy, he is perfectly welcome to whatever advantage he may get.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the circumstances, the Chair feels that he must overrule the point of order. The Senator from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, just a word in reference to the statement of the Senator from Missouri. It is very clear to everybody, it seems to me, that the Senator from Missouri yielded the floor for the Senator from Virginia to make the motion to take a recess. That motion was made. I did not rise precipitously. No one had taken the floor and I rose and started the suggestion I am about to make now.

I stated that we have one rule of the Senate which is known as a motion to lay on the table. When a majority of the Senate desire that some measure which is brought up either for delay or for what the majority may regard as an improper motive, a motion may be made to lay it on the table, the idea being that the Senate desires not to debate that question. That no longer accomplishes its purpose, however, in the Senate, because when a matter is tabled those who wish to speak upon it continue to discuss it just the same as though the motion had not been made and carried.

Now, we are charged with not being courteous, or probably will be, if we insist upon enforcing the rules of the Senate. But I repeat that there is no way to do business in the Senate under the rules unamended except by enforcing the few rules we do have.

I shall not be invidious in reference to the matter; I do not want to be; but I am going to insist, so far as it lies within my power, when I am on the floor, that the rules of the Senate which provide that no Senator shall speak more than twice on the same day and that he shall not yield to another Senator except for a question shall be enforced. Then I hope the majority of the Senate will continue in recess until we can dispose of the measures which come before the Senate. I think this is the least that the majority of the Senate can do. I trust that we shall be able at least to make some progress along this line.

I would not feel so deeply about this subject if all the Senators who discuss measures simply discussed the one before the Senate, but I propose that it shall be shown to the Senate how much time is occupied by Senators in discussing matters that are not before the Senate at all, how much time is occupied by a few individual Senators, and about how much it costs the country to hear their discussions or to have their discussions printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I have made this statement at the first opportunity I have had to-day, because I have felt it was proper to make it at this time. I shall insist, I repeat, that these two rules of the Senate shall be enforced, and if the majority are as desirous of expediting the business of the Senate, even to a small extent, we shall succeed.

Mr. REED resumed his speech. After having spoken for some time,

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is going into a very interesting discussion of a proposition touching this treaty. Would he not prefer to go on to-morrow? We have been here since 12 o'clock, and all the discussion to-day has been confined to this treaty. Would not the Senator prefer to go on to-morrow?

Mr. REED. Very much, and I have said so. I had expected to address the Senate upon this treaty, limiting myself absolutely to it. I have been unable to get some data I wanted, and I would not have taken the floor except that we were told we were to be forced to a vote to-night. Under those circumstances I am compelled to speak. I would make a very much shorter speech if I had a longer time in which to prepare it. I have no desire to keep the Senate here, but at the same time I have no disposition to be "bullied."

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask, if the Senator from Missouri will yield, will not the Senator from Massachusetts consent to a recess until to-morrow? There are very few speeches more to be made on this question, I understand. We shall get to a vote at a reasonable time.

Mr. LODGE. I am willing to make an agreement to vote or to vote now, but I do not wish to take a recess.

Mr. HARRISON. If we are going to proceed to discuss an important proposition at this time, such as the Senator from Missouri is discussing, we certainly ought to have more than five of the opposition Senators in their seats. So I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of order that that is out of order, because no business has intervened since the last quorum call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the Senate now take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. REED. I can not yield for that purpose if the rule is to be invoked and I should lose the floor, for I am told that if the Senate be in recess I can not resume it.

Mr. LODGE. The rule will certainly be invoked.

Mr. REED. It will not be the only time it will be invoked.

Mr. LODGE. I trust not. It has been invoked a great deal in the past. If the Senator from Missouri yields so that the Senator from Mississippi can make a motion, of course he loses the floor.

Mr. REED. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. Suppose I, having the floor, make the motion while I am on the floor, will I thereby yield the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That would be the ruling of the Chair, if the Senator yielded the floor for the purpose of making the motion.

Mr. REED. I would yield the floor, although I have the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; the Senator would yield the floor to make the motion. That would be the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. REED. You will have some difficulty in finding precedents to sustain that ruling.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator would lose the floor while the vote was being taken.

Mr. HARRISON. So the Senator from Massachusetts makes a point of order against my point of order that there is not a quorum present?

Mr. LODGE. I did make the point of order that the point of no quorum could not be made, because no business had intervened since the last quorum call.

Mr. HARRISON. Will not the Senator allow me to appeal to him to get more Members of the majority here, so that they can listen to the discussion and be able to vote intelligently on the question?

Mr. LODGE. There is no use in that. They would be brought in here and go out within five minutes. A filibuster is only attractive to those who are carrying it on.

Mr. REED. It is not a filibuster. I have not said one word to-day except on the pending treaty, save when I was interrupted by the Senator from Michigan, who proceeded to interject into my discussion a totally foreign matter, and I have just got through replying to that.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me?

Mr. REED. I yield for any purpose that I can without losing the floor.

Mr. CARAWAY. I wanted to ask the Senator a question. If the treaty which the Senator is discussing is, as the Senator from Massachusetts says, the assertion of a right and we have a one-fifth undivided interest in the island of Yap, when did it become a rule of this Nation to beg for what belongs to the Nation? If we have a one-fifth undivided interest in Yap and can not be divested of it by the act of other people without assenting to it ourselves, why is it necessary to have a treaty to exercise our right over the island of Yap?

Mr. REED. There is clearly no necessity of a treaty to exercise a right which we have.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator from Massachusetts is right, and we have a one-fifth undivided interest, an absolute right to it, then why do we have to beg for the right to exercise any dominion over what belongs to us? When did it become the policy of this Nation to beg for the right to exercise sovereignty over what belongs to the United States?

Mr. REED. I can not answer that.

Mr. CARAWAY. And if we do not own it—and I do not think we do—if we ratify the treaty because we admit we have no right to it, then we have no right to anything which came to the allied and associated powers by the war, have we?

Mr. REED. I think not.

Mr. CARAWAY. One or the other of those things is absolutely true. I am curious to know under what theory we are asked to ratify this treaty if we must beg for the privilege of exercising the right, or if we have no right at all. Under which theory are we asked to ratify the treaty?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri permit me?

Mr. REED. I will yield for any purpose which does not take me off the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand, and I do not want to take the Senator off the floor. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts, with the consent of the Senator from Missouri, if the Senator from Massachusetts would not agree and could we not get a unanimous-consent agreement that at a certain time, say Wednesday, day after to-morrow, the speeches on the treaty shall be limited—fixing a limit for the speeches? And then we will get to a vote.

Mr. LODGE. I will agree to a time to take a vote—that is, within a reasonable space—or I shall try to sit here as steadily as I can in order to get a vote. It is tiresome and disagreeable, I know, and I dislike it as much as anybody, but we can not get on with the business which I want to get disposed of unless we can make some agreement to vote.

Mr. HARRISON. What suggestion has the Senator to make?

Mr. LODGE. I am waiting for a suggestion from those who are asking for time. I am ready to vote now.

Mr. HARRISON. I thought I had made a very reasonable suggestion. Let us agree that beginning Wednesday at 12 o'clock speeches shall be limited to one hour.

Mr. LODGE. No; I want an agreement to vote.

Mr. HARRISON. Then what would the Senator suggest about that?

Mr. LODGE. I shall be glad to consider any offer the other side desires to make.

Mr. HARRISON. What would the Senator suggest about voting at a certain time on Thursday?

Mr. LODGE. I should not wish to make an agreement for a time later than Wednesday.

Mr. HARRISON. Then the suggestion of the Senator is that we shall agree to vote about Wednesday, at 5 o'clock?

Mr. LODGE. I am making no suggestion.

Mr. HARRISON. I was in hopes the Senator would.

Mr. LODGE. I am waiting for a suggestion from my ever-ready friend from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. I made a suggestion and the Senator did not accept it.

Mr. LODGE. No; I will not accept any suggestion that does not fix a time to take a vote. But did the Senator suggest a vote at 5 o'clock Wednesday, without further debate?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I would like to have it reduced to writing, in correct form as the Secretary would prepare it, that we vote on the treaty and all reservations and amendments pending or to be offered and that all debate shall cease and the vote be taken not later than 5 o'clock on Wednesday next.

Mr. REED. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri has the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Did the Senator from Massachusetts offer some suggestion?

Mr. LODGE. I just want it written down; that is all.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Proposed unanimous-consent agreement—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a moment. Is it understood that the Senator from Missouri does not yield the floor?

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly ready to say that we will not invoke the rule if we can reach an agreement.

Mr. REED. I will take a chance on colloquies of this kind being carried on amongst gentlemen without anybody taking advantage of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Who is the Chair to understand is proposing the unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. REED. I think the Senator from Massachusetts is having one written out.

Mr. LODGE. At the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi, I propose the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. HARRISON. The suggestion I made was to vote on Thursday, but that after 12 o'clock on Wednesday the speeches shall be limited.

Mr. LODGE. I must ask for a time to vote. These limitations of debate are pretty indefinite.

Mr. HARRISON. Let the proposed unanimous-consent agreement be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 5 o'clock p. m. on the Calendar Day of Wednesday, March 1, 1922, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment or reservation that may be pending or any amendment or reservation that may be offered and upon the resolution of ratification presented by the Committee on Foreign Relations to Executive R, a treaty between the United States and Japan—

And so forth.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, under the rule we would have to call a quorum. So I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is not necessary.

Mr. LODGE. It is not necessary under the rule to call for a quorum. The rule applies only to unanimous-consent agreements with reference to votes on bills and joint resolutions.

Mr. HARRISON. Under the circumstances everyone ought to be here.

Mr. LODGE. Very well; I will not make any point of order about a call for a quorum. Let the roll be called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gooding	McNary	Shortridge
Brandegge	Harreld	Moses	Smith
Broussard	Harris	Myers	Stanfield
Bursum	Harrison	New	Sterling
Cameron	Heflin	Newberry	Sutherland
Capper	Johnson	Nicholson	Townsend
Caraway	Jones, Wash.	Norbeck	Wadsworth
Colt	Kellogg	Oddie	Warren
Curtis	Keyes	Overman	Watson, Ga.
Elkins	King	Page	Watson, Ind.
Ernst	Leafoot	Phipps	Weller
Fernald	Lodge	Pittman	Willis
Fletcher	McKellar	Rawson
France	McKinley	Reed
Gerry	McLean	Sheppard

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the request for unanimous consent. The Secretary will state the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 5 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Wednesday, March 1, 1922, the Senate will proceed to vote without further debate upon any amendment or reservation that may be pending, any amendment or reservation that may be offered, and upon the resolution of ratification reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations to Executive R, a treaty between the United States and Japan with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator, in particular the island of Yap, signed at Washington on February 11, 1922.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to entering into the proposed unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am not willing that the debate on the pending treaty shall be cut off on Wednesday without the right of any Senator thereafter to discuss an amendment or reservation. I have for a long time been protesting against that sort of agreement. We did have a form of agreement worked out here that was reasonably satisfactory. It was an agreement which would have limited the debate and permitted, after a certain time, a discussion of amendments or reservations for a very limited period. Such an agreement in the past has resulted in promptly reaching a vote on the pending matter.

I shall not object to that sort of an agreement, if the Senator from Massachusetts will modify his request so that on Wednesday the debate shall be limited, no Senator to be permitted to speak more than 30 minutes on the treaty or reservations or amendments after that time.

Mr. LODGE. After 5 o'clock?

SEVERAL SENATORS. After 2 o'clock.

Mr. REED. No; after 5 o'clock on Wednesday, and that we shall vote not later than 2 o'clock on Thursday.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have gone to the limit, I think, in extending the time to 5 o'clock on Wednesday. If the Senator from Missouri objects to that, I am afraid we shall have to go right on.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Missouri yield to me?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts a moment ago to have an open heart and mind with respect to suggestions to limit the debate to some time on Thursday. I thought the Senator, perhaps, would accept the suggestion made by the Senator from Missouri. The Senator from Missouri only suggested that after 5 o'clock on Wednesday the time of debate by any Senator be limited to 30 minutes on any reservation or amendment, and that a vote be taken not later than 2 o'clock, say, on Thursday. Such an agreement as that would fix a definite time to vote on the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. I do not see any reason for carrying it over until Thursday. There are no reservations pending, no amendment is pending, and, as I understand, no amendment will be offered. I do not think there are enough votes here to defeat the treaty in that way.

Mr. HARRISON. It may be that we can get a vote earlier.

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly willing, say, after 2 o'clock on Wednesday, to limit the time for discussion on reservations or amendments, and then to vote at 5 o'clock. That is all I want to get—a vote on the treaty at 5 o'clock.

Mr. HARRISON. Will not the Senator modify his request for unanimous consent as has been indicated?

Mr. LODGE. I shall not object to extending the time to 6 o'clock, if that will make the Senator feel any better.

Mr. HARRISON. No; I am merely trying to help to secure an agreement on some proposition. We can, I think, agree to take a final vote on this matter at 2 o'clock on Thursday.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I trust the Senator from Massachusetts will agree to that proposition. I understand the difficulties that attend the situation, but, after all, the more talk the worse the situation of Senators on the other side will be; so I trust the Senator will permit the debate to run on until Thursday.

Mr. LODGE. What was the proposition?

Mr. HARRISON. I had hoped the Senator would modify his request so that a vote shall be taken at not later than 2 o'clock on Thursday, and that after, say 4 o'clock or 5 o'clock on Wednesday, no Senator shall speak longer than 30 minutes on any amendment or reservation.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, at the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], I will accept that proposition, asking only that if at any time—because I intend to keep the treaty steadily before the Senate—no Senator cares to discuss it, then it may be in order to speak on the next treaty which will come before the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is not endeavoring to incorporate that suggestion into the agreement?

Mr. LODGE. No; I do not ask to incorporate that suggestion in the agreement.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Does not the proposed agreement in express terms state that a vote shall be taken not later than 2 o'clock on Thursday?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. So that if debate shall be closed prior to that hour the vote may be taken earlier. Is not that correct?

Mr. HARRISON. That was the suggestion, as I understood the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Of course, if the Senator from Missouri has any objection, that could not be done.

Mr. LODGE. We shall secure a final vote at 2 o'clock on Thursday.

Mr. PITTMAN. As I understand, under the proposed agreement a definite hour is fixed to vote on Thursday, is it not?

Mr. LODGE. At not later than 2 o'clock on Thursday.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. At not later than 2 o'clock.

Mr. SMITH. May I suggest that it would be better to fix a definite time?

Mr. LODGE. A time has been fixed, at not later than 2 o'clock on Thursday.

Mr. SMITH. Under the terms of the proposed agreement it would be possible to vote before that—

Mr. LODGE. That is perfectly safe.

Mr. SMITH. And if that be so, some Senators might be absent at the time of the vote, whereas if there were a definite hour fixed for a vote they would all be here.

Mr. LODGE. I repeat, there is a definite time fixed at 2 o'clock.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. At not later than 2 o'clock. The Senator knows very well that if this arrangement can be made, the vote in all probability will not come before the hour fixed.

Mr. LODGE. If there is any time not occupied, we may discuss the four-power treaty.

Mr. HARRISON. Question!

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement as modified? The Chair hears none, and the agreement as modified is entered into.

Mr. REED. As I understand, then, the vote is to be taken on Thursday?

The VICE PRESIDENT. On Thursday at not later than 2 o'clock.

Mr. HARRISON. Let us have the agreement read. Some Senators say "at 2 o'clock" and some say "not later than 2 o'clock."

Mr. LODGE. Not later than 2 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The agreement provides for a vote at not later than 2 o'clock.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well.

The agreement was reduced to writing, as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT.

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 2 o'clock p. m., on the calendar day of Thursday, March 2, 1922, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment or reservation that may be pending, any amendment or reservation that may be offered, and upon the resolution of ratification of Executive R, "A treaty between the United States and Japan with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean, lying north of the Equator, in particular the island of Yap, signed at Washington on February 11, 1922," and that after the hour of 5 o'clock on the calendar day of Wednesday, March 1, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 30 minutes upon the treaty, or more than once or longer than 30 minutes upon any reservation that may be offered thereto.

TREATIES AGREED ON BY WASHINGTON CONFERENCE.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to report favorably from the Committee on Foreign Relations the six treaties agreed to by the recent Washington conference and ask that they may go to the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The treaties will be received.

THE FOUR-POWER TREATY.

Mr. LODGE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the treaty with the British Empire, France, and Japan, relating to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the Pacific Ocean, reported the following resolution:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive N, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session, a treaty between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan relating to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the Pacific Ocean, concluded at Washington, December 13, 1921, subject to the following reservation and understanding, which is hereby made a part and condition of this resolution of ratification:

The United States understands that under the statement in the preamble or under the terms of this treaty there is no commitment to armed force, no alliance, no obligation to join in any defense.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

AGREEMENT SUPPLEMENTARY TO THE FOUR-POWER TREATY.

Mr. LODGE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the agreement between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan, supplementary to the treaty between the same four powers relating to their insular possessions and insular dominions, reported the following resolution:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive O, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session, an agreement between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan, supplementary to the treaty between the same four powers relating to their insular possessions and insular dominions, and defining the application of the term "insular possessions and insular dominions" as relating to Japan, signed at Washington February 6, 1922.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

THE FIVE-POWER TREATY.

Mr. LODGE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the treaty with the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, agreeing to a limitation of naval armament, reported the following resolution:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive L, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session, a treaty between the United States, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, agreeing to a limitation of naval armament, concluded at Washington February 6, 1922.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

TREATY ON SUBMARINES AND NOXIOUS GASES.

Mr. LODGE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the treaty with the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, relating to the use of submarines and noxious gases in warfare, reported the following resolution:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive M, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session, a treaty between the United States, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan relating to the use of submarines and noxious gases in warfare, concluded at Washington February 6, 1922.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

CHINESE CUSTOMS TARIFF TREATY.

Mr. LODGE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the treaty with Belgium, the British Empire, China, France, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, and Portugal, relating to the Chinese customs tariff, reported the following resolution:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive Q, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session, a treaty between the United States, Belgium, the British Empire, China, France, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, and Portugal, relating to the Chinese customs tariff, concluded at Washington February 6, 1922.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

TREATY CONCERNING CHINESE PRINCIPLES AND POLICIES.

Mr. LODGE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the treaty with Belgium, the British Empire, China, France, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, and Portugal, relating to principles and policies to be followed in matters concerning China, reported the following resolution:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive P, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session, a treaty between the United States, Belgium, the British Empire, China, France, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, and Portugal, relating to principles and policies to be followed in matters concerning China, concluded at Washington February 6, 1922.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

TREATY WITH JAPAN.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty between the United States and Japan with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator, in particular the island of Yap, signed at Washington on February 11, 1922.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the first article of the treaty with Japan.

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, unless some Senator wishes to continue now, I will make a motion that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest that the Senator make it 12 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HARRISON. Will not the Senator make it 12 o'clock? There are several important committees which will meet to-morrow.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Mississippi is always so appealing that I will modify my motion and move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow. I always agree to his suggestions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 28, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 27, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

The Lord reigneth; He is clothed with majesty; His world is established; it can not be moved and naught can shake His sure repose. Thy works are manifold and in wisdom Thou hast made them all and Thy glory shall endure forever. Clothe Thyself with silence as with a holy garment. Be known as very near and not far away. Be Thou a help not only to our senses, but to our deepest intuitions. Thus enable us to give the open proof of an intelligent and conscientious study of all problems. Show us the acceptable method, the wise way, and the divine order and out of the cloud that hides Thy face, be not silent unto us. Through Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, February 24, 1922, and of Sunday, February 26, 1922, was read and approved.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 10329, making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman conferred with the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER]?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes, I have; and this is entirely agreeable to him.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman know whether there are any radical amendments in the way of unusual appropriations which have been placed on this bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. The bill is about three and a half million dollars larger than when it left the House. I am frank to say to the gentleman that my own feelings, and I think they are the feelings of the conferees, as well, I understand, as of the House, are that the bill should not be increased by any such amount as that.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman going to give us an opportunity to vote on the three and a half million dollars extra which has been placed on the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. That covers a great number of items. I am in hope that in conference the increases may be largely eliminated.

Mr. BLANTON. The new proposed $40,000,000 water system and power system has not been placed on the bill, has it?

Mr. CRAMTON. No.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees: Mr. CRAMTON, Mr. FRENCH, and Mr. CARTER.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein an address delivered by Attorney General Daugherty at the banquet of the American Bar Association conference, held in this city last week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include an address of the Attorney General, Hon. H. M. Daugherty, at the banquet of the conference of the American Bar Association, February 24, 1922.

The address is as follows:

ADDRESS OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, HON. H. M. DAUGHERTY, AT THE BANQUET OF THE CONFERENCE OF THE AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, FEBRUARY 24, 1922.

THE AMERICAN BAR.

"Mr. President, Members of the American Bar Association and of the State Bar Associations.

"GENTLEMEN: I congratulate myself that I have the privilege of meeting with you here to-night as brother lawyers. The pressure of official duties gives me little opportunity for speech making, and I therefore do not seek occasions to make public addresses these days. However, I thank you for this invitation and for this opportunity, feeling full well that the inspiring support that you will give will be ample compensation for any message that I may bring to you.

"I have always held the legal profession in the highest esteem, and now, after having had the experience of nearly one year as Attorney General of the United States, I can say that I am prouder than ever not only of the law as a profession but of the American lawyer.

"The American lawyer, his ideals, and his conception of service, as well as his character and equipment, both intellectual and moral, are of paramount importance to every man who loves his country and cherishes its welfare. The very nature of constitutional government makes the mission of the lawyer one of fundamental importance. In a government of law and order the lawyer must occupy a commanding position. His relation to the State brings to him the call of public service. His relation to clients, in the private affairs of life, demand of him intellectual and moral qualities of the highest kind. Hence, it is altogether fitting that you should gather here, to the end that the standards of the American lawyer may be elevated to as high a point as possible. Your work is intensely unselfish and patriotic. You have come here, without pay and without expense to the public or to clients, and have taken common council together in this conference from all parts of our country, from your distant homes, not for benefit to yourselves, not to devise ways and means by which you yourselves can profit, but you have generously and unselfishly given of your time and of your thought and of yourselves to considering those things which make for the honor and efficiency of our profession. Your object is to establish a standard of our profession. Your object is to establish a standard so that the lawyer may be capable of responding to every call which his high position demands of him. This is, indeed, a serious and important work.

"I have at times been doubtful whether the American lawyer to-day is doing as much in the way of public service as the lawyers of an earlier day. This may be because we see only the outstanding figures of our profession of a former day.

"When I think of the fathers who framed the Constitution and of the splendid part of Hamilton, of Madison, of James Wilson, of Edmund Randolph, and others of that glorious group of young lawyers who drank deep at the fountain of human liberty and, with united mind, gave the world a new conception of a constitutional government founded upon law and order, strong and forceful, and yet with individual liberty protected, I see before me for all time the vision and the ideal and the conception of public service that should be held up to every young lawyer. In earlier times, because the very nature and foundation of his profession made him more capable than others to do so, the lawyer embraced the privilege of speaking, of seeking opportunity to inform the people of their Government, instructing and educating them, and impressing them with the necessity of each doing his part to sustain the stability of the Government and to preserve an unshaken faith in it. To the lawyer of the past we are indebted almost entirely for this accomplishment.

"Great as was the opportunity of the past, the service of the lawyer to his country, though less conspicuous and more humble, is equally imperative to-day. The needs of the hour are calling him to the support of his country, in defending her institutions, in inculcating faith among the people in these institutions, and in combating heresy and unsound notions of government that seek to undermine and destroy the work that the fathers and those who succeeded them have transmitted to us.

"The enemies of law and order are more active than ever before in sowing the poisons of lawlessness and unsound and experimental theories of government. These agencies have a small portion of the American press, and likewise their orators, scattering and propagating their vicious theories of government and casting unjustifiable reflections on men holding public office, with the intent to undermine the confidence of the people in them. These forces must be met and combated.

"In a democracy where practically there is universal suffrage, it is important that every citizen be imbued with sound and wholesome notions of government. On whom is it more fitting to call in the performance of this public service than upon the members of the American bar?

"In almost a year that I have served as Attorney General I have not called upon a single lawyer to render service to the Government, with or without pay, who has refused to do so. Their help to the Department of Justice has been marvelous and most highly appreciated. No man can succeed as Attorney General of the United States without both the assistance and the confidence of the American lawyer. That is why I say, whenever I speak to a body of lawyers, that I consider every reputable lawyer in the United States a part of the Department of Justice. During the past year I have had hearings, conferences, contact, and dealings with probably 1,000 lawyers, and I am happy to say, to their credit and for the widest publicity possible, that I have not yet found one of these lawyers untrustworthy, regardless of his interest in the cause or the nature of his employment.

"If the State requires such high and important service of the legal profession, the lawyer who meets these requirements must be possessed of that intellectual and moral equipment that makes him efficient in performing these duties. In no calling are courage and fidelity more essential than in the legal profession. We admire brilliancy, but, by comparison, we discount brilliancy while we hold integrity at a premium. It is a matter of public concern to the State that the lawyer be absolutely trustworthy, both as to his moral character and his intellectual ability. Clients must trust him and are frequently at his mercy. He must be trustworthy in his relations to private litigants, but, far more, he must be trustworthy in his ability to answer the call of his country in performing his part in molding wholesome and sound public sentiment.

"In these days when the exactions of business and commerce and industrial life are calling for so much of a lawyer's time and energy, there is great danger that he may forget the first requisite of his high and noble calling—that is, his duty to the State in inculcating sound notions and in educating the people and in forming correct public opinion, to the end that constitutional government may be preserved and its blessings disseminated among the people. The lawyer's first public service, as a class, does not consist in holding office, but in educating the people to sound and wholesome notions of government.

"The American lawyer, the educator, the clergy, and the press everywhere are the agencies for the dissemination of sound principles of government and for educating the people to resist all efforts to undermine our system of government, and to foment revolution against its true, tried, and trustworthy Constitution and traditions. Because of its ability to reach the people, the greatest educational facility in this or any other country is a sound and truthful press. Constitutional government rests on the intelligence of the people. Since the foundation of our Government, through the vicissitudes of storm and sunshine, to the present hour, a patriotic press has rendered most invaluable service to our country.

"The educational service that I have dwelt upon is especially important not only because of the nature of republican government under universal suffrage but because under the hospitable policy of our Government those born under other flags have come to our shores and participated in the freedom and liberty and resources of our country, and it is necessary that such people should be educated in our system of government and impressed with the benefits of that system. The education of all persons of this class is a prime necessity, and this call to public service is especially incumbent upon the lawyer.

"From the American bar comes its judiciary. The wise selection of judges must, in great measure, depend upon the bar. Politics is and should be purely incidental to the selection of the judiciary. Character, reinforced by a trained intellect and learning, fortified by moral uprightness and courage, and sustained by a clear vision of the serious responsibility of the judicial office, is a requisite that every judge should possess who sits in judgment in our country. I believe that this Government will stand as indestructible as our mighty hills and majestic mountains, and that there shall continue to flow from it benefits for our people as copious as the waters of our streams and rivers. I do not believe that any branch of our Government shall fail, but to the judiciary, more than to anything else, must we look for the preservation and perpetuation of our Government. A wise and courageous judiciary, resting on the confidence of the people, will save it from disintegration, revolution, and destruction.

"Speaking to you intimately, I do not know what the history of the Department of Justice as now constituted will be, but I can assure you that its greatest ambition is to be helpful in installing a judiciary which will be a credit to America and American institutions and to the profession of which we are all proud to belong. As an evidence of sincerity in this regard, I am proud to call attention to the standard established by the Chief Executive in the selection of that eminent statesman and sound jurist, ex-President Taft, as Chief Justice of the greatest court in the world.

"Therefore, since the American bar must furnish the judges for our judicial system, both State and national, and since from its ranks must come that vast concourse of young lawyers in the future who shall be the educative influence to mold public opinion in sound notions of government, it is of deep and grave concern to our Republic that the ranks of the American bar shall be recruited with young men who not only have the moral character that shall make them trustworthy in handling a client's cause but shall have that moral and intellectual endowment that shall make them able to respond to every call of their country."

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, in that connection I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an address delivered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] at Topeka, Kans. The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 9981) making appropriations for the Executive and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is the gentleman going to give the House an opportunity to vote on the $25,000 proposition, an initial proposition, looking to the construction of a bridge from here to Arlington?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I would say to the gentleman from Texas that if the House desires to vote upon the proposition, it will have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. BLANTON. That is a $10,000,000 proposition.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Oh, no; it is a $25,000 proposition.

Mr. BLANTON. But that $25,000 is just for a preliminary survey to expend $10,000,000 later on in building a bridge.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The gentleman is entirely mistaken with reference to the possibility of this appropriation. The purpose of this appropriation is to make the investigation and find out the very thing that the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman understands that if that report is favorable, then we will be pledged in a way to expend the $10,000,000 for the bridge.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not understand that we will be obliged to do any such thing. As far as the appropriation the gentleman fears is concerned, that will have to take care of itself when it comes.

Mr. BLANTON. There is one other matter I want to inquire about: An amendment has been placed on the bill at the other end of the Capitol providing that the President of the United States may use any part, in his discretion, of the $25,000 set apart now every year for railroad expenses in public entertainment. Is the gentleman going to give us an opportunity to vote on that matter in the House?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The House will have an opportunity to vote on that, as it will on all these other matters. I expect there will be some bigger problems than that $25,000 matter in this conference.

Mr. BLANTON. There will not be any problem that is bigger in principle to the American people than that concerning the $25,000 for public entertainment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. GARNER. Has the gentleman talked with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON]?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I spoke to Mr. HARRISON; yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, can the gentleman tell us whether the conferees are going to insist upon the House position in regard to the amendment providing that articles which can be produced or repaired cheaper in navy yards and arsenals shall be so produced and repaired?

I understand in the Senate a substitute for it was adopted which does not carry out the wishes of the House in any respect or in a very slight respect.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have always understood it to be the duty of the conferees to maintain and insist upon the position maintained by the House, and I do not think there will be any exception as far as this is concerned.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman agree to bring this back? It is a very important amendment and I think it is a reasonable request.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will agree with the gentleman that it is a very important amendment. I believe that the gentlemen who are the proponents of this amendment will now agree that the amendment carried and passed by the House would have been impossible; but, so far as I am one of the conferees, I will be glad to see that the wishes of the House are maintained and, if not, I will bring it back to the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will defer his request for a little while. I know the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]—

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee spoke to me about some matter connected with this bill, which is not clear to me at this moment, and if the gentleman will defer his request—

Mr. GARNER. There were two amendments put in the House bill by Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, General Accounting Office and Shipping Board, and they refer to the limitation of salaries, as I recall it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Put back in the House bill.

Mr. GARNER. Now, it does seem to me we ought to have some assurance about those amendments before the bill goes to conference, knowing the conferees are not in sympathy with the views of the House, and for that reason Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee wanted an opportunity to talk with the gentleman about the matter before it went to conference.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will be glad to defer it.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 165. Joint resolution authorizing the erection on public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a statue of Edmund Burke.

The message also announced that the Senate had concurred in the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives:

House concurrent resolution 42.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the thanks of Congress be given to the State of Florida for the statue of Gen. E. Kirby Smith.

Resolved, That the statue be accepted in the name of the United States, to remain in the Statuary Hall in the Capitol of the Nation, and that a copy of these resolutions, suitably engrossed and duly authenticated, be forwarded to his excellency the governor of the State of Florida.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2265) to regulate marine insurance in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 2265. An act to regulate marine insurance in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the Clerk to read what I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CANNON asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 10267) making appropriations for the legislative branch for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, with Senate amendments, to disagree to the Senate amendments and request a conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk announced the following conferees: Mr. CANNON, Mr. ANDERSON, and Mr. GALLIVAN.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a decision from the United States District Court at Boise, Idaho, with reference to the right of the Reclamation Service to condemn land for a proposed new town site.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks for the purpose indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, upon request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LYON], I desire to ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter from Mr. Frederick E. Engsthrum with reference to a proposed contract for the purchase and the lease of Muscle Shoals.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Military Affairs is now considering this subject and is reviewing the entire subject and is receiving from day to day proposals relative to Muscle Shoals. These proposals have not been printed in the RECORD. Why does the gentleman deem it important at this time to put one particular one in the RECORD?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I am only doing it at the request of my colleague from North Carolina, who is absent.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman withhold his request to-day? I do not know I shall object.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I will withhold it.

TRANSFER OF BILL FROM HOUSE TO UNION CALENDAR.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 3164) be transferred from the House Calendar to the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3164) supplemental to an act entitled "An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes" (Public, No. 215, 66th Cong.), approved May 22, 1920.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that this bill be referred to the Union Calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I assume that is where it belongs, on the Union Calendar.

Mr. LEHLBACH. That is the purpose of requesting the transfer.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It does not carry a charge on the Treasury?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not see it on its face.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Of course, it is within the judgment of the Chair, but somebody might raise the point, if the bill came up for consideration. The fact is that it provides in certain instances for reinstatement of employees heretofore separated from the service. If those employees are reinstated, of course, they will be paid salaries that they are not now being paid. The inference is and the practical result will be that those who supplanted them will be dropped from the service, but this does not expressly appear in the bill, and consequently on the face of the bill it may apparently involve the expenditure of money.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the transfer. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business in order on Calendar Wednesday may be in order instead on Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the business regularly in order on Calendar Wednesday be in order to-morrow instead. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the request is to set aside next Calendar Wednesday and have the business in order to-morrow?

Mr. MONDELL. That was my request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There will be only one Calendar Wednesday this week?

Mr. MONDELL. That is all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

POTOMAC INSURANCE CO.

The SPEAKER. This is District of Columbia day, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] is recognized.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill S. 1312 in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to take up in the House as in the Committee of the Whole a bill which the Clerk will report.

Mr. BLANTON. Is that the pawnbrokers' bill?

Mr. FOCHT. No.

Mr. BLANTON. What bill is it?

Mr. WALSH. Let the Clerk report it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1312) to amend the charter of the Potomac Insurance Co. of the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman that this bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 1312) to amend the charter of the Potomac Insurance Co. of the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to incorporate a fire insurance company in Georgetown, in the District of Columbia," approved the 2d of March, 1831, and the act entitled "An act to amend the charter of the Potomac Fire Insurance Co. of Georgetown," approved the 3d of March, 1837, and the act entitled "An act to renew and continue in force the charter of the Potomac Insurance Co. of Georgetown, D. C.," approved the 25th of March, 1870, and the act entitled "An act to change the name of the Potomac Insurance Co. of Georgetown, and for other purposes," approved the 10th day of March, 1900, be, and the same are hereby, amended so as to grant to the Potomac Insurance Co. of the District of Columbia, in addition to the powers, privileges, and immunities granted to the said company in and by its original act of incorporation, as amended, full power and authority to make insurances against lightning, windstorm, tornado, cyclones, earthquake, hail, frost, or snow, civil riot and commotion, and by explosion, whether fire ensues or not (except upon steam boilers and pipes, flywheels, engines, and machinery connected therewith or operated thereby, against explosion and accident, and except against loss or damage to life or property resulting therefrom, and except against loss of use and occupancy caused thereby); and also against loss or damage by water to any goods or premises arising from the breakage or leakage of sprinklers, pumps, or other apparatus erected for extinguishing fires, and of water pipes, and against accidental injury to such sprinklers, pumps, or other apparatus; also insurance upon automobiles, whether stationary or being operated under their own power, which shall include all or any of the hazards of fire, explosion, transportation, collision, loss by legal liability for damage to or resulting from the maintenance and use of automobiles, and loss by burglary or theft, or both, but shall not include loss by reason of bodily injury to the person; and to effect reinsurances of any risks taken by it; and the said company shall have full power and authority to make and effect any and all of the above-described insurances and reinsurances.

SEC. 2. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act at any time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MILLSPAUGH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

POLICEMEN'S AND FIREMEN'S RELIEF FUND.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 7850 be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that there be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7850) to equalize pensions of retired policemen and firemen of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not think it ought to be taken up in this way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7850, with Mr. LONGWORTH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7850, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7850) to equalize pensions of retired policemen and firemen of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the passage of this act all retired and pensioned policemen of the District of Columbia who were retired or pensioned in accordance with laws enacted prior to December 5, 1919, shall be entitled to the same rating and benefits and receive pensions equal in amount to the pensions now being granted or that may be hereafter granted to policemen retired or pensioned since the passage of the act of December 5, 1919, and all retired and pensioned firemen of the District of Columbia who were retired or pensioned in accordance with laws enacted prior to January 24, 1920, shall be entitled to the same rating and benefits and receive pensions equal in amount to the pensions now being granted, or that may be hereafter granted to firemen retired or pensioned since the passage of the act of January 24, 1920, and all such retired and pensioned policemen and firemen shall also be entitled to all pension benefits resulting from any and all increase in pay that may hereafter be granted by Congress to the policemen and firemen of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That all acts and parts of acts to the extent that they are inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIEHLMAN].

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, this bill, as the title indicates, is to equalize the rate of pension paid to retired policemen and firemen in the District of Columbia. In 1916 Congress passed a law providing that all firemen and policemen injured in the course of their duty and all firemen and policemen who had reached the age of 60 years and served not less than 25 years and no longer fitted for active service should be retired and receive a rate of pension equivalent to 50 per cent of the salary they were receiving at the time of their retirement. Provision was made for a fund, to be known as the policemen and firemen's retirement fund, and 1½ per cent was deducted from the salary of policemen and firemen in the District and set aside in this fund. It was also provided that all fines levied against members of the two departments should be likewise put into this fund, and Congress annually appropriates a sum sufficient to make up the difference in the amount contributed by the members of the two departments and the amount of assessments and fines received. In 1919 Congress passed a law increasing the salary paid to firemen and policemen in the District, so that the members who have been retired since 1919 receive a higher rate of pension than those retired previous to that time. Your committee felt that the men who had been retired prior to 1919 had rendered the same degree of service to the District as those retired since and were entitled to the same rate of pension.

Mr. WALSH. What committee reported that 1919 bill?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. That was an amendment to the appropriation bill, chapter 443, of the acts of 1916, first session. It was a very long amendment to one of the appropriation bills—the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

Mr. WALSH. Was it put on in the Senate or in the House?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I could not say as to that.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will.

Mr. SNELL. How much is the difference in the retired pay under the new act and the old one?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The majority of the men who were retired under the old act receive from $45 to $50 a month. Those retired since the increase receive, most of them, according to their grade, of course, about $69 a month.

Mr. SNELL. An increase of about 50 per cent?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. An increase from $50 to $69 in many cases and in some cases an increase from $45 to $69.

Mr. SNELL. What will be the cost?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The total cost to the District, according to the District auditors, will be approximately $41,000 per year; but I will state to the gentleman that this sum will yearly grow less, because many of the old pensioners are dying off; the men are aged, and some of them have been seriously injured in performing their duties; and this should gradually grow less.

Mr. SNELL. What was the reason these men were not taken care of when the bill was passed in 1919?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The act of 1919, so far as I know, made no allusion to the question of the retirement pay because the act of 1916 provided that they should receive 50 per cent of their salary at the time of their retirement.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand, this is to take care of the ones that were retired previous to that law?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. To put them on an equal basis.

Mr. SNELL. Why were they not all put on an equal basis at the time the law was passed?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. They were put on an equal basis at the time the law was passed, but since that Congress has granted an increase in the basic pay of the firemen and policemen, and they receive more at the time of their retirement because of that increase than the men who were retired previous to the passage of the increased salaries bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman spoke of this bill costing the District $41,000 a year.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I mean the District and the Federal Government jointly.

Mr. BLANTON. How much will it cost the Federal Government—that is, the whole people of the United States?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that that is entirely dependent on the will of Congress. The House has determined this year that the District shall pay 60 per cent and the Federal Government 40 per cent. Next year they may say 70 per cent and 30 per cent.

Mr. BLANTON. In that connection, may I ask the distinguished gentleman from Maryland whether it is a fact that the commissioners are insisting now on doing away with that 60-40 plan and have pending such a proposition before the District Committee to do away with that plan and go back to the old 50-50 basis?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I never heard of such a bill. There is a bill pending before the committee of which the gentleman is a member abolishing the present ratio plan, but it is no such bill as the gentleman speaks of. It goes to the other extreme.

Mr. BLANTON. Can the gentleman tell us how many policemen there are now?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Four hundred and twenty-six policemen and—

Mr. BLANTON. I mean how many are on the pension roll?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Three hundred and seven on the pension roll.

Mr. BLANTON. How many are there that are not on the pension roll?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I would not want to give the gentleman any figures.

Mr. BLANTON. Out of which we draw these retired officers after they have reached the age of 60?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. It is the total number of policemen on the roll.

Mr. BLANTON. Can you give that?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Not the actual number, no; I could not give you accurate information on that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Are the police now under any circumstances retired on their own application? If so, for what?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The act provides for a board of examiners who shall examine an applicant who may apply for retirement and who pass upon his physical fitness to perform the duties of the department to which he is assigned; and in many cases, I will say to the gentleman, the application is refused, because the examining board determines that the man is capable physically of performing the duties and refuses the application. I know of quite a number of such cases personally.

Mr. MANN. Everybody wants to get on the retired list, then?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. No.

Mr. MANN. What proportion of the police force of the District is now on the retired list?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Well, there are 307 pensioners on the roll, and I will state to the gentleman that many of those are women and children, who are also provided for in the policemen and firemen's retirement act.

Mr. MANN. How many policemen are now on the retired roll?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Three hundred and seven, including the women and children. I have the actual figures here.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is not quite accurate, I think. Three hundred and seven on the police roll; how many of those are former policemen?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] for 10 additional minutes?

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will give the gentleman those figures. There are 146 retired members of the police department on the pension roll at the present time, and 161 widows and orphans, who would not be affected by the provisions of this bill.

Mr. MANN. They would not be affected?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Not as I understand the bill, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Well, that is an important matter to know. Of course the bill says "all retired policemen."

Mr. ZIHLMAN. "Policemen and firemen"; it says nothing about widows and children.

Mr. MANN. The women and children are not very well organized.

Mr. SNELL. I think it is very important to know whether it does affect widows and orphans.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I want to say, in answer to that interrogation, that the members of the police and fire departments are not active in pushing this bill, because it is not important to the present members of those departments. Capt. Mitchell, who died a few weeks ago, was extremely active in presenting this bill before the committee and in getting action upon it.

Mr. MANN. I suppose my friend from Maryland would not deny that the men now on the retired list have been fairly active in regard to this legislation?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Not more than two members of the force on the retired roll have ever spoken to me, but Capt. Mitchell, whom many of you knew, who died a few weeks ago, was extremely active in behalf of this bill.

Mr. MANN. Did the committee have hearings on this bill?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes. They had a hearing.

Mr. MANN. Who advocated the passage of the bill before the subcommittee, may I ask, in a general way?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The retired members and Capt. Mitchell, who was not on the pension roll. And I also took the matter up with the District Commissioner, Capt. Oyster, who has charge of the firemen and policemen.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for another question, please?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Under the present law what effect does it have on the widows and orphans of a retired man? Do they receive a pension?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. They receive a very small pension.

Mr. SNELL. What is that pension?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. It varies. It is in the discretion of the board of examiners. In some cases it is $4 a month and in other cases $12; but the commissioners were authorized to pay up to as high as $35 per month to widows, and to each child under 16 years of age not exceeding $10 per month, but in no case shall the amount paid to any family exceed $50 per month.

Mr. SNELL. What pension does the widow of a policeman draw?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. In most cases it is around $12 per month.

Mr. SNELL. How much does the widow of a policeman under the old law draw?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. This act does not affect the status of widows and orphans who are receiving pensions. It applies only to firemen and policemen.

Mr. SNELL. This bill says they "shall be entitled to the same rating and benefits and receive pensions equal in amount to the pensions now being granted or that may be hereafter granted," and so forth.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. But before that it says "firemen and policemen."

Mr. SNELL. Under the first act widows of policemen and firemen would draw $12 a month?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes; according to the allowance of the board.

Mr. SNELL. Was it not based on the original pension received by the widow's husband? Did not that have something to do with it?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will state to the gentleman that in my investigation of the act I found that originally they were pensioned from a fund created by a percentage of the salaries of the members of the force and from fines collected from members of the force and from some other class of police fines. This fund was often exhausted, and there were times when for months these widows did not receive anything. Then when the fund was replenished they did receive the allowance granted them.

Mr. SNELL. Does not the gentleman expect that under this act the widows of retired members of the force will receive increased compensation over what they have previously received?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Not unless Congress amends the act so as to include them.

Mr. SNELL. Is it not intended to include them under the present wording of this bill?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I think not.

Mr. SNELL. Does not the gentleman know? I think we ought to know about it.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I am not a lawyer, but that is my judgment.

Mr. SNELL. I think some one should tell us.

Mr. MANN. Tell what?

Mr. SNELL. Whether the widows of former members of the force are included and their pensions increased under this act?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. No.

Mr. MANN. I can not answer that question, but I can tell the gentleman that if this act passes it will not be long until they are included in some other act.

Mr. FOCHT. I hope that is true.

Mr. SNELL. I want to get some information from the gentleman from Maryland as to what this act does.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I tried to make it clear that it applies to retired policemen and firemen.

Mr. SNELL. Does it not also apply to their widows?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. No.

Mr. MANN. Is one and one-half per cent of the salaries of policemen and firemen deducted from their pay as a contribution toward the retirement fund?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes; it goes into the retirement fund.

Mr. MANN. One and a half per cent?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to register my protest again against the unequal and unfair proportion of the expenses of this big city of 437,000 people, many of whom have no connection whatever with this Government except to make all the money out of it that they can, that is borne annually by the whole people of the United States.

Mr. FOCHT. The gentleman from Texas asked me a question a while ago. I wish to say that a bill in regard to the division of cost of running the District government is over from the Senate, but not in the proportion of 60 to 40. They assess the property of the District what they think it ought to be assessed, as in any other city, and the Government pays the balance. That bill is over from the Senate, but it has not been considered by the District Committee.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not want that in my remarks right now.

Mr. FOCHT. The gentleman may strike it out if he wants to. He asked me for information, and I have given it.

Mr. BLANTON. I will discuss that with the gentleman a little later.

A few months ago I called attention to a few of the projects which the commercial side of the life of the District of Columbia had in mind to put over on the people of the United States if they could. For instance, there were three certain tracts of land which syndicates here had acquired and which they were trying to unload upon the District of Columbia at enormous profits, and I warned the House then that unless we were careful those tracts of land would be purchased and the whole people of the United States called upon to pay at least 40 per cent of their cost. If my colleague has been reading the papers lately he will have noticed that at the other end of the Capitol within the last two weeks three certain bills have been passed for the purchase of these three parks to which I have referred, unloading the land on the people, and the Government will have to pay. I am in favor of parks. I think we ought to have them, but I am not in favor of men banding themselves together in syndicates for the purpose of unloading land on the Government.

I called attention to the fact that there was a movement on foot to take up bodily the Botanical Garden down here at the foot of Capitol Hill and move it out 4 or 5 miles into the country, where nobody could find it, so that people who have land out there can unload it on the Government. With the Botanical Garden now situated here in the heart of the city, right at the head of Pennsylvania Avenue, adjacent to the Peace Monument, tourists who come here to visit the Capitol get the benefit of the Botanical Garden. They go through it and see it and enjoy it; but if you move it out where it is contemplated to move it no one will ever find it, not even a Member of Congress. He will not know how to take his constituents out there if they come here.

Mr. SNYDER. Where is it contemplated to move it?

Mr. BLANTON. About 5 miles from here.

Mr. KING. Is not that one of the plans of the Fine Arts Commission? Are they not among the chief advocates of that idea?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sure that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] is so level-headed on every other proposition that they have not won him over yet to the proposition of moving the Botanical Garden out somewhere where somebody has some land and where the Botanical Garden will be lost. I am sure the gentleman is not in favor of that, but if he does not watch out he will be called upon here within the next few weeks to vote upon just such a measure, because already three such measures have been passed providing for the purchase of other similar lands that are being unloaded on the Government.

I called attention in the same connection several months ago to the fact that they were arranging then to build another $10,000,000 bridge across the Potomac. They won over President Harding and they won over the main power here in the House, the main one that it was necessary to win over [Mr. MANN], and they have a preliminary appropriation in the very bill that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Wood] sent to conference to-day, an initial appropriation of $25,000 in the independent offices appropriation bill; and when that $25,000 is spent you are going to have to spend the other $10,000,000 in a very short time to build that bridge. It is an unnecessary bridge. Your constituents are going to have to pay the great bulk of it—your constituents and mine—and I am not in favor of it.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I take it the gentleman does not contend that if we appropriate the $25,000, that appropriation will authorize the construction of a bridge without further action of Congress?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no.

Mr. KING. It is the opening wedge.

Mr. BLANTON. But it will come just as a matter of course, as the gentleman from Illinois knows.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says the bridge will cost $10,000,000. Does not my friend think, in view of the agitation, that it might be desirable to ascertain what would be the cost of such a bridge?

Mr. BLANTON. If a bridge is not necessary in the first place, and if it ought not to be built, and if the people's $10,000,000 necessary to build it ought not to be spent, I am not willing to waste $25,000 in an initial experiment to find out about it. The gentleman from Illinois used to be that way himself when he first came here, but unfortunately in his declining days now he takes things easy, and now in a few days when the sunshine comes he will be out in his garden—

Mr. MANN. That is right, and the first correct statement the gentleman has made. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. He is forgetting about the problems of the people concerning which he used to exercise himself much in the long ago. I am still concerned about them. I have not been here so long that I have forgotten the people.

Mr. MANN. And the people have not forgotten the gentleman; they can not.

Mr. BLANTON. If I have kept them from forgetting me I have been following in the footsteps of the distinguished leader on the other side of the aisle, because his people have never forgotten him, and that is proper.

Now, I want to call attention to this fact. If you read the Washington newspapers you have noticed that they are filled with whole page advertisements that they carry daily and every Sunday, paid for largely by the Government's money that is spent here in Washington because the merchants get it from the people who get it out of the Treasury. Count up the page advertisements and you can see why they are concerned in having as much money spent in Washington as they can induce Congress to appropriate. Read the papers during the last few weeks and you will see the move on foot to have increased appropriations for paving new streets way out in the suburbs where the rich contractors have lately put up whole lines of new dwellings that they hope to sell to people at $15,000 and $20,000 apiece on long time. They are expecting your constituents and mine to spend at least 40 per cent of the District's cost of paving these streets out in the suburbs.

I am not willing for my people to do it. The streets of Washington ought to be paved and the alleys ought to be paved and the sidewalks ought to be paved, and in most of it they are, but Washington people ought to pay for it. Whenever the people in my home city get their streets and alleys and sidewalks paved they pay for it themselves, and do not ask your people in Illinois or Pennsylvania or New York or Massachusetts to pay a part of it. Yet the 437,000 people in Washington for every improvement they make want the whole people of the United States to bear some proportion of the burden. Right now they are carrying on this propaganda to spend $40,000,000 on a power plant because a syndicate has gone out on the river at Great Falls and bought all the land for a mere song, and now want to unload it on the Government of the United States at an enormous profit. I want to say that it behooves us to keep our eyes open on these propositions.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question in relation to the Great Falls project?

Mr. BLANTON. I will.

Mr. SNELL. Would the gentleman vote to give a franchise to a private corporation to bring that power into the city and distribute it?

Mr. BLANTON. I am not in favor of the Government of the United States engaging in any such private business.

Mr. SNELL. That is not the question I asked the gentleman. I would like a chance to bring it in individually, and I will furnish the money.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman would furnish sufficient money and make a proper proposition, so far as I am concerned I would be one Member to vote to authorize him to do it rather than have the people of the United States spend their money for something that does not benefit them at all. The chief engineer who reported on the proposition showed us conclusively that ultimately, if we carry on the project, we are going to be called upon to spend $40,000,000. How will that benefit the people of New York or the rest of the United States? Why, when they find out the cost of the lights, when they find out all the cost of maintaining the policemen and the hundreds of firemen who ought to be paid out of the pockets of the people of this District, when they find out that the people of the United States Government are paying 40 per cent of their salaries, when they find out that the people are paying 40 per cent of the expense of hundreds of thousands of lights up and down the streets in the residential sections of the city, when they find out that the whole people of the United States are paying 40 per cent of all the expenses of collecting the ashes behind your back yards, and the trash and the garbage from your residences, something that the city should pay for, your constituents and mine are paying 40 per cent of—when they find out all these things they are going to ask you to stop it.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Would it not be fair for the gentleman to state that they are paying this 40 per cent of the expenses in lieu of taxes on Government property, and that that is the whole crux of the situation?

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman know what the city of New York would do? Does the gentleman know what the people in the gentleman's State would do?

If Congress would vote this Capitol from the District of Columbia to the city of New York, the city of New York would furnish sufficient ground and rebuild the buildings for every department of Government. They would be glad to do it. Chicago would be glad to do it.

Mr. MANN. Not on your life.

Mr. BLANTON. Any other city in the United States would be glad to have the Nation's Capitol there. The capital of my State is the city of Austin. The people of the State of Texas are not called upon to build and maintain all of the school buildings there in the city of Austin just because it is the capital of the State. They are not called upon to pay 40 per cent of the cost of hiring all of the teachers for the Austin children to go to school. They are not called upon to help pave all of the streets and alleys and sidewalks in Austin. They are not called upon to light that city or to furnish water to the people of that city. When the city of Austin wanted to build a dam across the Colorado River and furnish power and a water system for the city of Austin, the capital of Texas, the people of Austin raised the money and spent it themselves. They did not call on the rest of the people of Texas to do it. Every building in the city of Washington that belongs to this Government is a splendid, valuable asset to this city. It is a great improvement to the city. Every single building, every parkway, is enjoyed daily by the people of Washington.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the people of the city of Austin built the State capitol in Texas?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no; not the State capitol. I said that the people of the city of Austin put a dam across the Colorado River and furnished their own power and light and water. Of course they did not build the capitol, but they enjoy the capitol. They are just like the people of the city of Washington, who enjoy this Capitol, just as the people of Washington enjoy every other building that the Government of the United States has placed in this beautiful city.

And taxes? What are they called upon to pay? One dollar seventy-five cents is the total tax rate. I guarantee that there is not a single Member of Congress here from a city with as many as 10,000 people in it where the tax rate does not exceed $1.75. If there is one here, let him speak up and let me know where the city is where the tax rate is as low as $1.75 a hundred. The tax rate in every city in the State of Texas for city taxes alone where the population is 10,000 or more people is as much as $1.75, and in addition to that the people have to pay their school tax, their county tax, their State tax, and other taxes to keep up their government.

In addition to all that they are called upon to pay 40 per cent of all of the expenses of this District, and I say that it is not right. My water bill here for last year for my family in the residence I rent cost me $7.20 for the whole year, without any restrictions on the amount of water that I am supposed to use, so far as I know, because I never heard of any. We use as much water as we want to. It is fine water, the most healthful water in the United States, and $7.20 paid for a family for a whole year. I pay that small sum because the whole people of the United States are paying the balance of the expense of it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is not the water system here self-supporting?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; it is self-supporting, because the gentleman from Illinois knows that the conduit was built by the Government of the United States, and every dollar that went into it came out of the Public Treasury, and it is the Government of the United States that owns that conduit to-day. That is why the water system is self-sustaining.

Mr. MANN. And the Government gets its water through that conduit.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; and about 437,000 people in this great city get their water, and a family like mine has to pay just $7.20 a year, when in my home city in the summer months, with lawns to be sprinkled, I have paid as high as $25 a month for the water privilege.

Mr. MANN. That shows how extravagantly managed the gentleman's city is.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; but it suits us; it suits the people who live in it.

Mr. MANN. The $7.20 that the gentleman paid here pays all of the expenses of delivering that water to the gentleman, and if they would establish an economical management in his home town they could get the same amount of water for the same price.

Mr. BLANTON. That is the first time that I ever saw the distinguished gentleman from Illinois try to camouflage.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment. The reason the people in my home city have to pay so much more for their water than we do here in Washington is that they have to pay every dollar of the expense out of their own pockets. That is the reason; but if when they built their original water system they had no intent to pay for it themselves, but could have come to Washington and dug filthy hands down into the Public Treasury of the United States and taken every dollar of the necessary expense of building their own conduit with somebody else's money, then they would not have to pay any more in Abilene, Tex., than we do in Washington.

Mr. MANN. I am sure the gentleman does not mean that his constituents in his home town have filthy hands.

Mr. BLANTON. No; I do not. That is the construction that the gentleman from Illinois is trying to place upon my remarks.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; that is what the gentleman said, and just what his remarks indicate.

Mr. BLANTON. My remarks indicated this, that if my home people had elected to build their water system out of the Treasury of the United States, and had come here and taken the whole people's money out of that Treasury for their own private use, their hands would have been filthy; but, fortunately, thank God, they are not that kind of people. They pay for what they get. Here in Washington people get it out of the Public Treasury. Here in Washington they think it is all right to get all out of the Treasury that they can. They are after the people's Treasury all of the time, and I am getting tired of it, for one Member of Congress.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. How much does the Federal Government now pay for the water used in the Capitol and the office buildings throughout the District of Columbia?

Mr. BLANTON. If it paid one cent, every Member of us would be a fool for permitting it, because it is our own. We built the conduit, we own the conduit, we own the water, and why should we pay for it?

The gentleman may have been down at some of these banquets that the business committee have been giving so frequently here of late.

Mr. LEHLBACH. If the gentleman will yield, why should we charge other people for the surplus of our water more than it cost to get it to them?

Mr. BLANTON. I am not complaining about—

Mr. LEHLBACH. The gentleman has been complaining for half an hour about it.

Mr. BLANTON. I am complaining about this. If the gentleman watched the newspapers he could see every day, "Oh, we must build this new water plant." "Why should not the Government pay for what water it uses in its buildings?" That comes from the papers in Washington, and that is why I am taking this time; I want them to remember that the water belongs to the United States Government. Talk about paying for it! It is a ridiculous proposition.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I will.

Mr. BURTNESS. I was interested in the gentleman's statement in reference to paving. I understood the gentleman to say that the country as a whole pays 40 per cent of the paving of the city of Washington. Is that correct?

Mr. BLANTON. Forty per cent of every single dollar we appropriate for paving. For every dollar that comes out of the Treasury the people of the United States now pay 40 per cent, and they used to pay 50.

Mr. BURTNESS. But is not part of the cost of pavement assessed against the abutting property?

Mr. BLANTON. One-third to each property owner.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Fifty per cent.

Mr. BURTNESS. What I wanted to get information on was the fact. If a reasonable percentage is not assessed against the abutting property it is an outrage.

Mr. BLANTON. Take, for instance, a street. I just use this for illustration. Say the street is 60 feet wide. If I understand the proposition correctly there is 20 feet that the Government paves out of the Treasury in the center. There is 20 feet on each side of that that the abutting property owner paves under what is known as the Borland law. They did not have to pay a cent until the Borland law was passed, and that is one great monument that distinguished gentleman from Missouri will have to his memory, that he got that law passed which makes the abutting property owner pay a little percentage of the cost of the pavement on these streets and alleys. The newspapers of Washington right now daily are calling for the repeal of that law, and you gentlemen if you read the papers will note that propaganda every day, "We must repeal the Borland law. We must stop the property owners from paying a proportion of the paving expense." Such propaganda appears every day.

Mr. BURTNESS. If I understand the gentleman correctly, now the abutting property owners pay two-thirds the cost of paving?

Mr. BLANTON. Say the gentleman owned a lot on a street; he will pay one-third of that paving.

Mr. BURTNESS. And the property on the other side pays one-third?

Mr. BLANTON. And the Government pays the other.

Mr. BURTNESS. And on that one-third the people of the United States pay 40 per cent. That is considerably different from the impression that I gathered from the gentleman's statement that the people of the United States pay 40 per cent of the total cost of paving, and I was rather shocked.

Mr. BLANTON. Let me unshock the gentleman. If the gentleman's city where he lives should have 40 per cent of the expense of carrying on the municipal government paid out of the Treasury of the United States they would be the happiest people in the world. There would be no limit to the expenditure for their public improvements. Why, the paving is the least expensive part, and yet it is quite expensive when you count it up, paid out of the Treasury of the United States, and the least expensive item the people of the country have to pay in regard to the system here in the District of Columbia. Take the teachers here in these schools that take care of sixty to seventy-five thousand school children. Forty per cent of all their salaries is paid by the whole people of the United States. Take these magnificent school buildings. Take this fine Central High School building, that cost a million and a half dollars, and which is the finest of its kind in the United States. It has to-day 600 more students than the whole of Princeton University has, and yet 50 per cent of the entire cost of that building was paid by the whole people of the United States, and 40 per cent of its maintenance now is paid, as well as 40 per cent of the other school buildings in this city. I have taken the time of the House to enter my protest against it. I want to see the finest schools here, as I do everywhere else in the United States, but the people ought to pay for it themselves, the people who live here.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have heard two speeches in favor of this bill now pending, one from the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN], who discussed the bill, and the other from the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], who carefully avoided expressing any adverse opinion concerning the bill, and therefore, I take it, is ardently for the bill. I take it that the gentleman from Texas wants the Government to pay out of the Public Treasury at least 40 per cent of the $40,000 annually as a pure gift to some man not now in the Government service, because he expressed no opposition to the service. He expressed great opposition to paying any money toward the school-teachers or toward the construction of pavements that the Government uses, and not the slightest opposition to the payment of 40 per cent of $40,000 a year to this man and others now on the retired list, who render no service of any kind whatever either to the Government, the people, or anybody else. And the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] does not now rise to say that he is opposed to the expenditure of that.

Mr. BLANTON. I am opposed to it.

Mr. MANN. I am glad I have gotten the rise out of the gentleman. [Laughter.] He occupied the floor for more than half an hour in discussing the bill, and never expressed an adverse opinion to it. I am glad now, although the gentleman has not yet stated even whether he will vote against the bill. Will he?

Mr. BLANTON. I expect to do so, but I was discussing $40,000,000 propositions, and the gentleman is discussing a $40,000 one.

Mr. MANN. I am discussing the proposition before the House, not a proposition in the clouds. The gentleman from Texas was discussing an imagination. And while he is one of the most industrious Members of this House, and I think he is a valuable Member, he has more imagination about legislative propositions than anybody else I have ever seen. I do not know what the $40,000,000 proposition is. Perhaps that is because I do not assiduously read the newspapers or get my opinions from the newspapers, as does my distinguished friend from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. While the gentleman does not read the newspapers, he does read reports of engineers, and there is about a 500 or 600 page report from an engineer here showing a $40,000,000 power proposition which came near being foisted on this Government in the dying hours of the last Congress.

Mr. MANN. I do not think it came anywhere near being foisted on the Government.

Now, I would like to discuss this bill for a few minutes, if I may. I wish I felt at liberty to use the time of the House in answering all the suggested complaints of the gentleman from Texas, but it would occupy all my time to answer those I want to answer, and he and I frequently agree.

Now, what is this proposition before the House? Suppose when the salaries of Members of Congress were $5,000 a year we had provided for a pension or retirement fund with the provision that while a Member was in Congress a certain amount should be taken from his salary to go into the retirement fund, and yet when he went out of Congress he should receive from the retirement fund a certain proportion of the $5,000 a year, and then when we increased the salary to $7,500 a year, the ex-Members of Congress who were on the retirement roll, placed there when the salary was $5,000 a year, had wanted their retirement fund increased in the same proportion to $7,500 a year as it was before to $5,000 a year, how ridiculous it would be. And yet that is the precise proposition now before the House.

The policemen and the firemen eagerly went on the retired force. Most of them went on on their own application, at half the salary they were then receiving. Most of them went into some other business. They had a fixed amount coming to them from the retired fund, and with their other business they were able to do fairly well. They contributed $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the salary they were getting before they went on the retired list, and that is all they contributed. When we raised the salary the men remaining on the force contributed $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the new salary—the increased salary—but the men on the retired force never contributed anything toward that increase of pension that they now want. We pay these men on the retired force now more than we pay the veterans of the war as pensions. Why should we give them a voluntary bonus now and pay them more, with no agreement to do it, than we pay the old veteran of the Civil War? What is the justice in it? Of course, all over the world, everywhere, if there are two men, and one man getting more than the other, the other wants as much as the other fellow is getting. Everybody feels that way. But these men on the retired force were retired under the law which they were eager to have. Why on earth should we increase their pay? What is the justice of it? There is some justice in the claim for a so-called adjusted compensation or bonus for the ex-service men of the recent war, although I am not very strongly in favor of the proposition at this time, but there is no justice in this proposition—no adjusted compensation, but just a pure gift. Because John Smith has been given \$50 a month and you choose to give John Jones \$60 a month, there is no reason why you are obliged to raise John Smith's gift by \$10 a month—not the slightest.

Of course, I know how these things come. These men have an organization and they work through that organization to get legislation. I do not know about this particular case, but in the past these people have had an organization to which they contributed money for lobbying purposes. I have no complaint of that. They have a right to have somebody represent them. But think of the selfishness of this proposition. They want their pay increased. They do not care a whirl in the other place about the widows and the children of the men who have died in the service. They do not say anything in their bill or this bill about increasing the pay of the widows who may need it or the minor children who may need it, but they want to put their hands into the Treasury and take out additional pay for themselves only. I think we ought to defeat it. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Have the proponents of this bill offered any argument why it should be passed at this time?

Mr. MANN. The principal argument that I heard on the subject was from my genial friend from Texas, who did not mention it. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, for the benefit of those who do not know the history of this and similar legislation, I shall ask their indulgence for a few minutes, at least, in order that they may know just what has been done in the past respecting such legislation.

The police force of the District was for a good many years without any particular title beyond that of "police force." Some years ago the title was changed to the "Metropolitan police force." After that had been in existence for some time there was a lot of unclaimed stolen property that found its way into the hands of the property agent of the District of Columbia and there was no provision for disposing of it. Then Congress passed a law giving that unclaimed property to the police pension fund. By and by another act was passed giving to that fund the proceeds derived from all of the dog licenses, amounting to about $20,000 a year. A few years later all of the fines of the police court, amounting to thousands of dollars a year, were given to the fund. After the payment of all those amounts to the police pension fund, the commissioners, gradually letting men out of the police department and putting them on the pension list, found those sums not sufficient to meet the demands made on that fund. Then, year after year, Congress appropriated various sums of money to make up the balance; or, in other words, to pay in full all the pensions which the Commissioners of the District of Columbia allowed, until finally that plan was done away with and now Congress appropriates directly for the support of this fund.

I, like the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], can not see the justice in going behind the present Metropolitan police, in going back to the Civil War, perhaps, and paying them a pension when no pension was ever allowed them at that time, and when they never contributed a cent toward the present fund. Again, like the gentleman from Illinois, I can not see the reason or the justice in taking part of the fund created, in part, under the plan where $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the police funds was taken and set apart for their own pension fund, and going back away yonder, no man knows how long, and giving it to the men who contributed not a cent or a farthing toward it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman had long experience as chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia. Can the gentleman inform the committee as to the average age of retirement of the members of the police force and fire force of the city?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not know the average age of retirement, but a few years ago I had the Commissioners of the District of Columbia furnish me with the names and post-office addresses and the then present occupation of all the policemen who had been placed upon the pension list. I did not know that this matter was coming up to-day, else I would have brought that report over here and given the House the benefit of it. But I recall quite well that upon that list there were men retired early in life because of ailments acquired while in the service. If a man acquired any sort of disease while in the service, it has been construed that he acquired that disease in line of duty. Upon the list of those who were retired were set opposite their names the reasons for which they were retired. One could read between the lines that men had been retired as the result of venereal disease and put upon the pension list.

The only thing that is necessary for an ex-policeman to be put on the pension list is that he shall have been retired from the police force, and no matter for what reason he may have been retired he may go on the list.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do.

Mr. SNELL. How much are we appropriating each year to that pension fund? How much is contributed by the Government?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman will bear in mind that I am no longer on the Committee on the District of Columbia and I have not the figures.

Mr. SNELL. I did not know but that the gentleman would have the figures.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No.

Mr. SNELL. Do they still receive the police fines and the dog taxes?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No. That goes into the Treasury now, and Congress just appropriates a sufficient amount to pay the pensions.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will be very glad to yield.

Mr. EVANS. Is it not a fact that the funds go into the District treasury and not into the Federal Treasury?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; that is true.

Some years ago the commissioners exercised some discretion as to the amount of pension each of the pensioners should receive. One pensioner in the fire department received only $1 a year—or a dollar a month; I forget which. He was in the fire department only a little while, and got out of the department and commenced to impose upon the Government in the Anacostia lands. He was reputed to be rich and they put his pension at a dollar a month and other pensions at $100 a month.

I said a few moments ago that a few years ago the commissioners furnished me with a list of the post-office addresses and present occupations of these pensioners. They were scattered all over the United States. Some of them were practicing professions and some of them were engaged in various trades and occupations, and we know to-day, in the District of Columbia, some of the pensioned policemen and firemen are among the very large real estate owners; that some of them have large incomes. Some are rich men, and yet, without discrimination as between the rich and the poor, the taxpayers of the country are called upon to go down into their pockets and pay a pension to men far richer than themselves for having rendered a service on account of which they were fully paid at the time they rendered the service.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I can add anything to the force of the objections which have been stated to this bill by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], but there is one feature of the matter which has not yet been mentioned to which I think the House might well direct its attention at this time. As both of the gentlemen who have just spoken have said, the present retirement law of the District of Columbia requires that the policemen and firemen shall contribute to the retirement fund $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of their monthly salaries, and are eligible for retirement upon reaching a certain age or after incurring certain disabilities at a rate of not greater than 50 per cent of the salary which they are drawing at the time of their retirement.

Now, the House will recall that in 1920 we passed an act for the retirement of all employees in the classified civil service. I did not vote for the bill, because I am not an advocate of a civil pension list. What are the provisions of that retirement act? Among other things, they are that the civil-service employee shall contribute $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the salary that he is drawing while in actual service toward maintaining this retirement fund and the Government contributes the balance. It was estimated by expert actuaries that this plan would cause the Government to contribute about 65 per cent to the payment of the retirement fund and the $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent which the employees were to contribute would amount to about 35 per cent. How are the retirement benefits to these civil-service employees to be paid? Upon what basis? The payments are divided into different classifications. I will not take the time of the House to read all of the classes, because one of them will illustrate the rule of all of them. The bill provides, for example, that Class A shall include all employees to whom this act applies who shall have served the United States for a total period of 30 years or more. The annuities to a retired employee in this class shall equal 60 per cent of such employee's average annual basic pay or compensation from the United States for the 10 years next preceding the date on which he or she was retired, provided that in no case shall the annuity in this class exceed \$720 per annum or be less than \$360 per annum.

Thus we see that the rule is that the retired employee shall be paid upon the basis of 60 per cent of his annual salary for the last 10 years. Suppose we pass this pending bill. It will be a precedent for other similar demands. If a reclassification bill is passed increasing the salaries of Government employees, I doubt not that immediately a demand will be made that we amend the civil-service employees' retirement bill so that every man who has been retired will be given a percentage, not of the salary that he was drawing at the time he was retired but a percentage of the new salary that may be fixed in the reclassification bill if it is passed by Congress. If we start out to travel that kind of a road, it will be an endless process, and every time that Congress in its judgment should see fit to increase salaries of any particular class of employees there would be a demand on the part of these retired employees for the amendment of the law so that their retirement pay should be increased.

I think it is getting to be high time that some attention be paid to the taxpayers of this country, and I wonder when Congress is going to pass a bill to establish a home for the aged and infirm taxpayer, or to retire him on some pay; because in my judgment he is getting very feeble and decrepit at the present time. He has too many on his back already. We should not load him down with any more. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will offer a motion to strike out the enacting clause of this bill, and I think we can get the necessary votes to put his motion through.

The Government of the United States is not breaking any contract with these policemen and firemen, when Congress shall refuse to increase their retirement pay. During the war we issued five different series of Liberty bonds. Some of the bonds went below par, all of them, I believe, went below par at first, one time or the other, and we had people all over the country arguing with a certain degree of plausibility that the Government of the United States ought to step in and by some kind of process keep all the bonds at par. The Government of the United States could not do that. It meets all the obligations that it owes to any Liberty bond holder when it pays him the interest that is due at every installment period and pays that bond at maturity. [Applause.] In a similar way the Government of the United States and the District of Columbia will discharge every obligation that it owes to these retired policemen and firemen when it pays them the compensation it agreed to pay them upon their retirement. I am willing to do that. Although I did not support any of this civil-service retirement legislation, it is now a contract on the part of the Government, and I am willing at any time to vote for the appropriations that are necessary to make it good; but we have discharged all the equity that we owe when we fulfill our contracts. I am not willing to enlarge and extend them at the expense of the taxpayer.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. What I want to say will take only a few minutes. I intended to mention before, but having failed to do so then, I wish now to enlarge a little bit upon the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] as to another feature of the case. It is possible—because we have had precedents for it in the past—that a lobbyist has undertaken either for a fee certain or a contingent one to procure this legislation for those who were retired without pensions. I say there are precedents for it. Several years ago a certain class of policemen wanted to get some legislation enacted, and a local attorney, perhaps without an office, made a contract with them whereby he would lobby with the Members of Congress for the bill that he persuaded them they ought to have; and I now have over in my office receipts for $6,000 that these policemen paid to this lobbyist before it was discovered that he himself had started the scheme to get this money out of Congress. When the plan was uncovered, the lobbyist was disappointed and became so indignant and insulting about it that he even attacked me personally, and I had to defend myself from his attack. Since we have had that kind of thing we do not know but what this is one of the same character. I hope it is not necessary for me to say that no Member advocating this bill knows of any such thing, because if he did he would not support it; but still I say it is possible that behind this bill there is no more than the activity of one man seeking to get for these discharged policemen this pension money, and that then he is to get part of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the passage of this act all retired and pensioned policemen of the District of Columbia who were retired or pensioned in accordance with laws enacted prior to December 5, 1919, shall be entitled to the same rating and benefits and receive pensions equal in amount to the pensions now being granted or that may be hereafter granted to policemen retired or pensioned since the passage of the act of December 5, 1919, and all retired and pensioned firemen of the District of Columbia who were retired or pensioned in accordance with laws enacted prior to January 24, 1920, shall be entitled to the same rating and benefits and receive pensions equal in amount to the pensions now being granted or that may be hereafter granted to firemen retired or pensioned since the passage of the act of January 24, 1920, and all such retired and pensioned policemen and firemen shall also be entitled to all pension benefits resulting from any and all increase in pay that may hereafter be granted by Congress to the policemen and firemen of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I rise in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Illinois. I am reluctant to oppose the motion after the remarks of my colleague, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, who has served so well, so diligently, and so successfully as chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, but after considering his remarks and after considering the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], I am at a loss to apply to this bill.

This bill does nothing, as I understand it, except to equalize these pensions. The whole system of granting pensions to civil-service employees may be wrong. The application of that system in the past in the District of Columbia, as pointed out by my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], may have been seriously abused. But what have we before us? We have before us the question, Shall we make fish of one and fowl of another? It may be that those in the past should not have any pension at all, and it may be that those being retired now should have no pensions, and yet I can not see the wisdom of taking one now retired, a younger man, better able to meet the contests of outside life, and paying him a pension, and denying the same man, the one who has grown old in the service and is now retired, and whose capacity to make a living is much less than those being now retired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILBERT. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. My colleague seems to see no difference between those already on the pension list and those for whom it is provided to be placed on the pension list. Those who are on the pension list now have for years and years contributed out of their salaries every month toward the creation and establishment of a pension fund, while those who will be put on the pension list by this act have never contributed a farthing.

Mr. GILBERT. I am not absolutely certain, but I think the gentleman from Kentucky is wrong in that statement. To this extent the argument has been made and is unanswerable. I understand they have paid 1½ per cent to a certain fund based on a certain salary, and they have paid more than they used to pay in proportion when they had a smaller salary. And as far as it goes that is an unanswerable argument, but that amounts to a very small sum. The District taxpayers and the country are paying the larger part of this fund. It might be well if it could be done to equalize it. Like a life insurance company, where a misstatement of age is made, you find out later that the age is misstated, but it does not void the policy, they simply equalize on the amount that they should have paid. It may be that they should be to some extent penalized by not having paid so much. But after all we are confronted with this proposition in the bill, and this is the only proposition. Shall we say to these old men who are now past all usefulness that you shall receive a smaller amount than the younger man, and that the younger man shall receive the greater amount? It is no answer to say that it will cost the District so much money. If it does, let us cure it by general legislation and revise them all. But let us not give to those that hath and take away from those that hath not. I see no reason why they should not be equalized.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, just a word in regard to the so-called lobbyist with reference to this legislation. The gentleman from Kentucky states that one visited the Committee on the District of Columbia while he was chairman. I want to say that while I have not been chairman very long, I have not seen a policeman about the place, and neither have I had anyone importune me in regard to the bill. But I see an attempt made here to prejudice the House and to carry a prejudiced sentiment along against the bill because of the present methods of taxation. It so happens, gentlemen, that we are now paying on a basis of 60-40—the Government paying 40 per cent and the District 60 per cent to run the municipal affairs of the United States reservation. Now, if you are not satisfied with that, then we will have, if you shall care to vote for it, an opportunity to raise the money by another system. It is suggested and proposed in a bill, S. 205, this plan, that they first assess private property of the District of Columbia on a valuation that would be equivalent to what you might assess property in your own home town or city, and then the Government to pay the balance.

My answer to that has been that in my own mind, without an opportunity of having the bill considered before the committee, I am certain that if you are going to do it on that basis the people of the District here are going to pay on the basis of the District assessment, and without going into any details or referring to it in any obnoxious way, when you take the local assessor's valuation, whether he would be prejudiced or could be influenced or not, I am afraid, my friends, if you ever adopt that system that instead of paying only 40 per cent the Government might pay 80 per cent and the residents of the District 20 per cent. On the other hand, I do hope that the gentlemen who so constantly inveigh against the city of Washington and the District as though this was a District that belonged to a few profiteering shopkeepers, former saloon keepers, and real estate grabbers, will cease, for that is not the way to look at the District of Columbia. It is the center and seat of government of the whole United States.

I walk these streets feeling that I own as much of this town as any man that lives in it, and I hope I am as proud of it as they are, and that some day they may change the practice of making victims of Members of Congress. Of course, when your wife comes home and says she paid $20 for a pair of shoes worth $5, you think that things are higher here than in other parts of the United States. But this is the point—men are overlooking the fact that the value of the property belonging to the United States Government is worth more in acreage and Government buildings than all the private property, while the Government property is as much in need of fire and police protection as any other. Hence, it is up to the Government either to help pay its share or admit that it is incapable of doing so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOCHT. Just briefly in regard to this water question. In the first place this is the most unique city in the world. There is none like it anywhere, so far as the government of the District is concerned. We can not treat this just as we would Wichita, Louisville, Harrisburg, Boston, Philadelphia, New York, or any place else. We made this District and we control it, and we ought to control it, and we ought to have patience about it. So far as the water proposition is concerned, of course, we pay much more for our water at home for the reason that the water companies at home have been capitalized with private capital and built by private capital and so conducted.

The District of Columbia put in these waterworks and in return gets the water for the whole District, so far as the Government is concerned, for nothing, and we pay the lowest rates possibly in the United States. In our own States at home, if the utilities commissions should give the water companies more than they ought to have, might I not say that they are guilty of favoritism? The statement was made here by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who cleaned up the question most beautifully, that it is the best evidence in the world that the affairs of the District of Columbia—at least in one instance—are better conducted than they are back home, if you can get water here for $7.20 and have to pay something like $50 at home, as I do.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes.

Mr. KINDRED. Is it not a fact that the conditions of the water supply of the District at the present time are a menace to public health and should receive the prompt attention of the Congress?

Mr. FOCHT. Emphatically so. We should follow the example of Boston and New York and prepare 20 years ahead. We should remove every habitation from the watershed and prepare to have this city grow three hundred or five hundred thousand more in population, and we should do it now.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Does the gentleman know that no park system is provided to protect the watershed from which they propose to get additional water up here at Great Falls?

Mr. FOCHT. Then they better not have the water if that is so. The watershed ought not to have any habitations upon it at all. Contaminated water is worse than none at all.

In regard to this firemen's bill, in my own State of Pennsylvania we concede and yield nothing to anyone in our paternalistic tendencies and practices, with a budget of $100,000,000, all of it going back to the people for the public school system for free schoolbooks, firemen's relief, and every conceivable kind of public charity. There we have a fund in every crossroads town where they have a fire company, and that money is raised by a levy on the insurance companies. I do not see any provision here that compels the insurance companies to come across with a part of this fund, and this should be done. But, even so, let us not forget that while we may oppose a civil pension list, we can not overlook the fact that the principle has been established everywhere, and everywhere accepted, that we stand for pensions for the man who offers his life in hazard—that is, the soldier, the fireman, and the policeman—and have even gone so far as to include the school-teachers.

The principle having been established that we are going to take care of them, how is it going to be possible to adjust any differences any more than you can adjust the difference in exchange between this country and foreign countries, the condition that existed 20 years ago and the condition that exists now. It now costs 50 per cent more to live than it did, and the money that they contributed—1½ per cent—was equivalent to double that to-day. This whole matter is predicated on the principle of taking care of these people, the firemen and the policemen, who sacrifice their opportunities in business careers elsewhere to protect you and me, and we have said as an inducement that we would take care of them. Now, then, let us stop quibbling; let us act without prejudice, and do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to strike out the enacting clause. I have always been opposed to civil pensions and wish I had the time to go into the subject. This is a new phase of civil pensions, and there is more back of it than many of the Members realize. In every city where they have a fire and a police department there are petitions to the various local legislative branches, city and State, by the old members of the police and fire departments to put them on the same plane as men who now occupy those positions, exactly the same proposition that is presented to us here. They think if they can get this through in Washington they can go back to your State and to my State and say that Washington has set an example and that it should be followed at home.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. And if Congress sets this precedent will it not be a precedent for all of the civil-service employees of the Government to come to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service every time a salary increase is made and demand that their retirement pay be proportionately increased?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Absolutely so. My honored chairman spoke about the firemen and the policemen and what they gave up to public service. They gave up nothing to public service. If you choose the trade of a blacksmith, and somebody else chooses the career of a policeman, and some one else prefers that of a bookkeeper, and some one that of a fireman, we all choose our own line of endeavor. The fireman and the policeman are not coerced into being a fireman and a policeman any more than the blacksmith or bookkeeper is into being a blacksmith or bookkeeper. The public employee goes along, and at the end of a certain length of service says that his brother who chose some other trade or profession must continue to labor and be taxed in order to pay him a pension after he gets through. That is discrimination, and it is a disgrace to the United States. Unless you are going the whole distance and establish old-age pensions as one of the fundamental laws, you have got to stop this civil-pension list where it is now and not go any further. I think my honored chairman would be terribly exercised if a bill should be introduced and referred to his committee establishing old-age pensions by the Government.

Mr. FOCHT. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. I am very much in favor of one. I have a bill on the calendar now, and I hope it may be passed. That is a principle that has been established in countries that are supposed to be much inferior to us intellectually and humanitarily.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Well, I certainly am astonished. It is the first time since I have served on the committee that I have found him anything but conservative, but in this instance he seems to have gone the whole distance and is willing to accept old-age pensions.

Mr. GILBERT. If the gentleman will permit, I agree with the gentleman thoroughly in his principle, but this bill simply does this. It pays one man at 60 years more than a man at 80 years who has done the same thing.

Mr. UNDERHILL. That makes little or no difference. The man at 60 years of age when he retired retired voluntarily and accepted the pension at that time. He was employed where he had his pay regularly, and surely ought to have saved a little money just the same as a blacksmith or a bookkeeper has to.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. If the gentleman will permit, are not old-age pensions based upon the needs of the body pensioned?

Mr. UNDERHILL. No. I think most pensions are based upon politics, where an organization has the influence to get through a pension.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. The theory is to take care of the faithful servant who is in need. Are not his needs increased because of the high cost of living, and ought not the old men to have more because—

Mr. UNDERHILL. I do not agree with the gentleman. I do not think any civil employee is any more entitled to a pension than a man who works in the shop, mill, or factory.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to strike out the enacting clause.

The question was taken, and the chairman announced the ayes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. FOCHT) there were—ayes 58, noes 24.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LONGWORTH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 7850, had directed him to report the same back with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House agree to the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union that the enacting clause be stricken out?

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. FOCHT) there were—ayes 58, noes 18.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is clear that there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 174, noes 124, answered "present" 2, not voting 130, as follows:

On motion of Mr. MANN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the enacting clause was stricken out was laid on the table.

EXTENDING ARMY APPROPRIATION ACT.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a conference report on the bill (H. R. 7158) for printing under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (H. R. 7158) to amend the Army appropriation act, approved July 11, 1919, so as to release appropriations for the completion and the acquisition of real estate in certain cases and making additional appropriations therefor.

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed under the rule.

CERTAIN TITLES ON TABLETS AND OTHER MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill (H. R. 5013) be taken from the Speaker's table and move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 5013. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to sanction the use of certain titles on tablets and other memorials.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. The bill was passed by unanimous vote in the House either in April or June. The Senate amends it by using the word "inscribe" in their amendment instead of "use," the word which is in the House bill.

Mr. WALSH. Why did they have to strike out all after the enacting clause in order to do that?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Hilltop Memorial Post 438, of the American Legion, of Knoxville, Pa., in regard to a meeting that was held by the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh with reference to the bonus.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, the resolution ought to be dropped in the basket. I object.

MEDICAL SOCIETY OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill S. 1591 in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1591) to amend an act entitled "An act to revive, with amendments, an act to incorporate the Medical Society of the District of Columbia," approved June 7, 1838, as amended.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is that on the Private Calendar?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; it is.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is not in order to call it up to-day at all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is in order.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; it is in order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is this District day?

The SPEAKER. Yes. The Committee on the District of Columbia has the right to call up private bills.

Mr. BLANTON. I object to the unanimous-consent request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill S. 1591.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House, with Mr. McARTHUR in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 1591) to amend an act entitled "An act to revive, with amendments, an act to incorporate the Medical Society of the District of Columbia," approved June 7, 1838, as amended.

So the motion to strike out the enacting clause was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. ELLIS with Mr. HUMPHREYS.

Mr. LANGLEY with Mr. CLARK of Florida.

Mr. RODENBERG with Mr. BELL.

Mr. REBER with Mr. O'BRIEN.

Mr. KIESS with Mr. TAGUE.

Mr. LAWRENCE with Mr. GARRETT of Texas.

Mr. MONDELL with Mr. ALMON.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma with Mr. WRIGHT.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania with Mr. PARRISH.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee with Mr. SABATH.

Mr. HUTCHINSON with Mr. FIELDS.

Mr. BACHARACH with Mr. KITCHIN.

Mr. PATTERSON of New Jersey with Mr. WARD of North Carolina.

Mr. KNIGHT with Mr. CAREW.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM with Mr. FAVROT.

Mr. OGDEN with Mr. LEA of California.

Mr. BUTLER with Mr. OLIVER.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington with Mr. RIORDAN.

Mr. ATKESON with Mr. WINGO.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana with Mr. SULLIVAN.

Mr. IRELAND with Mr. COCKRAN.

Mr. BIXLER with Mr. GRIFFIN.

Mr. CHINDBLUM with Mr. LYON.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK with Mr. STEVENSON.

Mr. SPEAKS with Mr. DRANE.

Mr. KENNEDY with Mr. RUCKER.

Mr. HILL with Mr. OVERSTREET.

Mr. PERLMAN with Mr. DREWRY.

Miss ROBERTSON with Mr. BRINSON.

Mr. VARE with Mr. RAINEY of Illinois.

Mr. BRENNAN with Mr. LANGFORD.

Mr. CODD with Mr. LONDON.

Mr. OLPP with Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH.

Mr. STRONG of Pennsylvania with Mr. MANSFIELD.

Mr. ROSSDALE with Mr. WISE.

Mr. OSBORNE with Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado.

Mr. WINSLOW with Mr. RAINEY of Alabama.

Mr. KAHN with Mr. WEAVER.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present; the Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 1591) to amend an act entitled "An act to revive, with amendments, an act to incorporate the Medical Society of the District of Columbia," approved July 7, 1838, as amended.

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to revive, with amendments, an act to incorporate the Medical Society of the District of Columbia," approved July 7, 1838 (6 Stat. L., p. 741), as amended, be, and the same hereby is, amended so as to read as follows:

"That Drs. George Wythe Cook, William Gerry Morgan, John B. Nichols, William P. Carr, E. Y. Davidson, Philip S. Roy, A. L. Staveland, Henry C. Macatee, E. G. Seibert, J. Russell Verbruyck, Jr., A. W. Boswell, Charles S. White, J. A. Gannon, D. S. Lamb, and Virgil B. Jackson, and such other persons as they may associate with themselves, and their successors, be, and they hereby are, constituted a body corporate of the District of Columbia, for the purpose of promoting and disseminating medical and surgical knowledge, and for no other purpose.

"SEC. 2. That the Medical Society of the District of Columbia be, and it is hereby, empowered to own, mortgage, and convey such property as may be necessary for its purposes, and to make such rules and regulations as it may require, and which may not be repugnant to the Constitution or laws of the United States.

"SEC. 3. That Congress may at any time alter, amend, or annul this act of incorporation of said society."

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MILLSPAUGH].

Mr. MILLSPAUGH. Mr. Chairman, this bill has for its purpose the amending of the charter of the Medical Society of the District of Columbia for the purpose of enabling them to own property in their own name. It seems to be the case that this society, which was organized, I believe, in 1838, or about that time, up until 1896 had the power to license practitioners in medicine. But in 1896 a general act was passed which took from them that power, and after that time this society kept up its functioning as an organization of medical men for the promotion of the proper tenets of the practice of medicine. There were two organizations after 1896—the Medical Society of the District of Columbia and the Medical Association of the District of Columbia. About six or seven years ago a bill was introduced for the purpose of amalgamating these two associations or societies, which for some reason failed to pass. But the time being opportune, the organizations did amalgamate under the title of the Medical Society of the District of Columbia. They have been carrying on their work as a medical society simply as an organization, more, I assume, in the form of a social organization than anything else, and for the purpose of furthering the interests of the medical profession.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLSPAUGH. I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is there any reason why these gentlemen can not do under the general law of the District all that they are seeking to do here?

Mr. MILLSPAUGH. They can not.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Why?

Mr. MILLSPAUGH. Because they are forbidden, as I understand it, by the law of the District from doing so. They can proceed in the manner in which they have been proceeding, but they have decided to erect a building—in fact, it is almost completed, and the title is held by trustee—and they simply want their charter amended so that they can transfer the title to these people of the Medical Society of the District rather than have it held in trusteeship.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The District has a general incorporation law.

Mr. WALSH. They can not charter under it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not know whether they can do this particular thing or not.

Mr. KINDRED. I will say in reply to the question of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] that under the present laws of the District of Columbia authorizing the incorporation of organizations of medical societies, there is a limitation on the amount of property which they shall own, and this limit in the case of the Medical Society of the District of Columbia is at present exceeded, because they have constructed a fine, new, and costly building.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLSPAUGH. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Has the gentleman examined the original charter of this society?

Mr. MILLSPAUGH. I have not.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman know whether these people want to substitute this charter, with two brief sections, for the charter which they got in 1838, which covers four or five pages of the statutes?

Mr. MILLSPAUGH. I can not say.

Mr. WALSH. That will be the effect of this bill, will it not? Mr. MILLSPAUGH. I assume it would be. That is my thought in the matter, at least.

Mr. WALSH. Did the committee have hearings on this bill?

Mr. MILLSPAUGH. A very nominal one, I should call it.

Mr. WALSH. It is a matter, I think, concerning which the committee might have propounded some interesting inquiries. I will say that this matter was before the Committee on the Judiciary at one time; on two occasions, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MILLSPAUGH] has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. FOCHT. As much as may be necessary. I also want to yield time to other gentlemen, though.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. May I ask the gentleman as to the meaning of the language in lines 5 and 6, on page 2, "for the purpose of promoting and disseminating medical and surgical knowledge"?

Mr. MILLSPAUGH. In lines 3 and 4 the gentleman means, does he not?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In the print I have the language I refer to is in lines 5 and 6. Is it the purpose of this society to establish a school?

Mr. MILLSPAUGH. That is not the purpose as expressed to me at all.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, they could do so.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes.

Mr. KINDRED. May I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that one of the most legitimate functions of a medical society is to hold discussions on all medical subjects and allied subjects and to disseminate in all proper and ethical ways—in particular in the case of this society—medical and surgical knowledge by monthly and weekly meetings or clinics and the discussion of cases and scientific subjects?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understand that. But is it the purpose to establish a school in the District of Columbia or merely for the exchange of such information as they may obtain among their own members?

Mr. KINDRED. Yes; and to disseminate it to the public in regard to the transmission of disease, in regard to sanitary measures and public health measures, which so much concern the public. That is the proper function of a medical society.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not question its being proper. I hope the gentleman does not understand that I am assuming that the gentlemen named herein are intending to do anything improper. But if there is to be a school organized it ought not to be organized by any special act of Congress.

Mr. MILLSPAUGH. I do not think that is the intention.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, in regard to this bill and the question propounded a moment ago as to the extent of the hearings, I would say that the judgment of the members of the committee rested largely upon the opinion of the gentleman from New York, Dr. KINDRED, who spoke to us about it. I believe he is a member of this association or some similar association, and I therefore yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York for some further enlightenment on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think the provisions of this short bill are sufficiently simple and clear. I understand that the provisions of the bill are absolutely limited to incorporating certain gentlemen of the medical profession as incorporators of the Medical Society of the District of Columbia, for two main clear purposes, namely, for the purpose of disseminating and promoting medical and surgical science in all proper ways, in all the usual ways by which and through which medical associations of this kind would naturally and conveniently disseminate and promote such knowledge, particularly with reference to educating the public in all matters pertaining to public health and sanitary science, and particularly with reference to the prevention of disease.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KINDRED. Gladly.

Mr. LITTLE. Could they establish a college under this legislation?

Mr. KINDRED. Not being a lawyer or a specialist in the interpretation of the technical language of the act, I can not say as to whether they could, even with any strained interpretation of the words of the act; but I believe it would take a strained interpretation to say that they intended to establish, or would establish, a medical college.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KINDRED. Gladly.

Mr. CLOUSE. In the light of the language used in section 1, "for promoting and disseminating medical and surgical knowledge," how can they do this unless they do establish a college?

Mr. KINDRED. I would suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee what I thought had already been brought out, that the usual functions and activities of a medical society, such as this, are to have monthly, weekly, or even semiweekly meetings, to which all the members of the society are invited, and to hold scientific discussions—we will say in this particular case, to illustrate my meaning, on the subject of an epidemic which might be prevailing at the time of its discussion.

Mr. CLOUSE. Will the gentleman indulge me for another question?

Mr. KINDRED. Certainly.

Mr. CLOUSE. Of course, I can understand why a body of medical physicians might consolidate, but why the necessity of incorporating that concern and why the necessity of giving them the power to own and mortgage property and acquire title and sell real estate in the District of Columbia if it is not to establish a medical school?

Mr. KINDRED. I am glad indeed to answer the very proper question of the gentleman. The medical associations and other great associations—I am not standing here as the advocate of any particular or specific medical association, or any particular theory of medicine, or any particular school of therapeutics—but speaking in the interest of the medical profession at large and all branches of the profession, I want to say to you gentlemen that medical science in all of its branches is so vast at the present time that it requires a proper place of meeting, equipped for demonstration, so that cases can be studied clinically, where eye diseases are brought to the attention of medical associations for a proper clinical study of diseases of the eye, and where cases of cancer are brought to the attention of the medical association for the proper clinical study of cancer, and where clinics are brought to actual notice in a proper building and with properly equipped conditions, so that physicians can study the cases themselves in connection with their didactic and technical study of the case; and so it requires a properly equipped society building, such as that of the New York Academy of Medicine, which has, in one of the congested and valuable districts of the city of New York, a splendidly equipped building, so that all the phases of the science of medicine can be studied by the specialists and scientific men who have to get their information through such a channel; and so the medical societies of the country are now tending toward the building of larger medical society buildings, thoroughly equipping the buildings with all of the facilities for the thorough study of the various aspects of a broad profession.

As to the particular and special functions which these incorporators are to perform, I need not tell the gentlemen who have asked questions on this matter, because they as lawyers know better than I that it is necessary for the medical society of the District of Columbia to be incorporated, so that it may own legally this property, which its members at so much self-sacrifice to themselves have contributed, so that the corporation may, if necessary, mortgage the property for its future development and future usefulness. It is the same function that any other body of incorporators may perform when they hold property for the benefit of the incorporation.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDRED. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. There is at present a corporation bearing this name, is there not, the Medical Society of the District of Columbia?

Mr. KINDRED. Under the incorporation of 1838; yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Does that corporation as it now exists represent the successors of the men named in that act of incorporation?

Mr. KINDRED. I think it does not, for the reason that there has been an amalgamation of two societies, as has been pointed out by the gentleman who presented the bill here, and that amalgamation is probably not represented by the old act of incorporation.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Does the corporation as it is now organized have legal title to any real estate?

Mr. KINDRED. There is valuable real estate which is held in trust, very inconveniently, in a very cumbersome way, which real estate and other property should be held by incorporators, just as the property of any other incorporation should be held.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If they are not the successors of the people named in the original charter, I do not see how they could pass title.

Mr. KINDRED. The present property is not held in the name of either one of these societies. It is held in the name of trustees for the benefit of the amalgamated society.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The equitable title is in the amalgamated association?

Mr. KINDRED. I understand it is in the trustees.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That is, the legal title is in the trustees?

Mr. KINDRED. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. For the benefit of the amalgamated association?

Mr. KINDRED. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will this new association represent the amalgamated association?

Mr. KINDRED. Entirely so.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDRED. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. As I understand, the medical society which was incorporated in 1838 had authority under its act of incorporation to license persons to practice medicine?

Mr. KINDRED. Yes; but that does not obtain now.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That was repealed by the act of 1896?

Mr. KINDRED. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will this bill revive that right?

Mr. KINDRED. It has no reference to it. There are only two propositions here, namely, first, the dissemination of medical and surgical knowledge; and, secondly, to enable the incorporation to hold property.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDRED. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Referring again to the question first raised by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], under section 599 of the corporation laws of the District of Columbia any three or more persons of full age, citizens of the United States, a majority of whom shall be citizens of the District, who desire to associate themselves for benevolent, charitable, educational, literary, musical, scientific, religious, or missionary purposes, and so forth, may make, sign, acknowledge, and form a corporation. Included in this general law are corporations organized for educational purposes. In this special charter which you are granting you name purposes that are purely educational in their nature.

Mr. KINDRED. If the gentleman from Texas will read the language there, he will find that there is a limitation on the amount of property which such association may hold under the existing act.

Mr. JONES of Texas. It says that they may take, receive, hold, and convey real and personal estate necessary for the purposes of the society as stated in their certificate. That seems to me to cover not only the purposes that are sought to be accomplished by the special charter, but also to cover the real estate and personal property that may be necessary for the carrying out of the specific purposes for which the gentleman says this society is organized.

Mr. KINDRED. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that I have been informed by able lawyers, who have given study to this particular act under which these bodies are incorporated in the District, that there is a limitation—

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will permit me, the limitation is that the income from the property they own must not exceed $6,000 a year.

Mr. KINDRED. I think the gentleman is right in that interpretation.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The limitation on the income of their property is $25,000 a year.

Mr. KINDRED. I think it is $6,000 now.

Mr. BLANTON. It is $6,000 now.

Mr. JONES of Texas. It has been changed, has it?

Mr. KINDRED. Yes. Now, I will say in conclusion that I happen to know personally several of the gentlemen whose names are mentioned in this act as the incorporators. They are humanitarians, physicians of the highest standing, and with the best possible purposes in their desire to hold for the benefit of the whole medical profession of the District this valuable property which they at sacrifice to themselves have erected as a monument to humanity and medical science.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDRED. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. There are three recognized branches of medicine, are there not?

Mr. KINDRED. That is true, if the gentleman will name them; I think it is true.

Mr. BLANTON. The allopath, osteopath, and homeopath.

Mr. KINDRED. Those are three of the well-known branches.

Mr. BLANTON. When we incorporate these particular gentlemen into a medical society of the District of Columbia, will it exclude any of the branches I have named?

Mr. KINDRED. When you form an association to do a certain thing and name the incorporators, you do not bring in any incorporators adverse to it.

Mr. BLANTON. Are these particular gentlemen allied with any particular branch to the exclusion of any other branch?

Mr. KINDRED. I understand that they are, of course, regular physicians.

Mr. BLANTON. This embraces all of them?

Mr. KINDRED. It does not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be recognized in opposition to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. I will yield five minutes more to the gentleman from New York in order that I may ask him some questions. The gentleman recognizes these three branches that I have named?

Mr. KINDRED. There is another well-known branch, known as the eclectic.

Mr. BLANTON. How many of these branches are represented in this society?

Mr. KINDRED. This particular act of incorporation includes members of the so-called regular profession only.

Mr. BLANTON. The allopaths?

Mr. KINDRED. Yes; if you are pleased to call them allopaths.

Mr. BLANTON. But it does not include the eclectic?

Mr. KINDRED. No.

Mr. BLANTON. Nor the osteopaths?

Mr. KINDRED. No.

Mr. BLANTON. Nor the homeopaths?

Mr. KINDRED. No.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not holding a brief for any of these branches which the gentleman designates as not of the regular branch, but does the gentleman think it is fair, with the great number of citizens who believe in the other three branches—does he think it is fair to them to give this particular branch which I patronize when I am sick—I patronize the regular branch myself—

Mr. KINDRED. And the gentleman shows his good judgment.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman think it is fair to all the others to incorporate these gentlemen as the Medical Society of the District of Columbia?

Mr. KINDRED. I think it is eminently fair and just that any branch of any profession or society may ask for an act of incorporation and hold property which it pays for.

Mr. BLANTON. If that was the only purpose—

Mr. KINDRED. Only one other purpose.

Mr. BLANTON. I know, if that is not the only purpose, why should not the other purpose be stated in the bill?

Mr. KINDRED. Let me answer the question by asking another. Does the gentleman from Texas think it is unfair to the whole of the regular profession to teach its own tenets and doctrines?

Mr. BLANTON. Not at all, if it is not to the exclusion of other branches to teach their tenets.

Mr. KINDRED. There is nothing here to the exclusion of any other medical branch.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDRED. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly it is not unfair to permit these people to teach their own tenets, but is it right that the Congress of the United States should be called upon to do them a special favor by granting a special charter in order that they may do it?

Mr. KINDRED. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that the Congress of the United States has granted many acts of incorporation like this.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. We have granted special acts of incorporation, but not like this.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, I want to ask the gentleman a question which I intended to but did not ask. Suppose this bill was to give the homeopaths of the city the right to organize themselves into a corporation called the Medical Society of the District of Columbia—not a particular homeopathic society but a medical society—

Mr. KINDRED. If the gentleman will modify the question and ask if I think it is right in principle for the so-called homeopaths of the District of Columbia to form themselves into a corporation like this, I will say yes, designating it as the Homeopathic Society.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman has read them out of the medical society.

Mr. KINDRED. I have chosen the right, personally, to join this society, and this gives others the same privilege under the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDRED. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman from New York know whether the original charter, which I understand has never been surrendered, contains any provision with relation to holding property by this corporation?

Mr. KINDRED. I believe the trouble is that the limitation already referred to under the general law applies here.

Mr. WALSH. No.

Mr. KINDRED. I do not believe the original charter gives them the right to do what they want to do here.

Mr. CLOUSE. I have before me the original act of July 7, 1838.

Mr. KINDRED. What is the caption of that act?

Mr. CLOUSE. "An act to revive, with amendments, an act to incorporate the medical society of the District of Columbia." It limits them in their right to acquire and hold property exceeding $6,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, that is the income.

Mr. CLOUSE. To hold or possess property, real, personal, or mixed, exceeding in total value the sum of $6,000 per annum. That is correct. I do not recall, nor do I know, whether this act has been amended, but by section 3 this medical society was authorized to appoint from the members of the profession five persons who should pass upon the qualifications of all those applying for a license to practice in the District.

Mr. KINDRED. The gentleman must understand that that provision has since been repealed.

Mr. CLOUSE. I did not understand that.

Mr. KINDRED. That provision has been repealed.

Mr. CLOUSE. I see that the act of 1896 repealed the major portion of that.

Mr. KINDRED. It repealed that particular provision.

Mr. CLOUSE. Do they still have the power and authority to pass on qualifications?

Mr. KINDRED. No; they do not. That feature has been repealed.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDRED. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Following the line of thought of my colleague from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], would the gentleman be in favor of Congress granting this recognition, this prestige, or whatever it amounts to, to these newer methods of healing, these other organizations that minister to the health of mankind? Would the gentleman say that they should be given this prestige?

Mr. KINDRED. I am very glad to answer the gentleman's question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. KINDRED. The fundamental consideration in licensing any man or woman to put out his or her sign to treat diseases of the mind or of the body, which implies that the particular person is authorized or qualified to treat any disease of the mind or body, is that the authority must be properly safeguarded, on this principle.

I have no objection to the osteopath practicing his profession. I will frequently cooperate with him in many conditions of chronic disease, where there is no infection and no acute or dangerous inflammatory conditions and no contagion, and will turn over to him some cases which require simple rubbing and manipulation or manipulation and massage, but it is a dangerous thing to the public of this country to have such a man or woman calling himself or herself anything that would give him or her authority to be consulted legally in any medical case, to be called in without the training necessary to make a diagnosis. That is the principle on which I object to the suggestion of the gentleman; and, therefore, the homoeopath, the allopath, the eclectic, and all who have studied all branches of medicine insist that a man or woman shall be trained in all the branches of medicine—atomy, physiology, therapeutics, surgery, and laboratory methods—and then he or she may practice drugless therapy, physiotherapy, psychotherapeutic healing, healing by mysticism, or any other fool thing; but they must be prepared to know when they see diphtheria; they must not treat an appendix full of pus, that is ready to burst, by manipulation and kill the patient; they must not treat a child dying of diphtheria by manipulation; they must not treat a case of typhoid fever, in which there may be rupture of the small intestine, by manipulation or rubbing. That is the principle on which I insist that we shall be careful in licensing people who shall be allowed to practice any form of medicine.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, perhaps the discussion that I am about to make would better come under the five-minute rule, but I want to find out if I can what has become of the organization that was formed under the act of July 7, 1838, and I would like to make that inquiry of the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Had that corporation an age limit?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. No. The act of July 7, 1838, which this bill seeks to revive—whatever that means—

Mr. JONES of Texas. Inasmuch as it is purely a revival, why, in the gentleman's judgment, could they not be incorporated under the general act?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I have not studied the general act to know whether it covers it or not.

Mr. JONES of Texas. While there are limitations as to the amount of property that may be owned under the act of 1838, yet it seems that there is no limitation in the general act on the amount of property they may own for the purposes for which they are incorporated. They are allowed $25,000 a year annual income from properties other than those used in connection with the purposes for which they are incorporated.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Does the gentleman from Texas think the general act of incorporation would have the effect of repealing the specific charter of 1838?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I take it that that, according to the way this act is worded, would have become obsolete. Then if they wanted a new organization, which they are trying to get under this act, they could reorganize under the general act, and when corporations can organize under the general act it seems to me that they should do so without asking for special incorporation. The purposes stated in general are, among others, for benevolence, charitable, educational, and so forth.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Of course if that act repeals this special act, then that might present one situation, but if this special act is in existence, and there is an incorporation under it bearing this particular name for this particular function, that might exclude the organization under the general act. I want to find out what the state of facts is.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I find this statement in the letter of Dr. Cook, which is published as a part of the report, the letter being dated December 19, 1919:

By the enactment of 1896 of the medical practice act for the District of Columbia a larger part of the charter of the Medical Society of the District of Columbia, which had formerly licensed practitioners of medicine in this District, was repealed.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That is true.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not know what that act was. We do not have that act before us.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I looked up that act, and that act does repeal that part of this charter.

Mr. MANN. The act referred to was an act providing for the appointment of a commission, or whatever the title was, in the District of Columbia to license the practice of medicine. That repeals the provision in the original or amended charter which authorizes this society to license the practice of medicine, so this incorporation no longer has that authority.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understand that, but I wondered—it says "the larger part of the charter of the Medical Society of the District of Columbia."

Mr. MANN. That larger part was the act that covered a page or so in the statute. I looked it up.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Did it cover anything except authority to issue licenses?

Mr. MANN. It did not, as I understand it.

Mr. CLOUSE. What volume?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Sixth Statutes at Large, page 741. Can the gentleman from New York tell what is to become of the individuals and their successors who formed this corporation under the act of 1838?

Mr. KINDRED. I would say to the gentleman that these two societies, as I have clearly understood, amalgamated, and they found that after their amalgamation they needed a new charter in order to perform their proper functions.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. When did this purported amalgamation occur?

Mr. KINDRED. It is mentioned in the report.

Mr. BLANTON. Seven years ago.

Mr. KINDRED. Seven years ago.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Well, this corporation, as organized back in 1838, was organized to consist of a board of individuals and their successors, whom they might elect. Now, the corporation exists, or else it does not exist.

Mr. KINDRED. Does not the gentleman believe this repeals any prior rights under that charter?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It is an entire repeal.

Mr. KINDRED. That is what we are endeavoring to do.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. This measure substitutes the proposed bill for the other bill, commencing after the enacting clause—

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will yield, the report of the committee, which is before us, contains a statement of G. Wythe Cook, who assumes to speak for the Medical Society of the District of Columbia.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. As to his authority to speak for them, there is no evidence before the House, but he assumes to speak for them; therefore it is to be assumed the Medical Society of the District of Columbia still exists, and, of course, it is plain if it does exist, that it will not exist as the old medical society after this new one is incorporated, because this would repeal the old authority.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If these individuals named here are the legitimate successors of the individuals named by the former organization, I think it might be.

Mr. CRAMTON. But there is no evidence before us that they are. They may be a body of volunteers who represent no one but themselves.

Mr. MANN. I do not know that this will throw any light on the matter, but my understanding is that the Medical Society continues to exist under its original charter subject to the amendment passed taking away from them the authority to examine or license for the practice of medicine. I understand also that there is an association or society in the District of Columbia called the Medical Association, or some such name as that; that the two of them agreed to come together for the purpose of headquarters at least and desire now to have this bill passed, naming members of both of these societies as direct representatives under this bill, in order that they may own property or build a building and have headquarters. I do not understand that there is anything else to it.

Mr. KINDRED. Absolutely.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Well, the original charter, so far as duration of the corporation is concerned, provided:

Are hereby declared to be a community, corporation, a body politic, forever, or until Congress shall by law direct its charter to cease and determine.

Now, that corporation has acquired this real estate, or this equitable title to real estate, and the question that occurs to me is whether that organization is still in existence or whether we are creating an entirely new thing.

Mr. MANN. Oh, we are not creating an entirely new thing, as I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. May I have three more minutes?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. MANN. Under the law originally passed we can change the charter, or where they have already agreed on both sides for the two organizations to pool their issues and their property, and this proposes to let that be done, and by change of the charter we can give them that authority. The Medical Society will still own the property of the old medical society, and I suppose it will also own the property of the Medical Association if this bill passes.

Mr. KINDRED. In reply to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] as to whether the gentlemen are really representatives of the Medical Society of the District of Columbia as they purport to be, I want to repeat again that I know most of the men personally whose names are named as incorporators, and I know that they are as purporting to be, representatives of the Medical Society of the District of Columbia.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Now, the suggestion I wanted to make is that if the situation is as described by the gentleman from New York, if the old organization is still in existence and they want to form a new organization, I think the present bill has omitted a great many provisions of the original charter that ought to be in it.

Mr. CLOUSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Pardon me. I am using the time of the gentleman from Texas, and I want to make the point plain.

For instance, the name of the corporation is omitted from the first section; it might be implied in the second. The first part of the act says the old act "is hereby amended to read as follows." That strikes everything out of the old law, and we have to depend entirely on this bill for a charter, and this bill does not contain the elements usually contained in a charter for a corporation; it does not contain the elements the old charter contains; it does not provide for any officers. For instance, the old bill, in section 2, provided for president, two vice presidents, corresponding secretary, and treasurer. It would be difficult to tell under this law who would have the power to convey or the power to act. The old law provided for the manner of choosing successors. There is nothing here of that kind. The old law provided that they were empowered to make by-laws and rules and regulations. The present law just provides for rules and regulations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has again expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Just half a minute. The old law contains many sections which are usual and customary in creating a corporation. We wipe out the entire law, and then in three sections attempt to create the corporation.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it is not a question of good character of the individuals who are named in this bill as incorporators. I have no doubt of their good character. It is not a question of their good faith or their good intentions. But it is a question of what the Congress should do when it comes to a matter of granting a special act of incorporation to a particular set of individuals for a particular purpose.

I am not familiar with the act of 1838. I do not know what powers were conferred other than it has been brought out here that the power was conferred on the medical society to license practitioners. In other words, I take it that that was created at that time as some sort of a District agency. There was conferred upon it the power to exercise those functions usually exercised by government in the matter of licensing persons to practice medicine. Let me add, it is not a question, either, of a particular school of medicine that is here involved. I care nothing whatever about that. That which ought to be of interest to us is what this charter proposes to do. In lines 5 and 6, on page 2, these words occur:

For the purpose of promoting and disseminating medical and surgical knowledge.

Now, it is not a question of what the present incorporators intended to do under this act; it is a question of what they may do and their successors may do. A half century from now, after these gentlemen have all passed away, whatever intention they may have now, a medical school can be established here or can acquire property as vast as it can possibly acquire in the District of Columbia, and it shall have the power of disposal of it in the way that is fixed in the bill.

As a matter of fact, I am absolutely opposed to the granting of any of these special charters unless it be for some strictly governmental purpose. I did not oppose the granting of the charter to the Red Cross; the granting of a charter to those institutions that perform governmental functions; but an institution which proposes to run a private business ought to incorporate under the general incorporation laws of the District. If those laws are not sufficiently broad they ought to be amended and the parties ought not to have to come to Congress for any special act.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MILLSAUGH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. McARTHUR, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 1591 and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MILLSAUGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia, in order that it may have the attention of the committee and be more properly drawn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject which we have just had under consideration?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter to the Ways and Means Committee on five ways of paying the bonus and certain expressions in reference to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the matter referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I do not think we ought to indulge in that practice. If the gentleman wants to bring it to the attention of the Ways and Means Committee, of course he knows how to do it, but I do not think we ought to fill the RECORD up with arguments for or against this legislation at this time. Therefore I object.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that we have no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Fifty-eight Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and sixty-three Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 6309, known as the pawnbroker's bill; and in that connection I would like to inquire of any who might be opposed to the measure as to the disposition of time.

Mr. BLANTON. Under the rules of the House I would be entitled to a division of the time.

Mr. FOCHT. As a member of the committee?

Mr. BLANTON. As a member of the committee.

Mr. FOCHT. How much time would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. BLANTON. Thirty minutes to a side.

Mr. FOCHT. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this bill brings up memories of the famous Michael Martin Mulhall investigation, when we had before us, a committee headed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], an aggregation of local pawnbrokers for investigation. I think some considerable time should be allowed to the opposition to this bill. I hardly think half an hour would be sufficient time to those who devoted months and months in the summer time nine years ago to the consideration of that subject who might wish to be heard on this measure.

Mr. FOCHT. How much does the gentleman from Tennessee suggest?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think there should be at least two hours to a side.

Mr. BLANTON. Would the gentleman be willing to defer this matter to the next District day?

Mr. FOCHT. I suggest that we at least proceed to read the bill, and get that far.

Mr. BLANTON. I suggest an hour to a side.

Mr. FOCHT. That would be satisfactory to me.

Mr. Speaker, there is but one point involved in the entire bill. Inasmuch as the thought is not to proceed with the consideration of the bill to a conclusion to-day, I suggest that we make a beginning, and I hope we may be able to read the bill and then when we bring it up two weeks from now we may fix the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 6309. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 6309, known as the pawnbrokers' bill, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 6309, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6309) to regulate pawnbrokers and their business in the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following is hereby enacted and declared to be from the date of approval of this act the law governing pawnbrokers and their business in the District of Columbia, to the exclusion of and substitution for all preceding laws enacted respecting the same:

SEC. 2. That in the interpretation and construction of this act the following shall be observed, namely:

First. Words importing the singular number shall be held to include the plural, and vice versa, except where such construction would be unreasonable.

Second. Words importing the masculine gender shall be held to include all genders, except where such construction would be absurd or unreasonable.

Third. The word "person" shall be held to include and to apply to firms, partnerships, and corporations, unless such construction would be unreasonable.

SEC. 3. That any person who lends money on the deposit or pledge of personal property, other than written or printed evidences of indebtedness, is hereby declared and defined to be a pawnbroker.

SEC. 4. That no person shall be a pawnbroker in the District of Columbia without first having received a license so to be in accordance with the provisions of this act.

SEC. 5. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may, from time to time, grant licenses to such persons, citizens of the United States, as shall produce to them satisfactory evidence of good character, to be a pawnbroker, which license shall designate the place or building at or in which such person may do business, and no person shall do said business at or in any other place or building, except by the written permission of the said commissioners.

SEC. 6. That every person receiving such license shall pay therefor the sum of $500, and every such license shall expire one year from the date thereof. The license may be renewed by the commissioners from year to year on payment of the said sum for each year and upon performance of and compliance with the other conditions and provisions of this act.

SEC. 7. That every person receiving such license shall, at the time of receiving the same and before the same shall be operative, enter, with two sufficient sureties, into a joint and several bond of the District of Columbia in the penal sum of $5,000, conditioned for the due observance of the provisions of this act, and all and any of the acts of the Congress of the United States as shall or may be in force respecting pawnbrokers and their business at any time during the continuance of such license; and any person who shall or may be aggrieved by the misconduct of any pawnbroker and who shall have recovered judgment against such pawnbroker may, after the return unsatisfied, either in whole or in part, of any execution issued upon such judgment, maintain an action in his own name upon the bond of said pawnbroker in any court having jurisdiction of the amount claimed.

SEC. 8. That every pawnbroker shall keep a book in which shall be legibly written, at the time each loan is made, an accurate description of the goods, article, or thing pawned or pledged, the value thereof, the time of pledging the same, and the name and residence of the person pawning or pledging the said goods, article, or thing, together with a particular description of such person, including race, complexion, color of eyes and hair, height, and general appearance.

SEC. 9. That the said book shall at all reasonable times be open to the inspection of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, or any officer in the District of Columbia so authorized by the said commissioners.

SEC. 10. That every pawnbroker shall, at the time of the making of each loan, deliver to the person pawning or pledging any goods, article, or thing a memorandum or ticket containing the substance of the entry required to be made by him in his book, as aforesaid; and no charge shall be made or received by any pawnbroker for any such entry, memorandum, or ticket. Such memoranda or tickets shall be consecutively numbered; and upon the back of each such memorandum or ticket shall be printed in English the following: "If interest and charges on this loan in excess of the rate of 3 per cent per month up to and including $35 or of the rate of 2 per cent per month over $35 thereof be charged, asked, or received, this loan is void and of no effect; and the pawnbroker cannot be made to pay back the money loaned, or any interest thereon, or any charges or any part thereof, and the pawnbroker in such instances shall lose all right to the possession of the goods, article, or thing pawned, and shall surrender the same to the borrower or pawnbroker upon demand therefor and presentation of ticket or memorandum."

The pawnbroker shall not incur any penalty imposed by this act, or by other law relative to usury or to pawnbrokers or their business, unless the pawnbroker, at the time of making payment on a loan of $35 or less, then and there call the attention of the pawnbroker to the fact that he (the pawnbroker) owes the pawnbroker other sums which, when added to the indebtedness on which he is then making payment, amount to more than $35 and submits tickets showing such to be the fact; in which case a rate of 3 per cent a month may be charged up to $35, or the aggregate of such loans, and a rate of 2 per cent a month on all in excess of $35.

Not only shall the above language be printed on the tickets; but, in addition, that language shall be, and hereby is, made and declared to be law.

SEC. 11. That every pawnbroker shall make a daily statement of his transactions, describing the goods or pledges received, with a description of the person, together with his address, from whom the goods or pledges were received, to the major and superintendent of police or to the officer whom he may designate to receive the said report, before 12 o'clock noon of the following day.

SEC. 12. That no pawnbroker shall dispose of any pawn or pledge, except by surrendering it to the owner or pledger or his order until after the expiration of one year from the date of the loan, or of any payment made on account thereof; and the pledger may redeem the article at any time within the year by paying the amount of the loan and legal interest thereon. All sales by any pawnbroker of articles pledged with him shall be made at public auction by a duly licensed auctioneer.

SEC. 13. That notice of every sale shall be published at least six days immediately previous thereto in one of the daily newspapers of general circulation printed in the District of Columbia; and such notice shall specify the time and place at which such sale is to take place, the name of the auctioneer by whom the same is to be made, and a general description of the class of articles to be sold; and the pledger may, at any time prior to the sale, pay or tender to the pawnbroker the amount of the debt and interest thereon to date of tender or payment, together with the cost of advertising the sale, not exceeding 25 cents.

SEC. 14. That the surplus money, if any, arising from any such sale after deducting the amount of the loans, the interest then due on the same, and the expenses of the advertisement shall be paid over by the pawnbroker to the person who would be entitled to redeem the pledge in case no such sale had taken place.

SEC. 15. That no pawnbroker shall make any loan on the separate or divided part or parts of any one article or thing which shall have been offered entirely or collectively to him by way of pawn or pledge.

SEC. 16. That no pawnbroker shall sell or keep for sale any merchandise or secondhand article or thing except such as may have been pawned to him and sold at public auction to the highest bidder as aforesaid. Any article sold to a pawnbroker with the understanding that it is to be purchased from him by the seller thereof, or by any person acting for such purchaser, shall be deemed to be pawned within the meaning of this act.

SEC. 17. That no pawnbroker shall receive any pledge, pawn article, or thing whatever knowingly from any person of unsound mind, or from any person whom the major and superintendent of police, or one whom he may designate, shall in writing certify to be of unsound mind, or shall in writing certify that such person neglects all lawful business, or that he is squandering his earnings or wasting his estate, or that he is likely to bring himself or family to want, or to render himself and family a public charge, or that he is suspected of thievery.

SEC. 18. That no pawnbroker shall deface, obliterate, melt, separate, or break into parts any article or thing received by him in pawn, or in any manner do, or cause or suffer to be done by others, anything which may destroy or tend to destroy or impair the identity of such article.

SEC. 19. That a pawnbroker may lawfully charge upon the total indebtedness of any person to him a rate of interest not to exceed 3 per cent per month up to and including the $35, and 2 per cent per month on such total indebtedness over $35 and no more, subject, however, to the provisions of section 10 hereof. Interest on any loan shall not be payable in advance, and shall be computed on unpaid balances only, at simple interest; and no pawnbroker shall charge any examination fee or make any charge whatsoever in excess of the interest, the auctioneer's commission, and advertisement cost provided for by this act. Nothing herein contained shall prevent the pawnbroker from charging and collecting at least one month's interest on each loan.

SEC. 20. That no business shall be transacted by a pawnbroker on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday.

SEC. 21. That any pawnbroker who shall violate or neglect or refuse to comply with any of the provisions of this act or other laws on the subject shall for every such offense, upon conviction before a court of competent jurisdiction, pay a fine of $500 or be sentenced to six months imprisonment, or both, at the discretion of the court. Upon conviction hereafter of any pawnbroker under the provisions of this or any other act his license shall be revoked by the said Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and a new license shall not be granted to him for the period of one year from the date of such revocation: Provided, That in case of appeal to the courts the license shall not be revoked until after such conviction shall be finally affirmed.

SEC. 22. That in addition to the advertisement of sale in a newspaper it shall be the duty of every pawnbroker to send a letter to the pawnor at least three weeks before a sale, calling his attention to the fact that his loan is due, and that his pledge will be sold if the loan is not paid or satisfactorily arranged. The said letter shall be sent to the pawnor in the name given by him at the time of the making of the loan and to his last known place of address, and all letters returned by the Post Office Department undelivered shall be kept for three years as evidence.

SEC. 23. That in addition to the bond above mentioned every such pawnbroker before entering business as aforesaid shall be required to take out a policy or policies of insurance against loss by fire or theft sufficient in amount to cover the fair market value of all articles left with him in pledge as security for loans, which said policy or policies of insurance shall be filed with the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and made payable to them as trustees and shall be held for the protection of any and all persons whose property pledged with said pawnbroker as aforesaid may be stolen or destroyed by fire.

SEC. 24. That no person, being a pawnbroker or the employee of a pawnbroker, shall make any loan or advance, or permit to be made any loan or advance, to any minor under the age of 16 years; or in any manner to receive, directly or indirectly, any goods, chattels, wares, or merchandise from any such minor under the age of 16 years, in pledge for loans made or to be made to such minor or to any other person.

SEC. 25. That no person shall act as an intermediary between any pawnbroker or the employee of a pawnbroker to effect any loan the benefit of which shall accrue to any minor under the age of 16 years.

SEC. 26. That any person violating any of the provisions of sections 24 and 25 shall be subject to a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $100 for each offense, to be collected by process of summary conviction before any magistrate or justice of the peace as like fines and penalties are now by law collected; or in case of nonpayment of such fine within 48 hours, to undergo an imprisonment for a period not exceeding five days.

SEC. 27. That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation, being in possession of goods and chattels of any description belonging to another, either as storage or warehouseman, pawnbroker, secondhand dealer, or junk dealer, to conceal from any marshal or deputy marshal intrusted with the execution of any writ, any such goods or chattels, with intent to prevent any such goods or chattels from being taken or levied upon under any such writ.

SEC. 28. That the refusal to disclose or point out to any such marshal or deputy marshal the whereabouts of any such goods or chattels shall be evidence of the intent to conceal such goods and chattels.

SEC. 29. That any keeper, owner, proprietor, or any person in charge of any such storage or warehouse, pawnshop, secondhand store, or junk shop, who shall violate, neglect, fail, or refuse to comply with all of the provisions of sections 27 and 28, or any of them, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction before any court of competent jurisdiction be fined not exceeding $500 or undergo an imprisonment of not more than one year, or both, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 30. That part payments on loans must be accepted, provided interest to date be tendered or paid and allowances therefor made on credits.

SEC. 31. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7158) to amend the Army appropriation act approved July 11, 1919, so as to release appropriations for the completion of the acquisition of real estate in certain cases and making additional appropriations therefor.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 10329) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. OVERMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 10267) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. JONES of New Mexico as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. STERLING and Mr. MCKELLAR members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Bureau of Naturalization, Department of Labor.

PAWNBROKERS' BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] is recognized.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, on Friday, January 30, 1922, I appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means to advocate the passage of a bill to provide adjusted compensation for veterans of the World War and to suggest a method of raising the money necessary for this purpose.

A number of questions were asked me at that time by the various members of the committee in reference to the various forms proposed by H. R. 1 for the payment of such adjusted compensation, but since I was appearing especially to urge a method, rather than a form, of payment I did not go into the optional plans fully. In view of the questions asked me by the committee, I feel that I should make the following supplemental statement, which I do herewith, after consultation with ex-service men in my district:

Section 3 of H. R. 1 gives the five following optional plans:

1. To receive adjusted service pay;
2. To receive adjusted service certificate;
3. To receive vocational-training aid;
4. To receive farm or home aid; and
5. To receive land-settlement aid.

I desire to suggest the advisability of omitting from the proposed bill all forms of payment except No. 1, adjusted service pay, popularly known as the "cash bonus."

It has been estimated by Army, Navy, and Marine Corps authorities that if all the ex-service men eligible for adjusted compensation should take cash, that the bonus would cost the Government $1,510,870,748.

It has been estimated by the same authorities that should the ex-service men in the Army take 50 per cent cash, 20 per cent certificates, 5 per cent vocational training, 12½ per cent farm or home aid, and 12½ per cent land settlement, this would cost the American people $2,227,105,116 for the Army alone.

If the Navy and Marine Corps should take 75 per cent cash, 10 per cent certificates, 2 per cent vocational training, 6½ per cent farm or home aid, and 6½ per cent land settlement, this would cost for the Navy $263,694,437.75 and for the Marine Corps $38,877,592.67, making a total of $2,529,677,146.42.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Is this proposition which the gentleman is presenting one that would be satisfactory to the Legion men?

Mr. HILL. It is satisfactory to Legion men in my district whom I have consulted. I do not attempt to speak for the Legion, although I am a member.

Mr. SNELL. Several other spokesmen for the Legion on the floor of the House have given us to understand that they do not care for the cash bonus, but prefer the adjusted compensation and vocational education.

Mr. HILL. I do not think any one ex-service man can speak for all the other ex-service men. I do not think that is possible.

Mr. SNELL. But the gentleman's idea is that the ex-service men prefer the cash bonus?

Mr. HILL. Yes. I thought it fair to make this statement. I feel that the men want the bonus in cash.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. How many ex-service men did the gentleman consult in his district?

Mr. HILL. I consulted the membership of certain posts, speaking to about 140 individual men, who knew the opinions of other ex-service men.

Mr. BANKHEAD. How many ex-service men are there in the gentleman's district?

Mr. HILL. Roughly speaking, in the State there are about 60,000. In my district I think there are from about 4,500 to 10,000.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. LINEBERGER. The gentleman stated that there are about 4,500 ex-service men in his district. The average in the country is 11,000 per district. The gentleman must at least have the average number. Dividing approximately 4,500,000 men by 435 Members gives us practically 11,000 ex-service men in each congressional district.

Mr. HILL. That seems to be reasonable, because I know that in the State of Maryland there are about 60,000 ex-service men and six congressional districts, and that would make 10,000 to a district. But out of the total number of ex-service men we were actually able to get the names of only about 4,500 or 4,600. I am offering this suggestion as my own view, not as the spokesman of ex-service men any more than that I am myself an ex-service man, and I represent a good many of them.

The cost of all plans except that of actual cash payments is entirely problematical and range from the above guessed-at estimate of two and a half billion dollars to various sums ranging around $5,000,000,000.

The adoption of all except an actual cash payment will lead to enormous administrative expenses entailed upon the National Government for a long period of years, increasing the dangers of bureaucracy as well as adding enormous additional expenses.

The only reason for paying the soldier bonus is to partially adjust compensation received by ex-service people in comparison with industrial workers during the war. The so-called bonus has its only logical and fair foundation upon the basis of a debt owed. It is not a gratuity, nor is it a form of pension; it should be treated frankly as a debt and paid in cash, which is the only certain way for the Government and the cheapest way for the Government.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARNER. The President of the United States in his communication to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORNEY] calls the bonus a gratuity. Three different times in that letter he says it is purely a gratuity. Does the gentleman differ with the President with reference to that?

Mr. HILL. I have not seen that letter, but I regard the bonus as purely and solely a debt and not a gratuity.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. If we were paying four and a half million men in the service during the war $33 a month, and at the same time letting their brothers at home who were not in the trenches of France receive $300 a month, why is not the bonus a debt?

Mr. HILL. I agree with my colleague that it is a debt, and that is the only ground upon which I am for it.

Mr. GARNER. Then if the difference between $33 a month and $300 a month is a debt, why does the gentleman propose to make a partial payment of only $1 a day, or $30 a month during that time? Why does he not propose to pay the soldiers the full amount that we owe them?

Mr. HILL. I will say to my colleague that that is a very pertinent question, and I consider the amount provided in the bill which formerly passed the House as a fair compromise of the debt since we always try to compromise debts when we can not afford to pay them in full.

Mr. GARNER. I never heard of the United States trying to compromise a debt that it owed anyone. I always understood that it paid 100 cents on the dollar.

Mr. HILL. In a great many cases the United States has compromised debts through the law officers of the Government, and has paid them on a compromise basis.

Mr. GARNER. Not under authority of Congress though.

Mr. HILL. I will say that I always supposed that the law officers of the Government who made compromises acted under the authority of Congress.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. What is that debt for?

Mr. HILL. This debt arises out of the difference between the amount paid to volunteer and drafted men for services rendered, and the amount received by men in civil life who were doing precisely the same kind of work under a great deal more favorable circumstances.

Mr. WALSH. Were there any men in civil life who were fighting?

Mr. HILL. May I add this explanation? In the Twentieth Division, which had its headquarters at Anniston, Ala., I personally saw enlisted men doing carpenter work at soldiers' pay on one side of the road, and civilians from Anniston, Ala., doing similar carpenter work on similar Government buildings on the other side of the road. The soldiers were receiving soldier pay and the civilians received from $8 to $12 a day. Furthermore, I saw drafted men and volunteer men in France breaking stone, mending French roads, doing laborer work, unloading freight cars, doing all sorts of work at soldiers' pay, when the best accommodations for sleeping that could be given them were lofts in stables. These men were receiving their soldier pay, while their brothers at home were being paid anywhere from $5 a day up.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think civilians were paid any too much?

Mr. HILL. Yes; I do. My judgment is that the civilians should have been drafted and given less pay.

Mr. MANN. If that is the case, then if the compensation of the soldiers is adjusted, should not these civilians pay part of the cost?

Mr. HILL. Yes; I should think so.

Mr. MANN. On what basis has it ever been proposed that they should?

Mr. HILL. On the basis which I have always advocated, a tax on light wines and beer. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. No; that is not a basis. That is just wild imagination.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. HILL. I will say to my colleague that I have in my pocket a resolution adopted by the American Federation of Labor which would seem to indicate that there is a very strong sentiment for such a payment basis, and I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to incorporate that resolution in my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated by him. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The document referred to is as follows:

After a thorough consideration of the question of national prohibition as provided for in the Volstead Act, the executive council of the American Federation of Labor adopted the following declaration, which is in conformity with the declaration adopted by the American Federation of Labor convention in Denver:

To the American people:

The American Federation of Labor, as the spokesman of the unorganized as well as the organized toilers, having in mind the interest and the welfare of our people, decided by unanimous vote in its convention held in Denver, in June, 1921, that the Volstead Enforcement Act must be modified so as to promote the manufacture and sale of beer and light wines.

Before this decision was reached the executive council of the American Federation of Labor had caused to be made an exhaustive investigation of the effects of the Volstead Act. It was shown by this investigation that there had been:

1. A general disregard of the law among all classes of people, including those who made the law.
2. Creation of thousands of moonshiners among both country and city dwellers.
3. The creation of an army of bootleggers.
4. An amazing increase in the traffic in poisons and deadly concoctions and drugs.
5. An increased rate of insanity, blindness, and crime among the users of these concoctions and drugs.
6. Increase in unemployment due to loss of employment by workers in 45 industries directly or indirectly connected with the manufacture of liquors.
7. Increase in taxes to city, State, and National Governments amounting to approximately $1,000,000,000 per year.

Having in mind these results of the extreme interpretation of the prohibition amendment contained in the Volstead Act, as well as the enormous expense of the attempt to enforce that unenforceable legislation, it is our conclusion that the act is an improper interpretation of the prohibition amendment; that it is a social and a moral failure; and that it is a dangerous breeder of discontent and of contempt for all law.

Something of the economic effect of the Volstead law may be seen by considering the fact that in 1918, according to Government statistics, $110,000,000 worth of farm products were consumed by breweries, and that the transportation of these products to the manufacturer and thence to the consumer necessitated the use of 133,666 railroad cars. In addition to this, breweries in operation in 1918 consumed 50,000 carloads of coal. It must be obvious that the total economic effect of the destruction of this industry is tremendous.

The American Federation of Labor always has been the advocate of law and order and always has endeavored to create conditions which would make possible the highest type of citizenship.

We do not protest against the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution which now is a part of the fundamental law of the land. We do not protest against the principle established by the eighteenth amendment. It is our contention that the eighteenth amendment under a reasonable and proper legislative interpretation would be beneficial to our country and would have the support of the great majority of our people.

The eighteenth amendment, however, under the present drastic and unreasonable legislative interpretation has a destructive and deteriorating effect and influence in every direction.

We seek no violation of the eighteenth amendment, but, on the contrary, we declare for a reasonable interpretation of that amendment in order that the law may be enforceable and enforced, and in order that the people of our country may not suffer from an unjust and fanatical interpretation of the Constitution.

We urge therefore that all citizens in every walk of life demand from their Representatives and Senators in Washington immediate relief from the unwarranted restriction contained in the Volstead Act; and we likewise suggest to the citizenship of our country the wisdom and advisability of bearing in mind the attitude toward this issue of office-holders and aspirants to office in coming elections in order that there may be restored to the people the lawful use of wholesome beer and light wines, which, under the provisions of the eighteenth amendment, can and should be rightfully declared as nonintoxicating beverages.

EXECUTIVE COUNCIL AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield with pleasure to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. I wonder if the gentleman remembers when those carpenters down in Alabama had been exempted from the draft in order that in industry they might earn from $300 to $500 a month during the war, that when they stopped work and the distinguished Senator from Colorado, Mr. Thomas, introduced an amendment, following Gen. Crowder's recommendation, that when they stopped work they would have to fight, and he attempted to pass the work-or-fight proposition, does the gentleman remember that it was the same organization, the resolution of which he has just had inserted in the Record, that defeated the Thomas work-or-fight amendment and let those men stay in idleness when they had been exempted from the draft in order to earn $300 a month? And as a result 670,000 18-year-old boys had to be drafted. Does the gentleman remember that?

Mr. HILL. I will say to my colleague that even before the carpenter work at Camp McClellan was finished I had left and was not in the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. You could not pay much attention to a resolution coming from an organization like that.

Mr. HILL. Except that it was in accordance with my own views.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am interested in the gentleman's estimate because I think it is worthy of consideration as coming from him because he is an ex-service man and because he has discussed it with his colleagues. I understand the gentleman thinks that a large majority of the men would choose the cash bonus.

Mr. HILL. I do.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Has the gentleman an estimate of the percentage of the number who would take the cash bonus?

Mr. HILL. I would say that I have made no tabulation, I have not been able to, but I have received through quite authentic sources within the past two weeks reports from my district to the effect that not more than 5 per cent of ex-service men in Baltimore city would select forms of compensation other than the cash bonus. I asked for an inquiry to be made. They are not interested in the deferred payments.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman is aware no doubt that the officials, both of the Legion and of the Veterans of Foreign Wars and others, all place the estimate of those that will take the cash bonus as less than 50 per cent; in fact, some went as low as 20 per cent. In the report of the Senate committee on the so-called McCumber bill the estimate was made that 80 per cent would take the alternatives. The gentleman disagrees with that?

Mr. HILL. I do.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And the gentleman thinks that 95 per cent would take the cash bonus?

Mr. HILL. I do; and I might say that in the great cities it will get closer to 100 per cent who would take the cash bonus.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And the gentleman thinks that we ought to be prepared at once to pay the total amount of the cash bonus—a billion and a half?

Mr. HILL. I do; in installments as proposed by H. R. 1.

The Ways and Means Committee allowed me an opportunity to appear before it and discuss this bonus. I was asked questions about the five propositions, but I had been so absorbed in finding a method to pay the bonus that I had not considered the five forms. But I have informed myself on them and I have come to the conclusion that there is only one ground to pay the bonus, and that is as a debt. If it is not a debt, we ought not to pay it; and if it is a debt, the American people ought to pay it and get rid of it.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman is a pronounced advocate of one of the methods of paying a bonus.

Mr. HILL. I am. In connection with the above cash cost of the bonus, $1,510,870,748, I again desire to call your attention to the fact that this bonus can be immediately paid by a tax on nonintoxicating wines and beers, and that a tax of 20 cents a gallon on 2.75 per cent beer, admitted to be nonintoxicating, will raise over $400,000,000 a year and pay the above cash bonus in a maximum of four years.

I am for the immediate payment of the bonus, and take the liberty of suggesting the above for your consideration. We owe this money to the ex-service people, and they ought to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be recognized in opposition to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 1 hour. The gentleman from Maryland has used 15 minutes.

Mr. FOCHT rose.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question. Has the usual motion been made to strike out the enacting clause? [Laughter.]

Mr. FOCHT. Of the bonus bill or the beer bill? [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, during the period that we are marking time, assuming that the membership ought to be familiar with the object of prolonging this session beyond the point of completing the reading of the bill, I would like to refer to a question that has been raised here this afternoon which pertains particularly to the District of Columbia and, I might add, to all who come to the Capital, and that is the question of an adequate water supply. I can not comprehend what can actuate any citizen of the District or any Member of the Senate or House in opposing the early consideration, and seriously, with a view of promptly making provision for a number of years ahead as well as for immediate water consumption. I may speak from the standpoint of hygiene, and we take it for granted that every man in this civilized time has daily use for a bathtub. When we look back over the wide sweep of history and find that Pliny speaks of pistons and cylinders for pumping water and also we read of Roman baths, and even down in Mexico the first thing they were discovered to have were conduits running up to the mountains for their own water supply. Strange, is it not, that the last thing we thought of in our civilization was to have an adequate water supply in our homes? Now, when we have this great luxury I can not understand why there is anyone so far behind the times, so unfair to his own body, inside and out, as to oppose an adequate water supply. It marks the high point of civilization and is only following the Divine word of the Master to keep clean, while common prudence should warn us to be ready for conflagrations.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6309) to regulate pawnbrokers in the District of Columbia, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. SPEAKS, indefinitely, on account of illness.

Mr. LEA of California, temporarily, on account of sickness.

Miss ROBERTSON, for 10 days, on account of important business.

Mr. BELL, for two weeks, on account of important business.

Mr. DREWRY, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

Mr. APPELBY, for three days, on account of important business.

PRINTING OF ADDRESS IN EIGHT-POINT TYPE.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, this morning I secured permission of the House to print in the Record an address delivered by the Attorney General. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the usual 8-point type.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 28, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 28, 1922.

(Legislative day of Thursday, February 23, 1922.)

The Senate met in open executive session at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

WORLD WAR FOREIGN DEBT COMMISSION.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I wish to make a request of the Senate.

On the 23d day of February the Senate passed a resolution, introduced by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], requiring the Judiciary Committee to inquire into the eligibility of Senator SMOOT and Representative BURTON to become members of the World War Foreign Debt Commission. The resolution was passed late in the day on the 23d, it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and reached that committee on the 24th. The chairman of the committee immediately appointed a subcommittee of five members. The subcommittee has held meetings, but has been unable to come to a conclusion. Under the terms of the resolution we were to report to the Senate to-day. I ask unanimous consent that the time for the committee to report may be extended for 10 days.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES.

Mr. LODGE submitted a concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 19), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring). That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m. to-day for the purpose of receiving such communication as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

AMENDMENT TO THE RULES—DEBATE ON APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, as in legislative session and pursuant to the notice I gave yesterday, I desire to submit a resolution, and I ask that it may be read and lie on the table.

The resolution (S. Res. 245) was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That Rule XVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate be, and it is hereby, amended by adding at the end thereof the following paragraph:

5. When an appropriation bill is under consideration by the Senate debate shall be confined to the bill, unless otherwise ordered by unanimous consent. A point of order that a Senator is not speaking to the bill shall be decided by the Presiding Officer and an appeal from his decision shall be decided without debate.

TREATMENT OF EX-SERVICE MEN.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, as in legislative session I ask consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from last Sunday's issue of the Washington Post relative to the treatment of veterans of the World War by the Government. I ask that it be printed in 8-point type, in order that the figures in the article may show more plainly. It contains some very valuable information.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of Feb. 26, 1922.]

FORBES SAYS YANKS FARE BEST OF ALL—UNITED STATES MORE LIBERAL TO VETERANS THAN OTHER NATIONS, ASSERTS BUREAU HEAD—HAS SPENT $1,259,930.724—NUMBER OF CLAIMS ALLOWED NOW TOTALS 831,767—104,579 RECEIVING VOCATIONAL TRAINING.

(By the Associated Press.)

CHICAGO, February 25.

The United States Government has been more liberal and has provided far greater benefits than any other nation for its former soldiers, Col. Charles R. Forbes, Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, declared to-day in a statement reviewing the work of this bureau. A total of $1,259,930,724.99 has been expended by the Government for its former service population, he declared.

"During the time that the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and the Rehabilitation Division of the Federal Board for Vocational Education were in operation and during the five months of existence of the present United States Veterans' Bureau," the statement said, "1,418,912 claims have been made by veterans, divided as follows: 486,884 for vocational training, 171,875 for insurance, and 760,153 for death and disability compensation."

TOTAL OF 831,767 CLAIMS ALLOWED.

Out of this number, he added, a total of 831,767 claims had been allowed by the bureau, while 472,170 had been disallowed. On December 31, 1921, he said, there were 114,975 claims waiting final adjudication. During 1921, 66,637 veterans reinstated their term insurance and 3,677 reinstated their converted policies, making a total of 70,314. During the same period 76,172 converted their war-time insurance, making a total of 339,167 veterans who still have term policies, with 259,730 having converted insurance policies, a grand total of 598,897 who are still carrying their Government insurance.

Since the bureau started operations, Col. Forbes said, $281,756,392.69 has been paid in insurance claims—$278,239,146.93 for death and disability on term policies and $3,517,345.45 on converted policies for death and disability claims. During the year the Government received $47,442,993 in premiums and $993,697 was set aside for insurance dividends.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING FOR 304,579.

At the close of the year there were 104,579 veterans receiving vocational education, the bureau reported. Of this number 93,914 were in section 2 training, which carried maintenance pay ranging from $80 to $170 a month, in addition to the tuition, books, supplies, and equipment, and 10,644 veterans were undergoing vocational training in section 3 training, which provides tuition, books, supplies, etc., but no maintenance pay. Since the Government undertook the rehabilitation work, it was reported, 119,881 men and women have been placed in section 2 training and 17,187 in section 3.

According to the medical division report, 28,687 veterans were undergoing hospitalization last December 31, 11,646 being in tubercular hospitals, 8,272 in neuropsychiatric and mental institutions, and 8,769 in general hospitals. Since the creation of the bureau, it was said, 206,039 veterans have received hospital treatment and 1,115,259 medical examinations.

As in legislative session,

SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATE FOR MILITIA, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA
(S. DOC. NO. 139).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, for militia, District of Columbia, in amount $4,500, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MAIL CONTRACT WITH COPPER RIVER & NORTHWESTERN RAILWAY CO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster General transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of the special contract entered into by the Post Office Department with the Copper River & Northwestern Railway Co. for carrying the mails between Cordova and Kennecott, Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

MAIL CONTRACT WITH PACIFIC & ARCTIC RAILWAY & NAVIGATION CO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster General transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of the special contract entered into between the Post Office Department and the Pacific & Arctic Railway & Navigation Co. for carrying the mails between Skagway and White Pass, Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

MAIL CONTRACT WITH ALASKAN ENGINEERING COMMISSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster General transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of the special contract entered into between the Post Office Department and the Alaskan Engineering Commission for carrying the mails on the Government railroad as far as the trains may be operated during the winter season between Seward and Fairbanks, Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

As in legislative session,

Mr. SWANSON presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Norfolk, Va., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARRIS presented a letter in the nature of a petition of the St. Simons Island (Ga.) Board of Trade, praying for acceptance of the proposals of Henry Ford relative to the Muscle Shoals project, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. CAPPER presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Anderson County, Kans., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Fordney tariff bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KING presented a telegram, in the nature of a memorial, from F. C. Schiramm, president of the Salt Lake City (Utah) Commercial Club and Chamber of Commerce, representing 1,600 members, remonstrating against the enactment of any general bonus legislation for ex-service men, but favoring rehabilitation and assistance to those disabled in the World War, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Dr. Joseph Hughes and sundry other citizens of Spanish Fork, Utah, praying for the construction of the post-office building at Spanish Fork, Utah, for which it is stated an appropriation of $50,000 was made nearly 13 years ago, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

As in legislative session,

Mr. BROUSSARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 2599) for the relief of the receiver of the Gulf, Florida & Alabama Railway Co., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 516) thereon.

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 2558) for the relief of Richard P. McCullough (Rept. No. 517); and

A bill (H. R. 7870) for the relief of I. C. Johnson, jr. (Rept. No. 518).

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 8815) to amend the act of March 1, 1921 (41 Stat., p. 1202), entitled "An act to authorize certain homestead settlers or entrymen who entered the military or naval service of the United States during the war with Germany to make final proof of their entries" (Rept. No. 519); and

A bill (H. R. 8832) to provide for the exchange of certain lands of the United States in the Tahoe National Forest, Calif., for lands owned by William Kent (Rept. No. 520).

Mr. STANFIELD, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10185) authorizing the exchange of lands within the exterior boundaries of the Malheur National Forest, in the State of Oregon, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 521) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

As in legislative session, bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. KELLOGG:

A bill (S. 3209) granting to the Northern Pacific Railway Co. the right to construct and maintain a bridge across the Mississippi River at Minneapolis, in the State of Minnesota; to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (S. 3210) granting a pension to Catherine Carroll; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HARRISON:

A bill (S. 3211) for the relief of the estate of W. L. Dunham; and

A bill (S. 3212) for the relief of the estate of Jacob L. Green; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. ROBINSON:

A bill (S. 3213) for the relief of Margaret Richards (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

A bill (S. 3214) making an appropriation to provide for the establishment and maintenance of a forest experiment station in the Lake States; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. NEWBERRY:

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL] is absent on account of serious illness in his family. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on account of a death in his family.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

As in legislative session,

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 48) providing for a joint meeting to-day of the two Houses in the Hall of the House of Representatives, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5013) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to sanction the use of certain titles on tablets and other memorials.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 2265) to regulate marine insurance in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and it was subsequently signed by the Vice President.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES.

Mr. LODGE. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the concurrent resolution just received from the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Tuesday, the 28th day of February, 1922, at 12.30 o'clock in the afternoon, for the purpose of receiving such communication as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate concur in the resolution of the House.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in order to carry out the concurrent resolution from the House which has just been adopted, I move that the Senate stand in recess for one hour, to enable the Senate to proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess for one hour.

The Senate, preceded by the Sergeant at Arms, the President pro tempore, and the Assistant Secretary, proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The address of the President of the United States this day delivered at a joint meeting of the two Houses of Congress is as follows:

The PRESIDENT. Members of the Congress, when addressing the Congress last December I reported to you the failure of the Executive to carry out the intent of certain features of the merchant marine act of 1920, notably the provision for the notice of cancellation of all commercial treaties which hindered our grant of discriminating duties on imports brought to our shores in American ships. There was no doubt about the high purpose of Congress to apply this proven practice to the upbuilding of our merchant marine. It had proven most effective in the earlier days of American shipping; it had, at various times, demonstrated its effectiveness in the upbuilding of commercial shipping for other nations.

The success of the earlier practice for this Republic came at a time when we had few treaties, when our commerce was little developed. Its superseding by reciprocity in shipping regulations, and the adoption of other methods of upbuilding merchant marines, through various forms of Government aid, and the century of negotiation of commercial treaties, all combined to develop a situation which should lead to endless embarrassment if we denounced our treaties. We should not only be quite alone in supporting a policy long since superseded through the growing intimacy of international relationships, but we should invite the disturbance of those cordial commercial relations which are the first requisite to the expansion of our commerce abroad.

Contemplating the readiness of Congress to grant a decreased duty on imports brought to our shores in American bottoms, and facing the embarrassments incident to readjustment of all treaty arrangements, it seemed desirable to find a way of applying suitable aid to our shipping, which the Congress clearly intended, and at the same time avoid the embarrassment of our trade relations abroad.

The recommendation of to-day is based wholly on this commendable intent of Congress. The proposed aid of the Government to its merchant marine is to have its chief source in the duties collected on imports. Instead of applying the discriminating duty to the specific cargo and thus encouraging only the inbound shipment, I propose that we shall collect all import duties, without discrimination as between American and foreign bottoms, and apply the heretofore proposed reduction to create a fund for the Government's aid to our merchant marine. By such a program we shall encourage not alone the carrying of inbound cargoes subject to our tariffs but we shall strengthen American ships in the carrying of that greater inbound tonnage on which no duties are levied, and, more important than these, we shall equip our merchant marine to serve our outbound commerce, which is the measure of our eminence in foreign trade.

It is interesting to note, in connection with the heretofore proposed plan of discriminating tariffs on imports, carried to our shores in American bottoms, that the total value of all dutiable imports for 1920, in all vessels, was $1,985,865,000, while the cargoes admitted free of duty, on which no discrimination was possible, were valued at $3,115,958,000. The actual tonnage comparison is even more significant from the viewpoint of cargo carrying, because the dutiable cargoes measured, in round numbers, 10,000,000 tons and the nondutiable cargoes were 25,000,000 tons. The larger employment, by two and a half times, was in nondutiable shipments.

Continued trade must be reciprocal. We can not long maintain sales where we do not buy. In the promotion of these exchanges we should have as much concern for the promotion of sales as for the facilitation of our purchases. There is not a record in all history of long-maintained eminence in export trade, except as the exporting nations developed their own carrying capacity.

No story of national development is more fascinating or so full of romance as that of developing capacity for the exchanges of commerce. Expanding civilization may be traced over the avenues of exchanging cargoes. No matter how materialistic it may sound, nations have developed for themselves and have influenced the world almost precisely as they have promoted their commerce. We need not refer to the armed conflicts which have been incident thereto. When commerce has been destroyed fading glories have attended.

It will avail nothing to attempt even the briefest résumé of our own efforts to reestablish that American importance in commerce carrying on the high seas which was recorded in the earlier days of the Republic. The aspiration is nation wide. The conflict between two schools of political thought heretofore has defeated all efforts to employ the governmental aid which other nations found advantageous while we held aloof, and the terms "subsidy" and "subvention" were made more or less hateful to the American public. But the nation-wide desire to restore our merchant marine has outlived all defeats and every costly failure.

Eight years ago the aspiration found expression in a movement to have the Government sponsor an enterprise in which individual genius seemingly had failed. It would be difficult correctly to appraise the policy, because the World War put an end to all normal activities. Before we were involved our shipyards were suddenly turned to feverish and costly activities by the call of the allied powers for shipping, without which they could not hope to survive. American energies were applied to construction for others, as we had never dreamed of doing for ourselves. When we were later engaged we trebled and quadrupled the output on our own account. Allied resources were called upon to build to meet the destruction by submarine warfare, and ships were so essential that material for them was given priority over arms and munitions. There was the call for ships, and ships, and yet more ships, and we enlarged old yards and established new ones, without counting the cost. We build madly, extravagantly, impractically, and yet miraculously, but we met a pressing need and performed a great service.

A people indifferent to the vital necessity of a merchant marine to the national defense ungrudgingly expended at five times the cost of normal construction and appropriated billions where millions had been denied before. We acquired vast tonnage. Some of it, much of it, is suited to the peace service of expanded commerce. Some of it, much of it, may be charged to the errors and extravagances of war-time anxiety and haste. The war program and that completion of contracts which followed because such a course seemed best to those then charged with responsibility gave us something more than 12,000,000 gross tonnage, not counting the folly of the wood construction, at a total outlay of approximately three and one-half billions of dollars.

We thus became possessed of the vehicles of a great merchant marine. Not all of it was practical for use in the transoceanic trades; little of it was built for the speed which gives the coveted class to outstanding service. But here was vast tonnage for cargo service; and the Government, in the exceptional call of commerce which immediately followed the war, sought the establishment of shipping lines in every direction calculated to enhance our foreign trade and further cement our friendly relations.

The movement lacked in most cases that inherent essential to success which is found in individual initiative. It was rather a Government experiment, where lines were established in high hope and little assurance, because the Public Treasury was to bear the burden. There was the mere suggestion of private enterprise, inasmuch as allocations and charters were made under which private management was to share in profits and private interests were paid to make the experiment, though the Government was to bear all the losses. I forbear the detailed recital. The misadventure was so unfortunate that when the present administration came into responsibility the losses were approximately $16,000,000 a month, and to the cost of failure was added the humiliation of ships libeled in foreign ports.

In spite of all the later losses in operation, however, it is quite beyond question that our abundance of American tonnage was mainly responsible for our ability to share in the good fortunes of world trade during the two years immediately following the war. In all probability the losses we have sustained in our shipping activities were fully compensated to the American people in the saving of ocean freights in that period.

To-day we are possessed of vast tonnage, large and very costly experience, and the conviction of failure. It is fair to say that a mistaken policy was made more difficult by the unparalleled slump in shipping which came late in 1920 and prevailed throughout the year so recently closed. It was the inevitable reflex of the readjustments which follow a great war, and there were heavy losses in operations which had to be met by long-established and heretofore successful shipping lines, and ships built at top war costs took the slump in prices below the normal levels of peace.

But we have our ships, the second largest tonnage in the world, and we have the aspiration, ay, let me say, the determination, to establish a merchant marine commensurate with our commercial importance. Our problem is to turn the ships and our experience and aspirations into the effective development of an ocean-going shipping service, without which there can be no assurance of maintained commercial eminence, without which any future conflict at arms will send us building again, wildly and extravagantly, when the proper concern for this necessary agency of commerce in peace will be our guaranty of defense in case that peace is disturbed.

Out of the story of the making of great merchant marines and out of our own experience we ought to find the practical solution. Happily we are less provincial than we once were, happily we have come to know how inseparable are our varied interests. Nobody pretends any longer that shipping is a matter of concern only to the ports involved. Commerce on the seas is quite as vital to the great interior as it is to our coast territory, east, south, or west. Shipping is no more a sectional interest than is agriculture or manufacturing. No one of them can be prospered alone.

We have had a new manifestation of this broadened vision in the enthusiasm of the great Middle West for the proposed Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway, by which it is intended to connect the Great Lakes ports with the marts of the world. There is far-seeing vision in the proposal, and this great and commendable enterprise, deserving your favorable consideration, is inseparable from a great merchant marine.

What, then, is our problem? I bring to you the suggestions which have resulted from a comprehensive study which are recommended to me by every member of the United States Shipping Board. It is a program of direct and indirect aid to shipping to be conducted by private enterprise. It is proposed to apply generally the benefits which it was designed to derive from discriminating duties to all ships engaged in foreign commerce, with such limitation on remuneration as will challenge every charge of promoting special interests at public cost.

In lieu of discriminating duties on imports brought to us in American bottoms it is proposed to take 10 per cent of all duties collected on imports brought to us in American or foreign bottoms, and create therefrom a merchant marine fund. To this fund shall be added the tonnage charges, taxes, and fees imposed on vessels entering the ports of continental United States; also such sums as are payable to American vessels by the Post Office Department for the transportation by water of foreign mails, parcel posts excepted.

Out of this fund shall be paid the direct aid in the development and maintenance of an American merchant marine. The compensation shall be based on one-half of 1 cent for each gross ton of any vessel, regardless of speed, for each 100 miles traveled. When the speed is 13 knots or over, but less than 14, two-tenths of a cent on each gross ton shall be added; for 14 knots, three-tenths of a cent; for 15 knots, four-tenths of a cent; for 16 knots, five-tenths; for 17 knots, seven-tenths; for 18 knots, nine-tenths; for 19 knots, eleven-tenths; for 20 knots, thirteen-tenths shall be added to the basic rate. For 23 knots the maximum is reached at 2.6 cents for each gross ton per 100 miles traveled.

I will not attempt the details of requirements, or limitations, save to say that all vessels thus remunerated shall carry the United States mails, except parcel post, free of cost, and that all such remuneration must end whenever the owner of any vessel or vessels shall have derived a net operating income in excess of 10 per cent per annum upon his actual investment, and thereafter the owner shall pay 50 per cent of such excess earnings to the merchant marine fund, until the full amount of subsidy previously received is returned to its source. In other words, it is proposed to encourage the shipping in foreign trade until the enterprise may earn 10 per cent on actual investment, whereupon the direct aid extended is to cease and the amount advanced is to be returned out of a division with the Government of profits in excess of that 10 per cent. The provision makes impossible the enrichment of any special interest at public expense, puts an end to the Government assumption of all losses, and leaves to private enterprise the prospective profits of successful management.

The cost of such a program probably will reach fifteen millions the first year, estimated on the largest possibilities of the present fleet. With larger reimbursement to high-speed vessels and the enlargement of the merchant marine to a capacity comparable with our commerce the total outlay may reach the limits of thirty millions, but it is confidently believed that the scale may in due time thereafter be turned, until the larger reimbursements are restored to the Treasury. Even if we accept the extreme possibility—that we shall expend the maximum and no return will ever be made, which is to confess our inability to establish an American merchant marine—the expenditure would be vastly preferable to the present unfortunate situation, with our dependence on our competitors for the delivery of our products. Moreover, the cost for the entire year would be little more than the deficit heretofore encountered in two months during the experiment of the Government sponsoring the lines and guaranteeing the cost of their operation.

The proposed plan will supersede all postal subventions, postal compensations, and extra compensations, excepting parcel-post freights, all of which combined are fast growing to approximately five millions annually. It will ultimately take the Government out of a business which has been, and is now, excessively costly and wasteful and involving a loss in excess of the highest subsidy proposed. It will bring to shipping again that individual initiative which is the very soul of successful enterprise. It should enable the Government to liquidate its vast fleet to the highest possible advantage.

The making of a successful American merchant marine, which must face the stiffest possible competition by the fleets of the maritime nations, requires something more than the direct aid to which I have alluded. The direct aid proposed, even though it ultimately runs to $30,000,000 annually, is insufficient alone to offset the advantages of competing fleets. There are more than wage costs and working conditions and the higher costs of rationing, which no considerable American sentiment will consent to have lowered to competing standards.

The men who sail the seas under our flag must be permitted to stand erect in the fullness of American opportunity. There is the higher cost of construction, the larger investment, the higher cost of insurance outlay, even though the rate is the same. There are higher interest charges. Our problems in shipping are very much the same as are those of our industries ashore, and we should be as zealous in promoting the one as we are in protecting the other. We may and must aid indirectly as well as directly.

We need a favoring spirit, an awakened American pride, and an avowed American determination that we shall become, in the main, the carriers of our own commerce, in spite of all competition and all discouragements. With direct and indirect aid I bring to you a definite program. Those who oppose it ought, in all fairness, to propose an acceptable alternative. There can be no dispute about the end at which we are aiming.

Of the indirect aids there are many, practically all without draft upon the Public Treasury, and yet all highly helpful in promoting American shipping.

It is a simple thing—seemingly it ought not require the action of Congress—but American officials traveling on Government missions at Government expense ought to travel on American ships, assuming that they afford suitable accommodations. If they do not afford the requisite accommodation on the main routes of world travel, the argument that we should upbuild is strongly emphasized.

I think we should discontinue, so far as practical, the transport services in the Army and Navy, and make our merchant and passenger ships the agents of service in peace as well as war.

We should make insurance available at no greater cost than is afforded the ships under competing flags, and we can and will make effective the spirit of section 28 of the Jones Act of 1920, providing for preferential rail and steamship rates on through shipments on American vessels. American railways must be brought into cooperation with American steamship lines. It is not in accord with either security or sound business practice to have our railways furthering the interests of foreign shipping lines, when the concord of American activities makes for common American good fortune.

Contemplating the competition to be met, there ought to be an amendment to the interstate commerce act which will permit railway systems to own and operate steamship lines engaged in other than coastwise trade. There is measureless advantage in the longer shipments where rail and water transportation are coordinated, not alone in the service, but in the solicitation of cargoes which ever attends an expanding commerce.

We may further extend our long-established protection to our coastwise trade, which is quite in harmony with the policy of most maritime powers. There is authority now to include the Philippines in our coastwise trade, and we need only the establishment of proper facilities to justify the inclusion of our commerce with the islands in our coastwise provisions. The freedom of our continental markets is well worth such a favoring policy to American ships, whenever the facilities are suited to meet all requirements.

Other indirect aids will be found in the requirement that immigration shall join wherever it is found to be practical in aiding the merchant marine of our flag under which citizenship is to be sought, and in the establishment of the merchant-marine naval reserve. The remission of a proportion of income taxes is wholly compatible when the shipping enterprise is of direct Government concern, provided that such remission is applied to the cost of new ship construction.

Congress has already provided for a loan fund to encourage construction. It might well be made applicable to some special requirements in reconditioning.

It is also worth our consideration that, in view of suspended naval construction, the continued building of merchant ships is the one guaranty of a maintained shipbuilding industry, without which no nation may hope to hold a high place in the world of commerce or be assured of adequate defense.

A very effective indirect aid, a substitute for a discriminating duty which shall inure to the benefit of the American shipping will be found in the proposed deduction on incomes, amounting to 5 per cent of the freight paid on cargoes carried in American bottoms. The benefits can have no geographical restrictions, and it offers its advantages to American exporters as well as those who engage in import trade.

Our existing ships should be sold at prices prevailing in the world market. I am not unmindful of the hesitancy to sacrifice the values to current price levels. We constructed at the top cost of war when necessity impelled, when the building resources of many nations were drawn upon to the limit to meet a great emergency. If there had come no depression, a return to approximate normal cost would have been inevitable. But the great slump in shipping has sent tonnage prices to the other extreme, not for America alone, but throughout the world.

If we held our ships to await the recovery we should only make more difficult our response to beckoning opportunity. One of the outstanding barriers to general readjustment is the tendency to await more favorable price conditions. In the widest view, the Nation will ultimately profit by selling now. We may end our losses in an enterprise for which we are not equipped, and which no other Government has successfully undertaken, and the low prices at which we must sell to-day will make a lower actual investment with which we deal in promoting permanent service.

If I were not deeply concerned with the upbuilding of our merchant marine, I should nevertheless strongly urge Congress to facilitate the disposal of the vast tonnage acquired or constructed in the Great War emergency. The experiment we have made has been very costly. Much has been learned, to be sure, but the outstanding lesson is that the Government can not profitably manage our merchant shipping. The most fortunate changes in the personnel of management would still leave us struggling with a policy fundamentally wrong and practically impossible.

Having failed at such enormous cost, I bring you the proposal which contemplates the return to individual initiative and private enterprise, aided to a conservative success, wherein we are safeguarded against the promotion of private greed, and do not discourage the hope of profitable investment, which underlies all successful endeavor.

We have voiced our concern for the good fortunes of agriculture, and it is right that we should. We have long proclaimed our interest in manufacturing, which is thoroughly sound, and helped to make us what we are. In the evolution of railway transportation we have revealed the vital relationship of our rail transportation to both agriculture and commerce. We have been expending for many years large sums for deepened channels and better harbors and improved inland waterways, and much of it has found abundant return in enlarged commerce. But we have ignored our merchant marine. The World War revealed our weakness, our unpreparedness for defense in war, our unreadiness for self-reliance in peace.

It would seem as though transpiring events were combining to admonish us not to fail now to reassert ourselves. In the romantic days of wooden hulls and whitened sails and the sturdiest men of the sea we outsailed the world, and carried our own cargoes, revealed our flag to the marts of the world.

Up to the World War we were a debtor nation. Our obligations were held largely by the maritime powers. Apart from the advantages in carrying our commerce, they sought our shipments for the balances due to them. There is a different condition now. They are concerned with shipments to us, but not so interested in our shipments to them. It is our high purpose to continue our exchanges, both buying and selling, but we shall be surer of our selling, notably our foodstuffs, if we maintain facilities for their transportation.

Contemporaneous with the awakening we have the proposal to carry our ocean-going facilities to the great "unsalted seas," which shall place the farms of the upper Mississippi Valley on a market way to the marts of the Old World. We should fail to adjust our vision to the possibilities if we halted in making for American eminence on the ocean highways now awaiting our return.

We have recently joined the great naval powers in a program which not only puts an end to costly competition in naval armament and reduces the naval forces of the world, but adds to the confidence in maintained peace. The relativity of strength among the powers would be wholly one of disappointing theory if ours is to be a merchant marine inadequate for the future. I do not care to stress it as a means of defense. The war and our enforced outlay have already stressed that point.

The merchant marine is universally recognized as the second line of naval defense. It is indispensable in the time of great national emergency. It is commendable to upbuild and maintain, because it is the highest agency of peace and amity, and bears no threat and incites no suspicion. And yet it is a supreme assurance, without which we should be unmindful of our safety and unheeding of our need to continued growth and maintained influence.

I am thinking of the merchant marine of peace. Commerce is inseparable from progress and attainment. Commerce and its handmaidens have wrought the greater intimacy among nations, which calls for understandings and guaranties of peace. However we work it out, whatever our adjustments are to promote international trade, it is inevitable that the hundred millions here, outstanding in genius and unrivaled in industry and incalculable in their resources, must be conspicuous in the world's exchanges. We can not hope to compete unless we carry, and our concord and our influence are sure to be measured by that unfailing standard which is found in a nation's merchant marine.

The Senate having returned to its Chamber at the expiration of the recess (at 1 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.), it reassembled, and the Vice President took the chair.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As in legislative session, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill and that it may be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (S. 3217) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

RAILROAD RATES ON SUGAR.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I send to the desk a Senate resolution, which I ask may be read; and then I shall ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution for the information of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 246) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and it hereby is, requested to transmit to the Senate the transcript of testimony before the commission in the matter of application No. 8835 filed by R. H. Countiss, agent, in behalf of transcontinental carriers for authority to continue to charge rates on sugar from Pacific coast terminals and other western points to Chicago, Ill., under relief from the provisions of the fourth section previously authorized, now pending before the commission.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. PHIPPS. As in legislative session, from the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 10101) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 522) thereon. I wish to give notice that at the earliest opportunity I shall call up the bill for consideration.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

As in legislative session,

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On February 25, 1922:

S. 29. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to grant to Lloyd E. Gandy, of Spokane, Wash., his heirs and assigns, the right to overflow certain lands on the Fort George Wright Military Reservation, at Spokane, Wash., on such terms and conditions with respect to improvements to be made on the present target range as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, or in lieu of such improvements to be made on the present target range the Secretary of War may accept a conveyance to the United States of such other lands to be designated by the Secretary of War as may be deemed suitable for a target range in exchange for such overflow lands; that to facilitate the acquisition of the necessary additional lands the Secretary of War is authorized to condemn land necessary and suitable for target-range purposes, such condemnation to be at the expense of said Lloyd E. Gandy, grantee, his heirs and assigns;

S. 160. An act for the relief of Kristina Furjak; and

S. 2736. An act providing for the conveyance of certain unused military reservations in the State of Massachusetts to the city of Salem and the town of Marblehead.

On February 27, 1922:

S. 52. An act for the relief of the Stevens Institute of Technology, of Hoboken, N. J.;

S. 561. An act to grant citizens of Washington and Kane Counties, Utah, the right to cut timber in the State of Arizona for agricultural, mining, and other domestic purposes;

S. 901. An act for the payment of certain money to Albert H. Reynolds; and

S. 2810. An act to amend and reenact section 113 of chapter 5 of the Judicial Code of the United States, as amended and reenacted by an act approved the 22d day of August, 1914.

WILLEM VAN DOORN (S. DOC. NO. 138).

As in legislative session,

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Acting Secretary of State inclosing a draft of a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to permit Mr. Willem van Doorn, a subject of the Netherlands, to receive instruction at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis at the expense of the Government of the Netherlands.

The Acting Secretary of State points out that the passage of the resolution would be regarded as an act of courtesy by the Government of the Netherlands and that it would follow established precedents.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 28, 1922.

TREATY WITH JAPAN.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty between the United States and Japan with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator, in particular the island of Yap, signed at Washington on February 11, 1922.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to article 1 of the treaty.

The article was agreed to, as follows:

ARTICLE I.

Subject to the provisions of the present convention, the United States consents to the administration by Japan, pursuant to the aforesaid mandate, of all the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean, lying north of the Equator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next article of the treaty will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

ARTICLE II.

The United States and its nationals shall receive all the benefits of the engagements of Japan defined in articles 3, 4, and 5 of the aforesaid mandate, notwithstanding the fact that the United States is not a member of the League of Nations.

It is further agreed between the high contracting parties as follows: (1) Japan shall insure in the islands complete freedom of conscience and the free exercise of all forms of worship which are consonant with public order and morality; American missionaries of all such religions shall be free to enter the islands and to travel and reside therein, to acquire and possess property, to erect religious buildings and to open schools throughout the islands; it being understood, however, that Japan shall have the right to exercise such control as may be necessary for the maintenance of public order and good government and to take all measures required for such control.

(2) Vested American property rights in the mandated islands shall be respected and in no way impaired;

(3) Existing treaties between the United States and Japan shall be applicable to the mandated islands;

(4) Japan will address to the United States a duplicate of the annual report on the administration of the mandate to be made by Japan to the Council of the League of Nations;

(5) Nothing contained in the present convention shall be affected by any modification which may be made in the terms of the mandate as recited in the convention, unless such modification shall have been expressly assented to by the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the article of the treaty just read.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	McKellar	Robinson
Borah	Harris	McKinley	Sheppard
Brandegge	Heflin	McNary	Simmons
Broussard	Hitchcock	Moses	Smith
Cameron	Johnson	New	Smoot
Capper	Jones, N. Mex.	Newberry	Spencer
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Nicholson	Stanfield
Culberson	Kellogg	Norris	Sutherland
Cummins	Kendrick	Oddie	Swanson
Curtis	Keyes	Phipps	Townsend
Edge	King	Pittman	Walsh, Mont.
Fernald	Ladd	Poin Dexter	Watson, Ga.
Fletcher	Lenroot	Pomerene	Williams
France	Lodge	Rawson	Willis
Gerry	McCormick	Reed

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on account of a death in his family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to article 2.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I send forward a proposed amendment to article 2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. At the end of section 3 of article 2 it is proposed to strike out the semicolon and to insert a comma and the following words:

and the rights and privileges therein guaranteed to the respective nationals therein referred to shall not be limited or abridged by any of the provisions of this treaty.

So that if amended the section will read:

3. Existing treaties between the United States and Japan shall be applicable to the mandated islands, and the rights and privileges therein guaranteed to the respective nationals therein referred to shall not be limited or abridged by any of the provisions of this treaty.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, this amendment is offered for the purpose of verifying the intent of section 3 of article 2. It will be remembered that at the time I was discussing this matter on Friday the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] interrupted and took issue with the position which I was then maintaining that this treaty limits the rights of nationals of the United States in the island of Yap. The Senator from Minnesota at that time called particular attention to the fact that section 3 of article 2 extends the present treaties between the United States and Japan to the mandated islands, and he read into the RECORD that portion of the existing treaty of 1911 which provides that our nationals in Japanese territory shall be granted the same rights as Japanese nationals, with the exception, probably, of the ownership of property. I called the attention of the Senate at that time to the fact that under the general rule of the construction of contracts where the privileges of one of the contracting parties are expressly set forth and obviously in the nature of a limitation there are excluded any general privileges or rights that might be inferred from other instruments. That view was opposed to a certain extent by the distinguished Senator from Minnesota.

If the Senator from Minnesota is correct, if it is intended to preserve the rights of our nationals to engage in business in the mandated islands under the same terms as they are entitled to engage in business in the mainland of Japan, it seems to me that it is proper to say so. There are now too many indefinite matters in this treaty. It is stated that the very purpose of the treaty is to settle all differences between the United States and Japan in regard to these mandated islands. Undoubtedly there is a difference of opinion, and a very reasonable difference of opinion, as to whether or not our rights are limited by the pending treaty or whether they are as broad as is provided in the general treaty of 1911.

In the pending treaty only missionaries and electricians have the right to prosecute their business in the island of Yap, and there is no provision that any of our nationals may enter for any purpose into the other mandated islands. If the proponents of this treaty are intending to induce the Senate of the United States to ratify it on the theory that section 3 of article 2 extends to our nationals all the rights of previous treaties, including the treaty of 1911, they should make that clear, and the way to make it clear is to say it. Therefore I have offered the amendment, which simply adds to the existing section the following:

And the rights and privileges therein guaranteed to the respective nationals therein referred to shall not be limited or abridged by any of the provisions of this treaty.

The only proponents of this bill who have spoken with regard to it contend that section 3 does guarantee to us that right; but under the general rule of construction to which I have referred, Japan can very readily say: "Under his specific treaty we have repealed the inferential rights of other treaties, and have limited your right to enter those islands to missionaries and electricians."

It seems perfectly clear that this amendment should be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator if I correctly understand his position.

Article 1 of the treaty of 1911 reads as follows:

The citizens or subjects of each of the high contracting parties shall have liberty to enter, travel, and reside in the territories of the other to carry on trade, wholesale and retail, to own or lease and occupy houses, manufactories, warehouses, and shops, to employ agents of their choice, to lease land for residential and commercial purposes, and generally to do anything incident to or necessary for trade upon the same terms as native citizens or subjects, submitting themselves to the laws and regulations there established.

As I understand the Senator, if that were incorporated in the present treaty it would be really a reaffirmation of it; but inasmuch as the treaty especially permits missionaries and electricians to go on the island for the purpose of transacting their business or vocation, it might be contended that they were the only Americans who were entitled so to occupy the island.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is my view of it, and that is the object of this amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If that is the case, what significance could be given to subdivision (3) of article 2, namely, that "existing treaties between the United States and Japan shall be applicable to the mandated islands"?

Mr. PITTMAN. I think they might be considered applicable in every respect where they were not expressly contradicted by the special terms of this treaty.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That makes the position of the Senator from Nevada quite clear; and if the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] will give me his attention, I should like to address to him as well as to the Senator from Nevada a question concerning the treaty.

Mr. President, I have listened with some degree of interest to the discussion of the question as to what is the nature of our rights in the mandated islands and particularly in the island of Yap, and just exactly what rights we have; but that matter is not influential with me in the determination of what I shall do with reference to the ratification of this treaty. What I should like to know as a guide to my own action—and I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts about this first, and then to have the view of the Senator from Nevada—is, just exactly what it is that we get under this treaty. What advantage accrues to the Government of the United States or to its nationals that would induce us to approve the treaty; and, on the other hand, what different situation would we be in if we disapproved the treaty? In other words, I want to know what practical gain we have by ratifying, and what we lose by neglecting to ratify.

Apparently the question turns upon cables and cable rights. Apparently from this treaty we would have the right to go upon the island for the purpose of establishing a cable only in case the provision made by the Japanese Government should not be adequate.

Mr. LODGE. That applies only to radio.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am speaking about radio.

Mr. LODGE. I thought the Senator was including cables.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let us take even the case of cables.

Mr. LODGE. The cable rights seem to me to be absolute.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The cable rights are referred to in the first paragraph of article 3, and then the radio rights in the second paragraph.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Just exactly what do we get under this treaty that we would not have or could not assert if we did not ratify it?

Mr. LODGE. If we left it as it is now, we should have nothing at all.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Why not?

Mr. LODGE. Unless we should use force, we should have nothing at all.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We would be entitled to an undivided one-fifth interest in the island, would we not?

Mr. LODGE. If we did not have this treaty, how would the Senator propose to enforce the right?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I would not know how to enforce this right, either.

Mr. LODGE. But this is an agreement, and we have reason to suppose—there is no reason not to suppose—that Japan will keep an agreement that she has just signed. We have a treaty right here. We have no treaty rights under the other condition—none whatever.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That part is all right. What I want to know is this: Just exactly of what value is the right granted in the first paragraph of article 3, which reads:

The United States and its nationals shall have free access to the island of Yap on a footing of entire equality with Japan or any other nation and their respective nationals in all that relates to the landing and operation of the existing Yap-Guam cable or of any cable which may hereafter be laid or operated by the United States or by its nationals connecting with the island of Yap.

We have exactly the same right that any other nation has, and on a footing of entire equality with Japan.

Mr. LODGE. Not only that but article 4, of course, contains a much more specific statement as to those rights:

In connection with the rights embraced by article 3, specific rights, privileges, and exemptions, in so far as they relate to electrical communications, shall be enjoyed in the island of Yap by the United States and its nationals in terms as follows:

(1) Nationals of the United States shall have the unrestricted right to reside in the island, and the United States and its nationals shall have the right to acquire and hold on a footing of entire equality with Japan or any other nation or their respective nationals all kinds of property and interests, both personal and real, including lands, buildings, residences, offices, works, and appurtenances.

(2) Nationals of the United States shall not be obliged to obtain any permit or license in order to be entitled to land and operate cables on the island or to establish radiotelegraphic service, subject to the provisions of article 3, or to enjoy any of the rights and privileges embraced by this article and by article 3.

It gives us the right to go on the island of Yap and establish cables in any way we please and whenever we feel like it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Just exactly what advantage is there in that?

Mr. LODGE. That is the whole question that has existed in regard to Yap. It has no other value to us.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. LODGE. The only value suggested about it by President Wilson or that ever has been suggested by anybody is its value for an interchange of electrical communication as a cable station. President Wilson's suggestion was that it be internationalized for that purpose. All we have ever wanted in Yap was such use as we might want to make of it for cable purposes. That is fully given in this treaty.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; but let us take the thing in a practical way.

Mr. LODGE. I try to be practical. If we do not have this treaty, we get nothing, of course.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What I wanted to know is what value there is in that to us? Japan actually occupies the island. We have no right to do so. If we should get into a war with Japan, of course they would seize everything on the island, and there would be no value to us in that event. Now let us take a case of peace. In times of peace we would have no difficulty, as a matter of course, about communicating. Suppose that Japan should get into war with some other power—say with China or with Russia. She is in war now with China, and this cable runs from here to China. Would we enjoy free and uninterrupted communication with China over this cable?

Mr. LODGE. I suppose if it were an enemy's cable it would be seized by the attacking power, as always is done.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly. It would be immediately seized by the attacking power.

Mr. LODGE. How does the Senator propose to avoid that? By making no agreement?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What I want to try to find out is of what value this is to us.

Mr. LODGE. I think the value of it is that it gives us the right, if we are so disposed, to lay cables to Yap and from there to other points, which we now have not got. Also, if the radiotelegraphic service of Japan is not satisfactory, we can establish a radiotelegraphic system there. We probably never should want to do that, because we have Guam within 300 miles.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But the situation is that it would be valueless to us if we should get into a war with Japan or if Japan should get into a war with any other power.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think the treaty was made with a view to protecting our rights in war, because now we have no right there at all, unless we choose to assert it by force.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So that really this is only for the use of cables in time of peace?

Mr. LODGE. Practically, that would be it. In time of war an enemy cable can, of course, be cut by the opponent, and I do not suppose these cables would differ from any other cables. Our own cables could be cut, I suppose, if we were at war.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am merely trying to run it down to the actual value of the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. If Japan were at war, and her enemy were able to cut the cables owned by Japan, I suppose she would do it. I do not suppose she would cut neutral cables. We never cut neutral cables in the Spanish War.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me inquire of the Senator, then: Suppose that we had no interest at all in this matter; that Japan were the absolute owner of the island of Yap, and had been from all time. We freely accord to foreign nationals the right to land cables on our territory, do we not?

Mr. LODGE. We do if we choose under law.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We never have refused, have we?

Mr. LODGE. We have made some pretty strong restrictions in a bill we passed this year.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We had a little trouble down in Florida, I remember.

Mr. LODGE. Yes. We passed a law about that. Of course, nobody can land now without our assent.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But I mean that we do not ordinarily withhold our assent; neither, as I understand, does any other country. Every country is desirous of extending as far as possible its means of communication, and it is very glad if a foreign power or foreign nationals establish those means of communication. I never heard of a nation refusing to permit another nation to land a cable, but I inquire of the Senator whether that is quite common?

Mr. LODGE. I do not know. That is a question covering the whole world, which I can not answer. Rights to land cables have been refused, I think.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then suppose that this island were within the absolute and unrestricted jurisdiction of Japan, part of Japan's territory, the same as her main islands. Is it reasonably to be assumed that Japan would forbid us the opportunity to land a cable on the island of Yap?

Mr. LODGE. I really can not tell. I think it is a good deal better if she makes an agreement with us that she will allow us to land as we please. It is one thing to land under a permission and it is another thing to have the right to land without permission and lay any cables that we choose.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We might want to run a cable from here to Africa. Doubtless we shall at some time. Bermuda is on the way; it would be a very convenient way station. The Senator has not any apprehension that Great Britain would refuse to permit us to land a cable on one of the islands of Bermuda?

Mr. LODGE. I think she probably would.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Does the Senator think it would be advisable to make a treaty with Great Britain to assure us of that right?

Mr. LODGE. We have to make an agreement every time we land a cable anywhere in a foreign country.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course; but we do not take the precaution to make a treaty with a foreign country in advance assuring us of the right. If that were the case, we would have treaties with nations all over the world giving to us the right to land cables.

Mr. LODGE. We make this treaty so that the right to land a cable there shall be a treaty right. It was thought important enough by President Wilson, and it was thought important enough by this administration, to settle this outstanding question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was trying to find out how really important the question is which will be settled by this treaty; that is all.

Mr. LODGE. We have no cable at Yap. We never have had one there. The question arose because our naval general board thought it important that we should have the right to a cable landing at Yap for strategical purposes. The cable there now is the German-Dutch cable, which passes into the control of the five allied and associated powers, but the cables have not yet been distributed. That cable goes to Guam and thence to Shanghai, but it starts in the island of Sumatra, or Borneo, I think, and comes to Mindanao; thence to Yap; thence to Guam; and thence to Shanghai. During the war that cable was seized by Japan, and its terminus changed, as I understand it, to Tokyo. That is the only existing cable on Yap. That cable has a certain commercial value to us in the sense that we have a great deal of trade with the Dutch islands, and they communicate directly with this country by relaying to Guam.

We made this question about Yap. President Wilson made it first, because it was thought to be a place which might be of great value for international cable exchanges, and that, with a view to the future, we ought to have a treaty agreement in regard to it. As I said, President Wilson's plan was to internationalize it, which I think was an excellent scheme. For that we have substituted a special treaty, giving us the rights for any cables we may desire, and I think it is a right of some value. This treaty will settle that question and also settle the question in regard to the mandated islands.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. My question was simply to enable me to appraise the value.

Mr. LODGE. It is a future value entirely.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will say to the Senator that my disposition would be to vote in favor of the treaty, but I am trying to find out just what we would get.

Mr. LODGE. I have tried to state to the Senator frankly what I believe is in the treaty. What we get is a specific right to lay cables to Yap.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator has referred to the provisions of article 4, but I am quite in error if those are not already covered by the provisions of section 3 of article 2. I should think that under the existing treaty with Japan, to which reference has been made—

Mr. LODGE. I do not think existing treaties with Japan give us any right to lay cables.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; but if we did lay a cable, as provided in article 3, we should be entitled, under the treaty of 1911, it seems to me, to all the rights granted to us by article 4 of this treaty.

Mr. LODGE. As to the landing of cables, of course if any foreign country desires to come here and lay a cable it has to get permission from our Government to do it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. Under this treaty we do not have to get permission from Japan to lay a cable to Yap if we desire to lay one. I think that is the sum and substance of it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I would be very glad to hear from the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] in relation to this matter.

Mr. LODGE. I have not gone into the question of the mandated islands, with which the first part of this treaty is concerned. I understood that the Senator wanted to know just what we got by our agreement with regard to the island of Yap. I have confined myself to that. Of course, the first two articles deal entirely with the mandated islands generally.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. As to those, does the Senator think we get anything in the other mandated islands by the treaty?

Mr. LODGE. We get certain agreements which are in the general mandates given by the other powers to Japan. We get the advantage of those, whatever they may be.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I could not quite understand that. It seemed to me that certainly under section 1 of article 2 we get nothing we would not have without that, because article 5 of the mandate provides that—

Subject to the provisions of any local law for the maintenance of public order and public morals, the mandatory shall insure in the territory freedom of conscience and the free exercise of all forms of worship, and shall allow all missionaries, nationals of any State member of the League of Nations, to enter into, travel, and reside in the territory for the purpose of prosecuting their calling.

Mr. LODGE. One moment. It provides as the Senator has read, but in our provision we have added the right "to acquire and possess property, to erect religious buildings, and to open schools throughout the island," which we thought of some importance. That does not occur in the general mandate. On the representations of our missionaries we thought that of some importance.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Does not the Senator regard that as really implied in the general provision for "freedom of conscience and the free exercise of all forms of worship"?

Mr. LODGE. I do not think "freedom of conscience" necessarily implies the right to acquire property.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I would think that the provision of our Constitution, insuring the free exercise of all forms of worship, would forbid the execution of any law which denied to any particular sect an opportunity to acquire property for purposes of worship.

Mr. LODGE. Our missionaries thought it of importance, Secretary Hughes thought it of importance, and it seems to me not without value, in addition to what the other mandate says to add that they could acquire and possess property, erect religious buildings, and open schools throughout the islands. I think it would be drawing a pretty broad inference from the simple provision guaranteeing freedom of conscience to say that it covered what we have provided. I think it is better not to leave it to inference.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I rather think the other members of the League of Nations would insist that under article 5 they had all of these rights, and that the United States should not have any more, and that it was not intended that they should have.

Mr. LODGE. It was thought desirable to add it as our special right. We first made a provision about vested American property rights, and then included a provision extending the existing treaties between the United States and Japan to the mandated islands.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, the Senator would regard that as a settled principle of international law in any case, would he not?

Mr. LODGE. As to vested American property rights?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It reads:

Vested American property rights in the mandated islands shall be respected and in no way impaired.

Mr. LODGE. I should regard it so, but I think there is no harm in having it specifically stated.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; but it is implied, really, in the family of nations, is it not, that every nation must respect property rights which are vested?

Mr. LODGE. I think so; but I think it is better not to rest on an implication.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The third section reads:

Existing treaties between the United States and Japan shall be applicable to the mandated islands.

Would not the Senator regard that as necessarily following?

Mr. LODGE. No; I do not think it follows at all that they would be extended to the mandated islands. I think that required a specific provision, and I regard it as of importance.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator may be right about that; but I would not think there could be any doubt about it.

Mr. LODGE. I would rather have these things stated specifically, than to have them arguable points.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; that is always wise. Of course, sections 4 and 5 confer no real powers or rights.

Mr. LODGE. No. Section 5 is simply protective, providing that no modification in the original mandate shall be made without our assent.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And section 4 provides that a report shall be made.

Mr. LODGE. That is simply to secure us the report which they are bound to make to the other powers.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That would be made public any way in the League of Nations.

Mr. LODGE. It would be made public. They are required to make that report to the other givers of the mandate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They are required to make it to the council of the league, and, of course, the council of the league would make it public, and we would have it in that way.

Mr. LODGE. Undoubtedly; I suppose we should have it if it were made public; but the last section, of course, has nothing to do with the league. It is simply for our protection, providing that they can not modify the treaty.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I think I have said all I desire to say about this amendment, particularly to those who are present.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is referring to the small size of his audience. If he desires to say anything more to me or to the Senator from Missouri, we shall be delighted to hear it.

Mr. PITTMAN. The two Senators on the Republican side are so familiar with this subject that I doubt if I could change their views.

Mr. LODGE. I will say, in connection with the Senator's amendment, that it does not seem to me to be necessary. I am not convinced by his argument in regard to it. The simple clause about the extension of the treaty covers everything, and the amendment, of course, would make further negotiation necessary. I hope it will not be adopted; but I shall not take further time.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator yield the floor?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. REED. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. LODGE. I object to that motion, and I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. REED. The Senator can not object to a motion of that kind. It is not to be objected to, and is not debatable. I insist on my motion.

Mr. LODGE. Very well, then I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] which I transfer to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and vote "nay."

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW] and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Has the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I have no right to vote, because I have a pair with that Senator and I do not know how he would vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. EDGE. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD] and vote "nay."

Mr. HALE. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] and vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. May I inquire if the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I transfer my pair with that Senator to my colleague [Mr. PAGE] and vote "nay."

Mr. COLT. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER] and vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. WALSH of Montana (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FREELINGHUYSEN] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have voted but, having a pair with that Senator, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. MCKELLAR (after having voted in the negative). May I inquire if the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Indiana, but I am informed that he would vote as I have voted; so I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on account of a death in his family.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANDELL];

The junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST] with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY];

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]; and

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS].

The result was announced—yeas 6, nays 51, as follows:

YEAS—6.
Caraway	Pittman	Robinson	Simmons
France	Reed
NAYS—51.
Ball	Hale	McKellar	Shortridge

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN].

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the amendment which I have offered is to section 3 of article 2. The section now reads:

(3) Existing treaties between the United States and Japan shall be applicable to the mandated islands.

My amendment proposes to add to that section the following:

And the rights and privileges therein guaranteed to the respective nationals therein referred to shall not be limited or abridged by any of the provisions of this treaty.

The reason for that is simply that under the general treaty with Japan of 1911 our nationals have free access to Japanese territory with the right to carry on all kinds of business in that territory. Under the treaty now before us only those of our nationals engaged solely in the electrical and missionary business are allowed to enter the island of Yap to engage in business. The question is, if we ratify this treaty, does it limit the entry into the island of Yap of our nationals engaged in other than the electrical business and as missionaries? If it does not, then why should this special limitation have been included in articles 3 and 4? If it does not intend to limit the general treaty of 1911, then why do we have any special provision with regard to the island of Yap?

No doubt in article 3 and article 4 of the pending treaty our nationals are limited with regard to entry into the island of Yap and engaging in business there. The limitation with regard to the island of Yap in the pending treaty was admitted by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] a few days ago. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] himself called attention to the fact that our rights were enlarged by section 3 by extending the general treaty of 1911 to the mandated islands.

There is no doubt that section 3 does extend the existing treaties to all of the mandated islands except the island of Yap, but with regard to the island of Yap there are special limitations placed upon our nationals. I desire to clarify that. If their contention is right, if there are no special limitations with regard to our nationals in the island of Yap, then the amendment which I propose makes it clear. In other words, article 3 says in relation to the landing of cables that our citizens shall have equal rights. Article 4 says, in so far as they relate to electrical communications, our citizens shall have certain rights.

The general treaty of 1911 provides for reciprocal rights of nationals of Japan and the United States, and those rights are extended to the mandated islands except as to special limitations on the island of Yap.

Section 3, if my proposed amendment is agreed to, will read as follows:

Existing treaties between the United States and Japan shall be applicable to the mandated islands, and the rights and privileges therein guaranteed to the respective nationals therein referred to shall not be limited or abridged by any of the provisions of this treaty.

Unless it is the intention of the treaty to limit and abridge the existing rights of our nationals in Japanese territory, then there can be no harm in stating that this treaty shall not be construed to limit or abridge those rights.

I believe this is all I care to say on the subject at this time.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to make some brief observations in regard to the treaty, not so much for the purpose of announcing what my vote shall be, because I have not yet decided how I shall vote, as I have not been able to satisfy myself as to what the treaty means.

I had always understood that it was an undisputed proposition that, by virtue of being associated with the other powers in the war, we acquired an undivided one-fifth interest, or an undivided interest, in these islands and the other German possessions which were taken over by virtue of the war. That that contention was sustained by the previous administration and by this administration. If I could construe the pending treaty into a quitclaim deed, as it were, to our interest in those islands, I would unhesitatingly vote for it.

I do not want an undivided fifth interest along with any other power or powers in these islands or in any other territory. I can not imagine a more entangling alliance than for the United States to own an undivided one-fifth interest in all of the German possessions which were taken over after the World War.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator's statement, of course, is entirely correct from my point of view in regard to the undivided fifth part, but the first article of the pending treaty was made in acknowledgment of our contention. That is what brings it about. We have contended that the title of Japan to the islands north of the Equator or the title of Great Britain to the islands south of the Equator could not be perfected without our assent. Article 1 gives that assent, so far as the mandated islands are concerned. That makes the title of the mandatory, so far as the title of the mandatory goes, with its limitations, complete, because we are the fifth party.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely; it gives our consent "pursuant to the aforesaid mandate, of all the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator."

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. But do I understand that the Senator from Massachusetts construes this treaty to be a relinquishment of our undivided one-fifth interest in those islands?

Mr. LODGE. It is, so far as the mandate goes.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; so far as the mandate goes; but the mandate does not necessarily run counter to the question of ultimate title.

Mr. LODGE. No. I have previously made that point here, and I thought that Senators did not generally agree with me about it; but I do not think that the mandate which Japan has received from the other four powers is a title of complete sovereignty, because it is limited in various directions. Whatever may be reserved, however, of sovereignty, of course, remains ungranted by us.

Mr. BORAH. I should regard it as a menace—

Mr. LODGE. I do not think anything remains of any value.

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not think anything remains of any value, or ever did exist, so far as value is concerned.

Mr. LODGE. The only value consists in the limitations put upon the sovereignty of the mandatory.

Mr. BORAH. I had understood, Mr. President, from the discussion in the committee and from the contention of Senators on the floor that while we recognized the mandate of Japan, nevertheless we retained our interest in the islands, that the pending treaty was not designed as a surrender or quitclaim, as it were, or a relinquishment of our interest in the islands, as an ultimate and conclusive proposition.

As I said a moment ago, if I could construe the pending treaty into a relinquishment of our interest I would vote for it, although there are some other provisions in it which seem to me to be objectionable; but I would regard that as of so much moment and of so much consideration that I would support the treaty. I think, Mr. President, we are becoming very seriously involved with reference to these possessions, and that we shall become more so if we do not take a decided and determined step toward getting out entirely.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President—

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senator from Idaho explain to us why he thinks that this is not a substantial quitclaim of our interests? There is no limitation to the mandate in point of time; the mandate is given forever. Japan is given control over the islands forever by the mandate. Doubtless a mandate may be recalled by the power which gave it, namely, the League of Nations, but Japan would have a voice in such a determination, would she not? Accordingly, Japan would hold the mandate as long as she desired to do so.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me, I desire to say that the mandate by the express provision of the Versailles treaty may be changed at any time if the organization in control of it sees fit to change it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; but will not Japan have a voice in that?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And, of course, she may put a veto on it at any time. The decision would have to be unanimous on the part of the council, would it not?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; but the mandate could be changed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It could be changed by the action of the council of the League of Nations, of course, if Japan voted in that way.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; and if the other members of the League of Nations did so.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course. So Japan will retain the control of those islands—

Mr. ROBINSON. As long as she desires.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. As long as Japan wants to control them.

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly; I think that is true.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then, is not this really a quitclaim to Japan?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I thought so, and I so contended in the committee; and I had greatly hoped that that would be the construction placed upon it; but we are advised that that is not the construction which is placed upon it by the Secretary of State; that there is no attempt here to do other than to permit Japan to administer the islands under the mandate; that in case the mandate should be changed, or in case Japan should fail to administer the trust according to the terms of the mandate, the reversion would carry back to us our undivided one-fifth interest.

Mr. President, that is precisely what I do not desire to see. I should like the United States by treaty to quitclaim its interest in all these islands and German possessions and get out. I can not see any difference between joining the League of Nations and taking part in all international affairs by a treaty and becoming the owner of an undivided interest and tenant in common with the other four powers in these several possessions in all the various portions of the earth.

Suppose we had an undivided one-fifth interest in an island in the Mediterranean, say, or some territory along the Black Sea, or an undivided one-fifth interest which we were administering in Mesopotamia or Syria, and then in these islands in the Pacific, it would need no other act to involve us in an entangling alliance; we would be in such an alliance and we would have to stay there.

Mr. President, eight years ago I voted to give the Filipinos their independence. I regret deeply, in the first place, that it ever was our misfortune to acquire the Philippines; and I regret deeply, in the second place, that we did not pass the bill giving them their independence. I do not want by any connivance of mine to extend our position in that respect at all.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President—

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. FRANCE. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho, who on many occasions has given evidence of his love for liberty and the principles which underlie our Government, if he does not feel that, if we should continue to hold our one-fifth interest in the various former German colonies, we might be able to inaugurate an international policy, in cooperation with the other nations, looking ultimately to the fitting of these backward peoples for the enjoyment of all the privileges of civilization and finally for the enjoyment of the advantages of self-government and liberty?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I can understand the position of the Senator from Maryland, and I appreciate his logic. Provided we were the sole owners of the Yap Island and of the other islands we might administer them in a way which would be helpful to their peoples, but I do not think that by being the owner of an undivided one-fifth interest we can do anything except quarrel with our cotenants as to how to do it. Mr. President, if you will turn back to about, I think, the thirteenth chapter of Genesis, you will find that the first controversy that ever took place on the earth with reference to property was when Abraham and Lot had a quarrel over their cotenancy. I have never known farmers or anyone else to be able to get along when they had an undivided interest in a piece of property. If we are the owner of an undivided interest in these islands with Japan, Great Britain, France, and Italy, it can be imagined what kind of a government the natives will have administered by those five powers.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President—

Mr. BORAH. I will yield in just a moment. Furthermore, Mr. President, I think there has sprung up in this day and age the idea that some superior nation ought to take upon itself the obligation and the duty of administering to all the dependent peoples of the world. I have observed that that idea takes root particularly where vast wealth or natural resources are discovered to be in the possession of the dependent people. I have observed, for instance, how France has been administering to the dependent people of Syria; I have observed how Great Britain is administering to the dependent people of Mesopotamia.

They are administering to them by depriving them of their natural wealth; they are administering to them by taking from them that which God gave them, which belongs to them exclusively. You will find, Mr. President, whenever a dependent people are discovered to be in the possession of vast natural resources that immediately some great nation feels a benevolent desire to go in there and lift them up to the common level of civilization and give them a better form of government. I do not believe in that doctrine at all. I think each people have in a measure got to work out their own salvation. I do not think that democracy and free government are things that you can bestow upon a people out of hand and overnight. Furthermore, we have a great many people at home right now who need all the beneficent administration that we can give them.

I have no doubt, Mr. President, that the greatest service which this Government can render to humanity and the greatest service we can render to the cause of civilization is to demonstrate successfully the fact that we have here a republican government and that it can be adapted to the growing industrial conditions which now confront the world.

I now yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I merely desired to observe that we tried the scheme of government by two or three nations jointly in the case of the Samoan Islands.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And we were obliged to abandon it as impossible.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; and if the Samoans could vote, I should like to have a referendum upon the question and ascertain how much of a success they thought the experiment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I might challenge his attention to the experiment in the case of the government of Constantinople since the war. It has been a complete failure. The Allies are failing to give a proper government to Constantinople, and apparently there are evidences of feuds, schisms, quarrels, and contentions which threaten the peace of the people and the stability of the municipal government.

Mr. BORAH. I have always thought, Mr. President, that when we took the Philippines we repealed the Declaration of Independence, and now we are about to disregard the teachings of Washington in order to protect those islands. If it were not for the Philippines we would not be troubled at this time with the consideration of the four-power treaty. The dominating reason why it is proposed to impose it upon us is because it is thought that the Philippines are so liable to attack that we must have a treaty in order to insure the peace of the Pacific. Thus, step by step, after we have entered upon this course of imperialism, we are compelled to adopt all the methods and customs and practices of imperialists.

For that reason, as I say, if I could construe this treaty into an absolute surrender and an absolute release of our interest in the German possessions, I should be delighted to vote for it and regard it as a most remarkable triumph for this administration; but when I come to read the treaty I am sincerely at a loss to know just exactly what it means.

The first article says:

Subject to the provisions of the present convention, the United States consents to the administration by Japan, pursuant to the aforesaid mandate, of all the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean, lying north of the Equator.

We might remain the owner of an undivided one-fifth interest and yet consent to the mandate. In my judgment, that does not affect the title or the relinquishment of our title at all. If the trust should ever disappear, be withdrawn by the League of Nations, or Japan should consent to its withdrawal, I do not see why we would not be in the same position that we are before we ratify this treaty with reference to this undivided one-fifth interest.

Again, it says:

The United States and its nationals shall receive all the benefits of the engagements of Japan defined in articles 3, 4, and 5 of the aforesaid mandate, notwithstanding the fact that the United States is not a member of the League of Nations.

That seems again to regard Japan as the owner of this island, instead of being a cotenant. Being a cotenant, we would enjoy all the rights of our cotenancy and all the rights of our copartners. If we were relying upon that, we would not need any treaty to protect our nationals, because we would have precisely the same right that our cotenant would have. So we seem, by contracting for the rights of our nationals, to have given up our cotenancy, and to have surrendered it to Japan.

It is further agreed between the high contracting parties as follows:

(1) Japan shall insure in the islands complete freedom of conscience and the free exercise of all forms of worship which are consonant with public order and morality; American missionaries of all such religions shall be free to enter the islands and to travel and reside therein, to acquire and possess property, to erect religious buildings, and to open schools throughout the islands; it being understood, however, that Japan shall have the right to exercise such control as may be necessary for the maintenance of public order and good government and to take all measures required for such control.

(2) Vested American property rights in the mandated islands shall be respected and in no way impaired.

I do not know that that adds anything. I should assume that that would be true in all civilized countries, and I do not understand that a treaty makes it any more secure. However, there is no harm in that.

(3) Existing treaties between the United States and Japan shall be applicable to the mandated islands.

(4) Japan will address to the United States a duplicate of the annual report on the administration of the mandate to be made by Japan to the council of the League of Nations.

Japan is going to report to the United States and going to report to the League of Nations. The League of Nations is supposed to have some power to supervise and to advise with reference to the execution of the mandate; and I assume that the object in having Japan report to the United States is that the United States may express its approval or disapproval as to the method and manner of carrying out the mandate—a thing which I certainly would not want. I take it that when we ask for a report upon the property and its administration, we are still claiming to have an interest in it, and still desirous of exercising something in the nature of a supervisory power over the mandatory power. I do not understand why this should be in there otherwise.

Then the treaty says, in article 3:

The United States and its nationals shall have free access to the island of Yap on a footing of entire equality with Japan or any other nation.

There is another clause which seems to give up the cotenancy entirely, which seems to give up the undivided one-fifth interest, because if we are a cotenant we have the same rights there that Japan has, who is a cotenant. It would not be necessary, between tenants in common, to agree that each one should have access to a particular part of the common holding. One has the same right as the other; but this would seem to indicate that we have turned over the mandate to Japan to be executed, provided we are given an opportunity to look over the reports, and possibly to supervise the execution. The last thing that I should want this Government to engage in would be the overseeing of how Japan administers her Government to her subjects. It is a matter about which we never could agree. It is said that we are making the four-power treaty to avoid doing that very thing. I am not criticizing Japan. She is a very great nation and a very great people, but she is quite a different people and has quite a different civilization and quite a different conception of government from that which we have; and I can not imagine anything which is more calculated to give rise to misunderstandings than for the United States, if it does it in good faith, to undertake to supervise and censor the acts of Japan in administering the mandate or her Government over her subjects.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Does the Senator see, in subsection (5) of article 2, any prospect of a difference between this country on the one hand and the League of Nations on the other as to some change that might be made in the terms of the mandate?

Mr. BORAH (reading):

Nothing contained in the present convention shall be affected by any modification which may be made in the terms of the mandate as recited in the convention, unless such modification shall have been expressly assented to by the United States.

Perhaps the inference which the Senator suggests by his question is a logical one.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. It is conceded, I think, that the League of Nations might want to modify the terms of the mandate, and Japan being a member of the League of Nations, the situation certainly would become very complicated if the league saw proper to make such a modification.

Mr. BORAH. As I said upon yesterday, the mandatory system was invented for the purpose of avoiding the full effect of the secret treaties which were made in 1915, 1916, and 1917. When the American delegates arrived in Paris they found that everything had been disposed of so far as these possessions were concerned. Japan had secured her proportion, and the different nations had entered into secret agreements and divided up these possessions. Now, as I am informed—and there is an exceedingly interesting article in the last Sunday's New York Times, by Mr. Baker, upon these secret treaties and the effect which they wrought upon the entire Versailles conference—as I understand from the discussion there and from other discussions, the American delegation was unable fully to avoid the effect of the secret treaties. The Governments which had entered into those treaties were not willing to surrender them, so Gen. Smuts and ex-President Wilson conceived the idea of a mandatory system by which they would administer to these people under a mandate rather than acknowledge the secret treaties. As I said, however, the fact also remains that the mandates corresponded to the secret treaties. It so happened that Japan got the mandate over the same islands that she had the secret treaties for, and so with reference to France and England; and as a matter of fact they all go back now to their secret treaties for the real source of title. I have no doubt at all but that Japan regards her source of title as running down to the secret treaties rather than to this mandate, but for social purposes it is called a mandate.

Nationals of the United States shall have the unrestricted right to reside in the island, and the United States and its nationals shall have the right to acquire and hold on a footing of entire equality with Japan or any other nation or their respective nationals all kinds of property and interests, both personal and real, including lands, buildings, residences, offices, works, and appurtenances.

There is another clause which I have construed as a surrender of the cotenancy.

Subdivision (4) of article 4 says:

Nationals of the United States shall have complete freedom of entry and exit in the island for their persons and property.

That undoubtedly would be true if we were cotenants without any treaty.

The Government of Japan will exercise its power of expropriation in the island to secure to the United States or its nationals needed property and facilities for the purpose of electrical communications if such property or facilities can not otherwise be obtained.

So I say, Mr. President, that the construction which I originally put upon this treaty is sustained in some of these clauses, it seems to me. On the other hand, it is provided in another clause that we shall have the right to use this cable station so long as Japan maintains it, and then there is a clause which seems to indicate, if she fails to maintain it, that it reverts to us. I will read that:

The rights and privileges embraced by the preceding paragraph shall also be accorded to the Government of the United States and its nationals with respect to radiotelegraphic communication: Provided, however, That so long as the Government of Japan shall maintain on the island of Yap an adequate radiotelegraphic station, cooperating effectively with the cables and with other radio stations on ships or on shore, without discriminatory exactions or preferences, the exercise of the right to establish radiotelegraphic stations on the island by the United States or its nationals shall be suspended.

That is a clear recognition, it seems to me, of the fact that in case Japan fails to perform her duty we go back to enjoy our rights as a cotenant, as a part owner.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does not the Senator think that is rather a recognition of our right to establish a radio station granted us under the first provision of that section?

Mr. BORAH. That construction is admissible; I concede that; but I should like to ask the able lawyer from Minnesota whether he construes this treaty as a surrender, a relinquishment, a quitclaim, as it were, of our undivided one-fifth interest in the island?

Mr. KELLOGG. Whether it is or not, so long as this mandate lasts it would seem to me as though it had practically the same effect, because the mandate provides, in article 2, that—

The mandatory shall have full power of administration and legislation over the territory subject to the present mandate as an integral portion of the Empire of Japan.

I do not know what greater right than that could be granted. So long as this mandate is in force, it would seem as though Japan's dominion was absolute over the island.

Mr. BORAH. Her dominion is through the mandate, but the Senator perhaps did not understand my question. Does the Senator regard the establishment of the mandate by our consent as wiping out our undivided one-fifth interest?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not know whether it does or not.

Mr. BORAH. That is the trouble with me.

Mr. KELLOGG. In the first place, I do not know whether we ever had a one-fifth interest, unless we sought to take it under the grant of Germany in the Versailles treaty. I do not think it is material whether it is wiped out or not.

Mr. BORAH. Our undivided one-fifth interest arose not by reason of the German treaty or by the Versailles treaty but because we were associated with our allies in the war. It came to us as a part of the spoils of victory, and we did not get it by reason of the German treaty or by reason of the Versailles treaty. We were not a party to the Versailles treaty until after we ratified the German treaty.

Mr. KELLOGG. That raises a further question as to what acquisition of territory by conquest is, whether it means that a nation must actually take possession of the territory taken in war in order to complete its title. It does not seem to me that it is very material in connection with this.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator regards it as immaterial, and I regard it as material; but the Senator and I are agreed upon one thing, that neither of us can tell what this treaty means.

Mr. KELLOGG. I understood, however, that if this treaty provided for an actual relinquishment of any interest we have, the Senator would have no objection to the treaty and would vote for it.

Mr. BORAH. I did not say I would not have any objection to it, but I said I would vote for it, although there are other clauses in it which I do not like; but I would consider the advantage and benefit of getting out so great that I would forego my objection to the other.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does not the Senator think that under article 2 of this mandate Japan has absolute dominion over the island?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; she has dominion for mandate purposes and reports to the United States.

Mr. KELLOGG. What can we do under the report?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know what we can do, and therefore I do not know why it is coming back to us. I assume, Mr. President, that it is sent back to us for some reason. It is sent to the League of Nations for the purpose of having the League of Nations oversee and censor the acts of Japan and the other mandatory powers. I assume it is sent back to us for some such reason.

Mr. President, having the view of the Senator from Minnesota as to what this means with reference to the surrendering of the one-fifth interest, I think I shall conclude.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I am interested in the Senator's statement that our one-fifth interest arose through conquest and not through either our own treaty with Germany or the treaty of Versailles. What is the basis for the Senator's belief that our one-fifth interest—just a one-fifth interest—comes through conquest?

Mr. BORAH. Perhaps I should say our common interest with the five allied and associated powers.

Mr. LENROOT. There were other powers associated in the war, and if it is purely through conquest, they surely would have an interest as well as ourselves.

Mr. BORAH. Perhaps so, but it is an undivided interest, whatever it is, large or small.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; that might be.

Mr. BORAH. Perhaps it would have been better had I said simply an undivided interest; but I say the undivided one-fifth interest because we have always looked upon the allied and associated powers as consisting of those five nations, and they seem to have been the ones which claimed the spoils. Anyway, the argument which I made is quite as relevant, even if it is less than a one-fifth interest, and I hope it is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN].

Mr. ASHURST. I ask for the yeas and nays on that.

Mr. KELLOGG. I would like to have the amendment stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. In article 2, page 4, after the word "islands" and before the semicolon in subdivision (3), insert the following words:

And the rights and privileges therein guaranteed to the respective nations therein referred to shall not be limited or abridged by any of the provisions of this treaty.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator who offered the amendment is not in the Chamber, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. KELLOGG. I had sent to the desk for the amendment. I wanted to make some remarks on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina suggests the absence of a quorum, and the roll will be called.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	Moses	Sheppard
Borah	Harris	Nelson	Shortridge
Brandeggee	Harrison	Newberry	Smith
Cameron	Heflin	Nicholson	Spencer
Capper	Hitchcock	Norbeck	Sterling
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Swanson
Culberson	Kellogg	Oddie	Townsend
Cummins	Kendrick	Overman	Underwood
Edge	Keyes	Phipps	Wadsworth
Elkins	Ladd	Pittman	Watson, Ga.
Ernst	Lenroot	Polindexter	Weller
Fernald	Lodge	Pomerene	Willis
Fletcher	McCormick	Rawson
France	McKellar	Reed
Glass	McNary	Robinson

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] are detained in attendance on the Finance Committee.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on account of a death in his family.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I simply wish to read the amendment, so that the Senate may understand it, as some Senators may have been absent when it was reported from the desk. The amendment is as follows:

At the end of section 3, article 2, substitute at the end of the section, before the semicolon, the following words:

And the rights and privileges therein guaranteed to the respective nations therein referred to shall not be limited or abridged by any of the provisions of this treaty.

So that it would read as follows:

Existing treaties between the United States and Japan shall be applicable to the mandated islands and the rights and privileges therein guaranteed to the respective nations therein referred to shall not be limited or abridged by any of the provisions of this treaty.

That is an amendment to the treaty, and of course it would make it necessary to send the treaty back for further negotiation, and I hope the Senate will vote it down.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator has made only the one objection, that the treaty would have to be sent back for negotiation. I do not conceive that there is any difference between a reservation and an amendment, except that a reservation reserves the right of one power, while an amendment changes the treaty with regard to all the powers.

In cases where there are numerous powers involved, the objection that it is an amendment is well taken, but it does not have to be sent back for negotiation, any more than the four-power treaty, which has had a reservation attached to it by the committee, which was voted out of the committee, has to be sent back for renegotiation. A reservation is not binding unless it is accepted by the other powers. An amendment is not binding unless it is accepted by the other powers.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, does not the Senator concede that the rule with reference to an amendment is entirely different from that relating to a reservation? An amendment must be expressly and specifically acted upon by the other powers, while a reservation may be accepted in silence.

Mr. PITTMAN. No; the Senator from Nevada would not admit that he knew so little about the law of contracts as to ever concede such an absurd proposition.

Mr. LENROOT. Many international lawyers seem to differ with the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not know how many international lawyers the Senator constitutes himself; but I have answered the question.

We are dealing with one nation, Japan, and while we are dealing very hastily with Japan, and while we have demonstrated a great deal of fear with regard to Japan; while practically all of the arguments so far have been based upon fear that we would lose even this little hand-out which Japan is giving out of what we already own, it seems to me that if this is a meritorious amendment, the objection that it will require further consideration by Japan is a very slight objection. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with regard to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD] and vote "nay."

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and vote "yea."

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE's name was called). I wish to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent on account of a death in his family.

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW], and vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH of Montana (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. In his absence I am obliged to withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote I would vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], who is absent, and I therefore withhold by vote. If I were at liberty to vote I would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have a general pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. I inquire if he has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am unable at this time to obtain a transfer, and therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. EDGE (after having voted in the negative). The transfer which I made a moment ago of my pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD] I am compelled to withdraw, as the junior Senator from Oklahoma has entered the Chamber. Inasmuch, however, as my general pair, the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], has announced, as I understand it, that he is favorable to the ratification of the treaty, I feel that my vote should stand unless there is some question to the contrary.

Mr. KELLOGG. I transfer my pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Since I made the announcement a moment ago, I am authoritatively informed that if the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] were present he would vote "nay." That being the way I desire to vote, I consider myself at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. HALE (after having voted in the negative). Since announcing the transfer of my pair, the Senator to whom I transferred it has entered the Chamber. I therefore transfer my pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. McKELLAR. Has the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. McKELLAR. In his absence I am compelled to withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. ERNST. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BURSUM] and vote "nay."

Mr. McKELLAR. I find that I can transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] to the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], which I do, and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANDELL] and that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY].

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 50, as follows:

YEAS—23.

Ashurst	Glass	Kendrick	Robinson
Borah	Harris	King	Sheppard
Culberson	Harrison	McKellar	Smith

So Mr. PITTMAN's amendment was rejected.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment, which I am sure will receive the support of a large majority of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported. The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Add at the end of the article, changing the last punctuation mark to a comma, the following:

And the manufacture and sale of intoxicating beverages shall be prohibited in the islands over which a mandate is conferred upon His Majesty the Emperor of Japan.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I called attention the other day to the fact that under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States and the doctrines which have been enunciated by those who revere and uphold the Constitution—men, I may say in passing, who do that regardless of the effect which the doctrines which they enunciate may have upon their own political fortunes—that when we acquire territory there is extended automatically to all of the inhabitants of that territory so acquired the right to have their inalienable rights protected, as the inalienable rights of all the people of the United States are protected under the provisions of the Constitution.

I have called attention to the fact that under the treaty of Versailles and under the doctrines clearly announced by Secretary Colby and by Secretary Hughes we did acquire title in part and part sovereignty over these islands. Therefore, there was extended to the peoples inhabiting these islands the right to expect the protection of their inalienable rights. The Senator from Minnesota has already said, in substance, that it is immaterial what the treaty means, for he informed us the other day that it would be ratified. However, I wish to appeal to those who are here now who have been such ardent advocates of prohibition, and ask them whether they now wish to transfer under the sovereignty of His Majesty, the Emperor of Japan, these helpless peoples who under the provisions of the treaty of Versailles, under the doctrines enunciated by two Secretaries of State of this Republic, and under the provisions of our Constitution are entitled to have their inalienable rights protected, which rights we are now selling away from them. I ask those Senators whether they are willing to sell those rights away without protecting those helpless peoples against the liquor traffic, which has destroyed so many of the aboriginal people?

Mr. President, if the Senate is not interested in this subject, I shall move that the Senate adjourn, and I do so move.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland moves that the Senate do now adjourn. The question is on that motion.

Mr. FRANCE. I am willing to withdraw the motion if Senators are willing to pay attention to the amendment which I have offered. I do not intend to occupy much time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator from Maryland withdraws the motion to adjourn. The Senator from Maryland will proceed.

Mr. FRANCE. I want those Senators who have been consistently voting for prohibition year in and year out for the protection of the people of the United States, as they believe, to go on record before the people of their States as to whether they will transfer to the sovereignty of a foreign power these helpless peoples without protecting them from the injury which may be wrought upon them by an unregulated liquor traffic in the islands.

I shall not go into this subject extensively, though I might well do so. Personally, I voted against the eighteenth amendment because I thought it was a violation of all of the great principles of liberty which are enunciated in the Constitution; but I have always been a believer in the protection of the aboriginal peoples who have become the wards of the great advanced nations from the destructive influence of the liquor traffic. I wish squarely to put up to the Senate and to those Senators who are responsible for the adoption of the eighteenth amendment whether they dare go before the Christian peoples of their States and say: "We have transferred these helpless people to become the wards of a great non-Christian empire, and we voted to do so without having a guaranty that they will be protected not only against the insidious influences of pagan doctrine but against the destructive influences which follow the unregulated liquor traffic in the islands and in the places inhabited by aboriginal peoples."

Mr. President, I want a yea-and-nay vote upon this amendment so that we may again test the question whether certain of the Senators here really believe in the cause of temperance not only for America but also for the helpless peoples who have become the wards of America. I challenge them now, if they come from temperance States, to vote this amendment down and then to go home and explain to the Christian people of their States how they have been able to transfer these helpless peoples to a non-Christian power without protecting them against the insidious influences of the liquor traffic, which has been carried on by the greed of the white man, to the destruction of so many innocent, ignorant, and backward peoples who did not know the dangers which confronted them in the use of strong drink.

I now ask whether or not the Senate will adopt this amendment. I call for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, on which he demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I only wish to say a word. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland is wholly unnecessary. Under the terms of the mandate "the supply of intoxicating spirits and beverages to the natives shall be prohibited," and that prohibition is made a part of the treaty in the first clause of article 2.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, in reply to that statement I will say that the two things are not the same at all. Preventing the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages throughout the islands is quite a different proposition.

Mr. LODGE. The treaty is much broader than that. It includes every form of supply.

Mr. FRANCE. I knew the provision which the Senator from Massachusetts refers to was in the treaty, but I felt that my amendment would make it more explicit [Laughter.] Mr. President, I was myself forced to smile by the Senator from New York, who knows very well that we have been unable to get many important measures through this body without having to face this issue.

Personally, I believe that if we desire to care for our own we should also desire to care for those who are our wards. I feel very strongly that the amendment which I have offered should be adopted.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I wish to suggest to the Senator from Maryland before he sits down that he ought to add to his amendment a provision prohibiting the exportation of liquor from the islands.

Mr. FRANCE. And to the islands from any other country.

Mr. REED. I think the Senator had better modify his amendment in that way.

Mr. FRANCE. I accept the modification. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. Now, Mr. President, we may have all the fun we want to about this matter, but the Senator from Massachusetts is in error. It is seldom he is in error, but he is in error when he states that the proposition contained in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland is already embodied in the treaty. It is not there at all.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. As I understand, the provision in the treaty merely forbids the sale of liquor to the natives?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. It has no relation to prohibition generally in any of the mandated islands?

Mr. FRANCE. None whatever.

Mr. REED. It has nothing to do with the manufacture of liquor. Now, let us see how funny it is. If it was put in the treaty as the Senator from Massachusetts says it was, it certainly could not be funny; nothing that was written down in this treaty could possibly be the subject of humor; it is a sacred, holy thing; it is something that we are required to accept without dotting an "i" or stroking a "t." The Senator says that this very amendment is in the treaty. If so, it can not be funny, and why should Senators laugh about it? It is, however, not in the treaty, as I shall show in a moment; in fact, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has already laid his finger on the point; but there is enough in the treaty to show that it was regarded as a proper subject for treaty consideration. That is in the treaty now. Let us see:

ART. 3. The mandatory shall see that the slave trade is prohibited and that no forced labor is permitted, except for essential public works and services, and then only for adequate remuneration. The mandatory shall also see that the traffic in arms and ammunition is controlled in accordance with principles analogous to those laid down in the convention relating to the control of the arms traffic signed on September 10, 1919, or in any convention amending same. The supply of intoxicating spirits and beverages to the natives shall be prohibited.

That does not prohibit a Jap from making liquor for himself; it does not prohibit a Jap from making it for any person who lives in the island; it does not prohibit its manufacture for sale and shipment to the United States or for sale and shipment to the world. It simply proposes to deprive the native population of liquor, but at the same time leaves the manufacture and sale for everybody else free and open and unrestricted.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I ask the Senator, suppose Japanese nationals should violate that provision of the treaty and the Japanese Government should refuse to interfere to enforce it, what would we do about it?

Mr. REED. We would do exactly as we would with reference to any other violation; we would have a Washington conference and yield to Japan. [Laughter.]

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President—

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. FRANCE. I call attention to the fact that it has been the doctrine of those who were so anxious to write a prohibition statute into the Constitution of the United States that the cause of temperance could not successfully be promoted by any system of local option. They held the theory that unless the traffic were abolished altogether liquor would move inevitably from the sections where it could be manufactured into the sections where its sale was prohibited. That was a problem with which we were confronted, of course, in the old days when there was no universal prohibition in the country, as there is now. It is upon that theory that this amendment is offered, upon the theory that if liquors are manufactured and sold in the islands they will ultimately reach the natives, and, as a matter of fact, that is what always happens.

I will say in further explanation of the amendment and of the seriousness with which it is offered that I have for some years been deeply interested in the question of the care for and the elevation of the backward peoples of countries which have come under the dominion of more advanced nations. I have read much as to the destructive influence of the liquor traffic upon primitive peoples. I offer this amendment feeling that all of the Senators here who really believe in the cause of temperance are morally bound before they turn these peoples over to His Majesty the Emperor of Japan to give them this additional protection, and I trust that before any of those Senators who have been so devoted to the cause of prohibition in this country vote against this amendment they will at least explain why they do so in terms which may be understood by the Christian and temperance people of their own States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE].

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I had the floor, and I am still trying to hold it. I suggest an amendment to the Senator. I have interlined it, and I want to see if it is satisfactory to him. The amendment as amended would read:

And the manufacture and sale, exportation and importation of intoxicating beverages shall be prohibited in the islands over which a mandate is conferred upon His Majesty the Emperor of Japan.

Is that satisfactory?

Mr. FRANCE. I accept the amendment of the Senator.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it might seem an anomaly to attach conditions of this character to mandated territory, because the theory of a mandate is that we are taking unenlightened people and putting them under the guardianship of highly enlightened and intelligent and moral people; but it seems we have not sufficient confidence in the morals or the enlightenment or the humanity of some of the countries that are to hold these mandates to render it unnecessary for us to regulate their conduct. Accordingly, it has already been written, and we are here ratifying and confirming it, that Japan shall not make slaves of these people, except when she wants to. This is carefully preserved, in my judgment, since the treaty recites that no forced labor shall be permitted, except for essential public works and services. In other words, at any time Japan wants to build any public works or have any public service performed—which might mean the carrying of the mail, whatsoever she deemed fit to call public service—she shall not make slaves; all she can do is to compel these people to do it, and then she must pay them. How much she shall pay them, of course, is for Japan to determine. There is not any labor equalization board sitting over there to fix wages; and you can trust Japan to carry out this provision in a truly Japanese way. When she wants to build anything the natives will build it. Nevertheless, the reservation, such as it is, is found in this document. It is then provided that—

The mandatory shall also see that the traffic in arms and ammunition is controlled in accordance with principles analogous to those laid down in the convention relating to the control of the arms traffic signed on September 10, 1919, or in any convention amending same.

Put in plain language, that means Japan will see to it that the natives do not have any arms. Japan will have an unarmed native population, and we bind her to do that, and then she shall not enslave them in any other way than simply to compel them to come out and work in the building of public works and the performance of public services. Then we boldly enter the field of regulating the liquor traffic:

The supply of intoxicating spirits and beverages to the natives shall be prohibited.

We do not trust that to Japan. We say Japan at least shall not supply them with intoxicating liquors or beverages. I have been looking to see whether the treaty says anything about opium. I think I am correct in saying that there is no prohibition against Japan furnishing the natives with opium. The Senator from Massachusetts perhaps can enlighten me on that point.

Mr. LODGE. The opium traffic is controlled by other treaties.

Mr. REED. It is not in this one?

Mr. LODGE. It is not in this one; no. All the treaties are not in this one—only some.

Mr. REED. Yes; a good deal more than ought to be. The opium traffic is controlled by other treaties. I submit that there is no treaty that will prohibit the sale of opium on these islands, and the Senator from Massachusetts, who seems to be losing his patience and his usual good humor, does not point out a treaty of that kind.

Why be humorous about a proposition made by the Senator from Maryland that simply proposes to say, in addition to the words of the treaty, that the supply of intoxicating spirits and beverages to the natives is prohibited, and that the manufacture and sale is prohibited to everybody within the islands?

Here is territory of which we own one-fifth. We are about to give it up, to execute a quitclaim deed, to remove from these natives the protection of the American flag and American Government and American civilization, in so far as that could be exercised when we have only a part ownership, and to turn this native population over to Japan, a nation but a few years ago so barbarous that we had to send our Navy into her waters and cannonade her ports in order to make her observe the ordinary rules of civilized nations. So that all this amendment proposes is to make effective the thing that is already in the treaty. As suggested by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], is not the amendment in accordance with the higher doctrine which we have been lately preaching? Does it not agree with the theory that the United States is under an obligation to protect weak and innocent and ignorant people everywhere? Is it not in accordance with the spirit of those gentlemen who have proposed to regulate the morals and the habits of the American citizen that they should also regulate the habits and morals of these benighted creatures? Why should they not insist that Japan should do her full duty in carrying out the high and glorious enterprises upon which we have embarked in our own country?

Mr. President, I think that we can not treat this matter lightly. Some of these islands lie very close to the Philippines. Why should we not insist that liquor should not be manufactured upon the islands lying contiguous to the Philippines and shipped into the Philippine Islands to pollute and destroy the population we are doing so much to uplift and to educate? We are spending millions of dollars in the Philippines, and we say that we are doing it in order to advance them to a point in civilization and culture and learning whereupon they will be able to establish a free government for themselves. That has been the theory at least of those upon this side of the Chamber, whatever may have been the view of those upon the other side. Why should we not rescue all of these islands that, like lilies, overspread the sea, and inculcate temperance and sobriety there? Why should we open them to the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor when we have banished it from our own soil? Why should we not extend the law so that some Japanese reformer might exercise his genius in these islands?

It appears to me that moral questions have no geographical lines. They are universal in their application. What is right is right, in whatsoever part of the globe it may be. If it is the proper thing to protect the American mainland from the curse of strong drink it ought to be proper to extend it to the islands of the sea.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that if it is proper to deny the use of strong drink to this native population, it ought to be also proper to deny it to those who are to rule over the native population. The ruling class ought to be kept sober, along with the class that are ruled over and controlled.

Think of the picture that will be presented here—a perfectly sober native population, denied either the inspiration or the solace of drink, being bossed by a Japanese who is loaded to the guards, and who has lost his sense of equity and justice because his conscience and his intellect have been submerged in alcoholic beverages.

Think of the Japanese Government possibly establishing a great distillery as a public work and then compelling the native population by forced labor to toil in that distillery, with the accumulated thirst of the years, to be in no manner slaked or mitigated. Of course, a distillery run by the Japanese Government for the purpose of making rum to ship to the California coast would be a public work, employment therein would be a public service, and forced labor could be exacted under the very terms of this treaty.

I am appealing now particularly for the California coast. Consider the situation, if Japan should start in to manufacture strong drinks in these islands, and then should undertake to land them in California, with Japanese agents aboard, bringing them in under the Japanese flag. Does anybody suppose that the present administration for a moment would dare to protest, that they would think for an instant of asserting that Japan could not bring in her liquors? We have not had enough nerve in the last 12 years to even tell Japan that we would not admit her citizens.

We had one-seventh interest in these islands. They were ours as much as they were Japan's; but Japan came in and said, "We are going to take them all." Thereupon we held a convention in Washington, and Japan said, "We are going to keep them all." And the Senate of the United States, without even a roll call, is about to vote that Japan shall keep them all? We antic before Japan with a truckling we have never exhibited toward any other nation on earth. I venture to say there is not enough real courage in the hearts of the prohibitionists on the other side of the Chamber to stand true to their doctrine and establish the great principle of prohibition in the islands of the Pacific Ocean.

Some way will be found to dodge the issue. Some one will rise and say it would be necessary, if we should adopt this amendment, to send the treaty back to a further conference. The representatives of Japan are still in this country. We could get them together in a few hours. We executed a treaty here, the so-called four-power pact, which embraced all of Japan in its protective clauses, and when that was exposed another treaty was immediately made to change it. We can change this in a few hours. Why not, if we are going to protect the native population, also protect the Japs who are to boss the native population?

Mr. President, I believe a roll call has been ordered on this amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. A roll call has been ordered.

Mr. REED. I am content, if we get a record vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE].

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], and in his absence withhold my vote.

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE's name was called). I desire to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is detained on account of a death in his family.

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW], I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], but I am informed that if he were present he would vote "nay." So I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL];

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCKINLEY] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY]; and

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. EDGE. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. HALE. Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. COLT. Making the same announcement that I made on the last vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. GLASS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (after having voted in the negative). Has the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] and in his absence refrain from voting.

Mr. ERNST (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], but understanding that he would vote as I have done, I allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] are detained on business of the Senate.

The result was announced—yeas 11, nays 52, as follows:

YEAS—11.

Ashurst	Heflin	Reed	Smith
France	Kendrick	Robinson	Swanson
Harrison	Pittman	Sheppard

NAYS—52.

So Mr. FRANCE's amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED resumed and concluded the speech begun by him yesterday. The entire speech is as follows:

Monday, February 27, 1922.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, of course the Presiding Officer has no option except to do exactly what he is doing, and if there is no one prepared to speak on this treaty, to lay the treaty before the Senate and call for a vote. I regret exceedingly the inattention which seems to be given to these treaties, and I regret equally the effort to drive them through and force a vote. I appreciate the situation. It is a reproduction of the situation we had a couple of years ago, when an effort was made to drive through a treaty without adequate debate, and without an opportunity afforded the country to understand what was within its four corners.

Every man who has a gold brick to sell knows he must make a quick bargain if he wishes to sell it at all. In the ordinary and natural course of affairs, these several treaties should have all been laid before the Senate at the same time, and all considered together, for they are inextricably woven together, and each of them affects the application of the other.

The island of Yap treaty is brought forward, and Senators are inclined to treat it as somewhat inconsequential, but those who have studied it well understand its importance, and well understand, to use a very old expression, that it is the camel's nose under the tent. It can not be properly considered, it can not be properly understood, unless we take a general view of the whole situation in the Pacific, and when we have taken a general view of the situation in the Pacific we, of necessity, have taken a general view of the whole world.

No great international question can be limited by the red lines of a map, by the boundaries of a country, or by the waters of any sea. Its settlement invariably affects the settlement of many other questions. The Yap treaty is not confined to the island of Yap in its application and in its effect. The treaties with reference to the fortifications of Guam and other points in the Pacific can not be considered alone. The limitation of armaments treaty does not stand by itself. The Chinese treaty is not limited to China in its application. These treaties are each parts of an entire scheme, and they involve the control of the Pacific Ocean and the islands in that ocean directly, but they involve also the control of the land fronting upon the Pacific Ocean. They involve the dominance of Japan in the Pacific. They involve possible war between the United States and Russia, and, in a broader aspect, they involve our relations with the entire world, and no amount of chicanery, no amount of haste, and no amount of propaganda will in the ultimate succeed in hiding the facts regarding these treaties.

Which one of us has had the opportunity to study them in their broad and sweeping effects? What light has been shed upon them by the Committee on Foreign Relations? What statesman has risen here to give us a statement of the effect of these treaties upon our relations with the world? The whole question has been one of haste, haste, haste.

I well remember when the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. LODGE] stood with some of the rest of us, with backs to the wall, fighting for time in order that questions might be understood. To-day we find a complete reversal, and the chairman of that committee is fighting to-day for many of the essentials he gallantly contended against for nearly 18 months in the Senate of the United States.

This treaty should not be forced upon Congress at this time. It should be allowed to remain here for study and for consideration. There is not a man in this body qualified to pass on this Yap treaty until he has studied the naval balances of these nations; until he has studied the relative strength of the fleets; until he has learned the strategic importance of this island and of other islands in the Pacific. What naval expert was called before the committee to testify? What man who has given his life to the study of these questions was brought there to enlighten the committee, and what light has the committee given to the Senate? The sole thing the committee has done has been to report the treaty. The distinguished leader on the other side, the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], whom I highly esteem as a man, has done nothing but stand here and crack the whip and declare that we must move forward, whether we are ready to do so or not.

I want time to study these questions. Other Senators ought to have time. These matters may involve the destiny of this country in a very material way for the next century. They certainly involve questions of the gravest character. We talk about these matters as though they were of slight consequence. The dominance of the Pacific Ocean may be said to be the dominance of the world. We are not dealing with trivial matters. We are not dealing with amateurs in diplomacy or novices in war.

We are dealing directly with the two great military powers of the earth, with the two great conquering nations of the world, with one nation whose fleet dominates the waters and whose flag floats over nearly one-third of the habitable earth, a country that has never relinquished a foot of ground unless compelled to do so by force or interest; a country that has us flanked upon our eastern coast by islands which may be termed island fortresses, where with slight expense she can run her ships under the guns of improvised forts, from which she can in two hours' time and less assail our mainland from the southern tip of Florida to the northern extremity of the Bermudas. Upon our north she holds a vast group of islands and of protected waters where her ships can ride in safety and be within an hour's striking distance of the coast of Maine and within a very few hours of Boston and New York.

She holds a dominion to our north greater in extent than the territory of the United States itself. She commands islands upon the west of our coast, and harbors within which her ships can lie in safety. She could, in case of a conflict, beyond all question, in my opinion, move her troops at will through Mexico to attack the mainland of our country. She holds a belt of islands, as I have said, commanding the eastern end of the Panama Canal. She is talking to us of brotherhood, of fraternity, of mutual love, and respect, but we could not induce Great Britain to lower her flag in any of these islands by any argument save it were bottomed upon interest or compelled by force.

We are dealing with Japan, a nation composed of men of different color, who have demonstrated ability to fight and ability to organize fights, with a ruthless and conscienceless appetite for plunder, for power, and for dominion. Her conduct in the last 25 years has been a succession of acts of broken faith and of national perfidy. She has demonstrated that she does not regard a treaty even as a scrap of paper. She regards it as an artifice to be employed to deceive others and as a means by which she can conceal her own purposes of attack, of ravishment and despoliation. She proceeds with a secrecy impossible in the United States. Twice within the memory of boys who are yet not old enough to vote she has broken her plighted faith and struck like an assassin in the dark.

Within the last five years she has given evidence of such cunning, such statesmanship of a selfish variety, such rapacity as ought to place every man, charged with a duty to his country, upon notice and upon his guard.

We entered the war with an implied if not express understanding that France and England and Japan would make no peace and make no terms until the enemy was prostrate, and thereafter no nation would make terms to the detriment of another, but there would be a common agreement or each should make its separate agreement, and none would lay down its sword until each nation had been satisfied.

These powers knew our President had inveighed against secret agreements, private understandings, covert plottings, and that whatever was to be done should be done in the open at the end of the conflict. Yet, in a deceit that was unpardonable, with a trickery that was abominable, with a secrecy that was impenetrable, they met and agreed to divide among themselves the dominion of the world, for that is exactly what it means—a large part of the world at least.

Then they sent their representatives over to this country. They came to this body. They appealed to us in the name of world democracy and the rights of man, in the holy name of justice and international equity. They said to us in substance and effect, "The situation is desperate. Send us relief at once. If you are not prepared to send vast bodies of men, at least send us a few regiments in order that their appearance upon European soil may hearten our people and let them know by this evidence that the Americans are coming."

Within a few days we placed our advance regiments upon transports. Within a few days more the tread of America's legion was heard in the capitals of England and of France. A thrill of hope went through the hearts of the listening multitudes and a cheer broke along the great battle line, "The Americans are coming."

They called on us for aid and still more aid. We voted $10,000,000,000 for their benefit. The clerk in the store, the washerwoman bending above her suds, the farmer toiling in his field, the mechanic sweating at the furnace, the banker behind his desk, the widow in her cottage—all of them brought forth their store of savings, and all of them laid it upon the altar of their country. All of them contributed because we were going to make the world safe for democracy and fight one great battle for justice, for honesty, for fair dealing, one great battle to do away with secret diplomacy, one great battle to tear asunder the curtain that had hidden the conspiracies of the past, and to compel all nations kindred in tongue to frankly state their case and their purpose to the world.

While these matters were going on this secret agreement existed. While we were acting upon the presumption I have just outlined these nations were preparing to execute the terms of that secret agreement, and not once did they suggest to the President of the United States or to his advisers, "There is an agreement binding upon us of which you have not been advised."

President Wilson made one great mistake. It was a mistake that honorable men too often make. He believed others were as honorable as he, that the statesmen of the world, like himself, meant what they said; but, in the toils of diplomacy, he was in the same situation that a highly educated gentleman finds himself, assuming that others are intelligent and honorable as he, namely, in a position to be cheated and defrauded.

It is time for plain speech and, so far as I am concerned, I intend to indulge in plain speech. I said that while our troops were crossing the ocean, while they were building railroads to the front, while they were erecting mighty warehouses in which the food for themselves and for the French and British Armies could be stored, while we were loading vessels to the water line with American wheat and American flour, while our people were eating brans, shorts, and middlings in order that we might send white flour abroad, these gentlemen were engaged in carrying out the terms of the secret agreement.

The first thing the allied powers did was to attack the outposts of Germany in the Pacific and to take them. That might have been done for military purposes, but it is a singular thing that Japan took possession, in the main, of the very parts of the German possessions which she was to hold under that secret agreement. She seized islands and fortresses and the waters which commanded Shantung, which had been assigned to her in the secret plottings of those diplomats. Great Britain seized those parts of Africa which she afterwards held. The war went on. Japan was to have all the islands in the Pacific north of the Equator; England was to have all the islands in the Pacific south of the Equator. We did not know anything about that deal; we were not advised with reference to it.

We sent, in round numbers, 2,500,000 men to Europe. We were massing in our camps nearly three millions more. We had turned every blast furnace and every factory and every industry in the United States to the one great task of making munitions and creating war supplies. We left 75,000 dead in France; we filled our land with cripples, maimed, and blind. We expended directly, first and last, approximately forty thousand million dollars; we expended indirectly probably not less than $100,000,000,000. That was our part of the task.

We were in no danger of invasion; we were in no danger of attack. An assertion of that kind is the idlest thing that ever fell from human lips. England and France, however, were not only in danger but in the greatest danger, not only of attack but of overwhelming defeat. They saw fit under these circumstances to deal with Japan. And what did Japan contribute to the war? How many men did she lose? How many dollars did she expend? How many ships of Japan went to the bottom? In comparison with our own losses they were inconsequential.

At the end of the war, what are we told. We are told that we must relinquish to Japan the dominion of the islands north of the Equator in the Pacific Ocean, because there was a secret agreement, because we were not privy to it, because we were tricked. And we are now asked to ratify and confirm forever that trick. That which we ought to resent and repudiate it is now proposed we shall accept humbly and ratify expeditiously.

A moment ago I was discussing the question of double-dealing, and the instance which I have now cited is an instance where we were ourselves abused, where our confidence was mistreated, and our legitimate rights were invaded, for we have a great and permanent interest in the control of the Pacific Ocean. If we ever yield it, the curse of the people of America will fall on those men who have surrendered it.

With whom are we dealing? We are dealing with Japan. Who is gaining by this treaty we are now considering? Japan. What are we sacrificing by this treaty and the other treaties connected with it? I unhesitatingly say we are sacrificing the Philippine Islands, our interest in the Pacific, and we are sacrificing all chance ever to defend the Philippine Islands, as I shall prove by the highest authority. I challenge the Foreign Relations Committee now to hold public meetings and call before it the great military and naval experts of the United States and take their testimony in public.

In discussing the question of attacks upon the United States or upon Guam or upon the Philippines, Mr. Bywater, who is an associate of the Institute of Naval Architects, has this to say:

If naval power were measured by battleships alone the American people would have little cause for anxiety as to their future in the Pacific. When the programs now in hand on both sides of that ocean are completed the United States will have about twice as many capital ships as Japan.

This was written before the proposal for reduction of armaments.

But, as we have seen, many other factors must be taken into consideration. In the event of war with Japan the United States would at once be called upon to decide whether its distant insular possessions were to be defended or abandoned. In the latter case the strategical problem would be reduced to a simple form, and the United States Navy would be entirely adequate to fulfill the duties which would then devolve upon it. But if the passive surrender of the Philippines and Guam were held to be incompatible with the interest and prestige of the Nation, a very different situation would arise; and since neither the history nor the traditions of the American people lead us to suppose that they would tolerate so monstrous a humiliation, it is safe to assume that the retention of the islands at all costs would be determined upon as a matter of course. That decision would necessitate the dispatch of large naval and military forces to the threatened territory across many thousands of miles of ocean. Whether the American fleet could straightway proceed to the war zone would depend on what was meanwhile taking place in the Philippines and at Guam, but more especially at the latter point. If war broke out before anything had been done to convert Guam into a strong place of arms, it might, and probably would, fall into enemy hands in the first few weeks of the war, for it would pay the Japanese to devote all their efforts to capturing this island before attempting any move against the Philippines. With Guam in their possession, they could take the Philippines at their leisure, in the certainty that no one could interfere with them.

(A motion to recess was made and defeated.)

Mr. TOWNSEND addressed the Senate. After having spoken some time,

Mr. REED. Mr. President, we have just had a charming example of that virtue which consists of a lecture of other people for not talking to the question while the orator himself has talked about something entirely foreign to the question. The question under consideration is the Yap treaty. It has not been discussed in the last few minutes because the Senator from Michigan, who has not been here, I think, for about a week, saw fit to deliver a lecture to the rest of the Senate, which not only was foreign to the issue, but was foreign to that degree of courtesy which the Senator usually extends.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Does the Senator from Missouri believe that we have spent an unreasonable length of time debating this change of our national policy in behalf of one private corporation?

Mr. REED. I have said already that I thought we were not taking sufficient time for proper consideration.

The Senator from Michigan states that he will put into the Record the number of hours consumed by Senators in making speeches, and how much it costs the country to have those speeches made. I hope he will do that. But I beg to suggest it will not cover the case, because frequently, however badly time may be wasted in making speeches, I have known it to be much worse employed by casting votes. It so happens that a few votes such as we had the other day may do a country a good deal more harm than a thousand speeches, whether they are to the question at issue or whether they are not.

I have heard a good many men complain about speeches in the Senate, but I say that I have very seldom heard a speech in the Senate that did not convey some information to the country and did not throw light upon some question which the Senate then had immediately under consideration, or which it was soon to have under consideration. The truth of the matter is there are men who never learn anything except by word of mouth. Even then it is sometimes very difficult to keep them in their seats long enough to tell it to them, and they always have a cloture rule ready. I have never seen one of those gentlemen yet who has been very greatly distinguished before the country as a public servant of unusual ability or unusual patriotism. Generally he appears in the attitude of a gentleman with a soured stomach and disordered liver, and that sometimes is impressed on his countenance as well as expressed in his language.

I have never known a question of importance in the Senate to be defeated by a talk, by a filibuster, when the question has been brought forward long enough in advance to permit of reasonable debate.

Now, the trouble with the lack of doing business in the Senate during this session is not a superabundance of talk; it is an almost complete lack of ideas on the part of the managers of business on the other side of the Chamber. They run for a while in one direction and then they reverse themselves and run back. Like a patrolman walking his beat, they never get anywhere except on that particular beat, although possibly it affords them interesting occupation.

There are several ways of wasting time, you know. One is to talk so much that the Senator from Michigan is disturbed and troubled by it. The other is to start in to pass a bill, keep it before the Senate for about two weeks, and then run away from the bill, or recommit it—put it in cold storage. We were told the first thing to happen at this session would be the enactment of a bonus bill. If you were right on that measure, what a blessed thing the talk was for you. You brought in the bonus bill and it was to be galloped through the Senate with the spirited gait of John Gilpin's mare.

If it had not been debated, it is fair to assume that one of two things would have occurred. It would have passed before the Secretary of the Treasury discovered that it was going to bankrupt the country. So you ought to get down on your knees and thank us folks over here for talking about it long enough for you on the other side of the Chamber to get your ideas organized.

The other theory is that we on this side cast so much light on the proposition that we convinced you that if passed by Democratic support it would be a very sad thing for you next election. Hence you ran away from it again or ran away with it.

Whatever you do over there, do not charge us with wasting time on the bonus bill. That was the first child that was to be born here this session. It was to be brought forth decked with flowers. It was to be a baby that you could dandle in your arms on every political platform and show all the soldiers. "Behold, we are the wet nurse of this interesting infant. We are your benefactors. We have looked after you." But somebody got in communication with the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury got in contact with the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House. Then he got in contact with the Finance Committee in the Senate, or at least the Republican members of it.

There was consternation, and you took several days while you were milling around here like a lot of longhorns in a snowstorm. At the end of that time you said you could not stand up before the people of the country unless somebody would brace you, and you brought the President over here and you had him assume the burden.

After two or three weeks of discussion you took this bill back to the committee and you put it on ice. The coldest refrigerator in all the world is the cold-storage room of the Finance Committee of the Senate. There it rests. We are not to blame because you wasted all that time; we could not help it. If you had just moved forward we would have helped to pass that bill; you would have had it out of the way. Now you have got it in the ice chest and you have solemnly sworn by the most high gods that you will bring it out again. When you do you will consume more time. In the meantime you are speculating how you can give the soldier what he wants and at the same time allow the excess-profits gentleman to retain what he wants. You have been wasting 11 months of time on that problem, and you are still discussing it in the other House.

You were going to levy a sales tax because, having taken the tax off excess profits, you had to get the money from some place, and you concluded you would get it from all the people, including the soldiers. They and their fathers and their mothers would pay most of the tax, and you would give each of them a part of it. Now, do not charge us with wasting time on that. Some people may filibuster, in the opinion of the Senator from Michigan, by making speeches, but that is the filibustering of the artful dodger, who pretends he is going to do something and then does not do it.

The next thing you were pledged to do just as soon as you got through the soldiers' bonus was to wipe out all the iniquities of the Underwood tariff law. You were to give us a tariff bill immediately that would restore prosperity to the country, that would open all the markets of the world to American goods and close all the markets of America to foreign goods, whereby we could carry on a glorious trade, consisting of the other fellow buying our goods and we refusing to deal in his.

You were pledged at the same time, by the same process, to restore the merchant marine; to make our shipping a great paying venture by sending our boats loaded with American goods and bringing them back empty. And the merchant marine would wax prosperous and rich. We had hearings on the tariff bill for two months, for three months, for four months, and, I think, finally for five or six months. The hearings ran through the golden days of the springtime, through the hot days of summer, through the sizzling hours of the dog days; the frosts fell; the winter blasts swept down upon us; and still the bill was incubating; still the committee were meeting on it.

Then the Republican members of the Finance Committee withdrew in secret to a spot where no wicked Democrats might disturb the peaceful course of their lucubrations, and there they have been meeting ever since. No one is there to filibuster, and I do not know what they are doing. The only intimation I have as to the course of their deliberations is that I heard one of them remark one day in language which was forceful but quite unparliamentary that they were trying to do the impossible; but what that impossible was I did not know. Now, do not blame us with wasting that time; do not charge that up to any speech any wasteful Democrat made here.

Then you were going to pass a revenue bill. After very long consideration in the committee you brought the revenue bill from committee. Of course, if there had been a cloture rule in force you might have jammed the bill through. But as it came forth it would not stand the light of discussion; it would not stand the test of reason; it could not endure exposure before the public. At last the gorge rose in the iron stomachs in some of your own party; 15 or 20 of them banded together and said they would not tolerate a bill which proposed to reduce the taxes upon men with incomes above $50,000 a year while keeping the taxes substantially where they were on small incomes; that no matter how you loved the millionaires and how much they had contributed there were some men in your party who were not bound to the chariot wheels of the great interests, and these Senators rebelled. There was more discussion, very distasteful discussion, I doubt not, to the Senator from Michigan, distasteful to every standpatter on the other side of the Chamber. The question was whether you could carry out your scheme to relieve the profiteers of their burdens and increase the taxes upon those whose gains were meager and whose incomes were small. That took some time. If you had cloture, you would not have had any difficulty about it. You could have jammed it through and left the country in ignorance of the facts.

A part of your scheme was to keep the tax on railroad tickets—a tax paid by every man and woman who traveled and not by the railroads at all. The bill as it first came to the Senate retained half of the existing tax. But Senators who were in rebellion on your side of the Chamber protested against that and you were forced to remove that tax in order to pass your bill.

You proposed to take $90,000,000 of taxes off corporation stocks, a tax that amounts to nothing to the small corporation, but mounts into the millions as to some of the very large corporations. The solid vote on this side of the Chamber, aided by the rebels on your side, stopped that performance. The mistake made by the rebels on your side was that they made a trade and compromised a fight which together we could have won completely. Whatever was achieved was the result of debate, and that debate was worth more than all the time the Senator from Michigan has spent since he was an infant—

Mewling and puking in the nurse's arms.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President—

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. REED. I do not yield. The Senator from Mississippi rises in his right to suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi has made a motion to adjourn.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest the absence of a quorum. That was what I meant to do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi suggests the absence of a quorum.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I was about to make a parliamentary inquiry in that connection.

Mr. REED. Again, you told us you were going to restore prosperity to the country immediately by taking care of the railroads. You promised to turn over $500,000,000 to them. They would pay their dividends and their interest, the wheels of commerce would begin to move, the farmer would begin to get rich, cattle would begin to get fat, pigs would grow rapidly, sheep would rise on the market, and mutton would go down on the table, and there would be a general era of perfect prosperity, and that the boom would be so great that it would really be a little dangerous.

Why did you not bring in your $500,000,000 bill and try to pass it? Because there was no cloture in the Senate. If you could have brought it in as a committee measure, allowed no time for debate, and forced it to a vote, I have not any doubt that the same gentleman who wants to abolish freedom of speech in the Senate would abolish the right of roll call and have a viva voce vote wherever the Constitution of the United States did not otherwise provide.

How much time did you waste, nights and days, sweating over the proposition of how you could put through that $500,000,000 bill for the railroads without being exposed on the Senate floor? I warrant you spent more energy and more nerve force on that than you did listening to anybody's speeches on this side, bad as some of them may have been—and I am speaking now particularly of my own. I will tell you why you did not put your $500,000,000 bill through—because you knew that in unlimited debate it would be torn to pieces and your scheme exposed. You consumed some time on it, though. There have been some other bills put through here that ought to have been discussed more than they were. Although you could not give the soldier any adjusted compensation you could put through bills making good to contractors all they said they had lost. There was time to pass bills to care for sugar kings who claimed they had been authorized to make contracts by people who had no authority so to authorize them.

I am getting just a little bit weary of being lectured every time the Senator from Michigan loses his temper. When you kill freedom of speech in the United States Senate you will have issued a license to every buccaneer and scoundrel who hopes to accomplish his dishonest purposes through dark-lantern methods. Of course, it is not proper to refer to the House of Representatives, and I do not refer to it at all; but there is a body that I know of that has been regularly proceeding under authority of special rules, adopted from time to time, so drawn that bills can not be amended on the floor. They have all kinds of cloture; and I have not observed that the character of legislation that has been ground out in the mythical and hypothetical body I am now discussing is of any higher character than the business that is transacted by this body that is composed of men who want to make speeches and of men who do not want to listen to them.

This is, in fact, the only public, open forum in the world.

What is the complaint now? That four or five treaties which reverse the ancient policies of our country can not be jammed down the throats of the Senate without some protest and some exposure.

What are these treaties, and how was this work done?

One of them was so drawn that I ventured to charge upon the floor of the Senate that it included in its protective clauses all of Japan. Thereupon the President of the United States promptly came forward to defend this treaty from the frightful aspersion that had been cast upon it, and by his declaration to purge it of the infamy charged; and he very promptly said that it did not include all of Japan, but included only outlying islands.

Then somebody better informed than himself, closer to the secret councils, the records of which have not been produced for the Senate, made a trip to the White House, or, as they say over in New York, "got him on the wire," and told him he was all wrong—that the treaty did include all of Japan. A little open discussion there would have been a good thing.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is the Senator now talking about the same President who, when he denied us any information about the particulars of the negotiation of the four-power pact, assured us that it contained no secret agreement?

Mr. REED. I assume he is the same President. He is the only one we have.

Mr. CARAWAY. Saying that he had as much information about one as he had about the other?

Mr. REED. I think so. That same afternoon, before the chickens went to roost, he announced it was true that it did embrace all of Japan; but that which had been in the morning a slander against the treaty—a misconception and misconstruction—now became a virtue. He said it did not make any difference if it did include all of Japan. In the morning he repudiated it as a slander upon the treaty—though that was not his exact language, because he never uses violent language—but in the evening he accepted that which he had denominated a slander either as of no consequence or as an added virtue.

Mr. President, after that reversal of form and of substance and of declaration, we find that it became necessary to do something. The chip had been lifted up, and the bug had been exposed. There were rumblings heard all the way from the forks of the creek clear down to the great centers of learning and wisdom and patriotism, even unto Wall Street. Something had to be done. They were forced to limit their own treaty, even before the ink was dry, merely because of a discussion. They had to define it and limit it, so that it would not include all of Japan; although, according to the statements I have, they had secretly agreed it should, and although the President in his second declaration said it did. So, on the 6th day of February this language was written in as a reservation or addendum:

The term "insular possessions and insular dominions" used in the aforesaid treaty shall, in its application to Japan, include only Karafuto (or the southern portion of the island of Sakhalin), Formosa, and the Pescadores, and the islands under the mandate of Japan.

In other words, they said it shall not include the mainland of Japan. Hence, before the treaty had been discussed more than twice, its authors were driven from the ground they had chosen for themselves.

If we had had cloture of the right sort, there might never have been a word said about it on the Senate floor, for the gag might have been applied, and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] would have gone home with his digestion as sweet as though he had swallowed an ounce of saleratus, and probably he would have been good natured for two or three days.

There was no time for discussion, and yet the Committee on Foreign Relations, as soon as they find there is some light being thrown upon these treaties, is meeting to discuss reservations. What is a reservation, Mr. President? It is a solemn admission that the thing agreed upon originally will not do, that you bungled the business, that you had to amend your own work and do it over; that, if I may be permitted to use the expression, you fumbled the ball; that you either did not know what you were doing, or that you thought better of it afterwards.

Really, however, the true cause is that you got out of the atmosphere in which you were writing and thinking. An interchange of ideas is a good thing for every man who thinks. It is only the man who can not think who objects to an interchange of thought. So that you stand here confessing, by your own acts and your own written words, that the thing you drew would not do, and that it has to be amended and changed, so that you can make it tolerable even to yourselves. So we have reservations.

Discussion is not a bad thing, even if it breaks the dinner engagements of legislative Hotspurs who are determined to put a bill through in one night.

Mr. President, I say that the decent thing to have done with these treaties was to have laid them before the Senate, and not brought them up for discussion until 30 or 40 days had elapsed; until they could have been discussed by the country; until they could have been understood by the people, and with these treaties I venture to remark there should have been laid down the expert opinions of the heads of our Navy and of our Army with reference to every proposition involved. We should have been told exactly what the effect of these treaties is or may be upon our national defense. We have not been told.

Tuesday, February 28, 1922.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like for a very few minutes to state what I believe to be a fundamental objection to the treaty. There are two views with reference to our future in the Pacific. One is that we shall, for an indefinite period of time at least, keep the Philippines, that we shall endeavor to maintain a trade with the East, and that we shall continue to hold a very large interest in the Pacific Ocean. The other is that we shall abandon the Philippines, that we shall accept whatever we may be able to obtain in the way of trade in the Far East, and make no effort toward its material extension. The treaties which we are now considering will settle, whether we intend it or not, our future policy.

I have the authorities upon my desk, but I shall not take the time to read them now. They are to the effect that Japan could take the Philippine Islands in 36 hours as the islands are now fortified; that she could take Guam, as now fortified, within three or four days' time; and that Japan, having taken Guam and the Philippines, and being placed in possession of the Marshall and the Caroline Islands by these treaties, we could never recover the Philippine Islands unless it were at the end of a very prolonged war, when we had constructed a Navy out of all proportion to that of Japan, and even then our success would be doubtful.

There is a very simple reason lying at the basis. The modern warship can not travel from the United States to the Philippine Islands, fight a battle, and return without coaling. There is some question whether many of them could make that round trip without coaling. If Japan were in possession of the Philippines and we were to go there to oust her, unless we had a great coaling station fortified so that it could be protected, our vessels would be helpless and could only turn around and come back, if, indeed, they had the fuel to get back. With Guam in our possession and properly fortified we could use it as a base where our ships could be recoaled and protected, and from that point we could attack the Philippines and successfully take them if they had been taken from us by Japan. But the treaties, as I understand them, provide that we shall not further fortify Guam or any of our possessions in the Pacific, except perhaps the Hawaiian Islands.

If we make these several treaties, we will have this situation. The Philippines can be taken at almost any moment by Japan. Guam can be taken by Japan. Having accomplished this end, the Japanese Government, resting with her ships under the protection of her guns, can defy us for practically an indefinite period, if not for all time.

The pending treaty ratifies the provisions of the Versailles arrangement by which all of the islands north of the Equator in the Pacific were to be mandated to Japan. It gives to Japan two great groups of islands lying between the Philippines and Hawaii—the Caroline and the Marshall Islands. It brings her from 2,000 to 3,000 miles nearer Hawaii than she was previously. It places her in the situation that her vessels could reach Hawaii and attack that country almost, if not quite as quickly, as vessels from the United States could reach those islands. It establishes the dominance of Japan in the North Pacific Ocean. It gives to that Empire a power she has never before possessed.

It is true that it is proposed that we shall enter into a treaty by which Japan will agree that she will not do certain things, but what do those treaties amount to?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President—

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator says these treaties bring Japan 2,000 miles nearer the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Just what does the Senator mean by that?

Mr. REED. I mean by that that she is given dominance of the Marshall Islands and the Caroline Islands.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But the Senator pointed out that we could not go across the ocean and do anything, even with our superior fleet, because we would have no bases there. Doubtless that is correct. As I understand it, Japan is forbidden to establish any naval or military bases in the mandated islands, so that she would be without a base there, and her only base would be on the mainland or the islands adjacent thereto. Therefore how is Japan brought 2,000 miles nearer to the Hawaiian Islands?

Mr. REED. If the Senator will examine the map which I have on my desk, I shall be glad to point out. Here [indicating] are the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understand perfectly well that the mandated islands are a distance of 1,500 or 2,000 miles from Japan, but, speaking from a military point of view, unless Japan is permitted to establish military or naval bases there, how do they help her? That is to say, how do they bring her, in a military or naval point of view, 2,000 miles nearer Hawaii?

Mr. REED. I shall be glad to answer that question. It is a fair question and I am going to answer it in a moment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should dislike to agree to anything that would effectuate that purpose.

Mr. REED. Before the war these islands were in the possession of Germany. Everyone who knows the careful study that Germany made of her foreign situation understands that Germany was not taking property that was of no use. These islands have a use not only in times of peace but a tremendous value in time of war. We have a one-fifth interest in them; that is, we did have before the Washington conference. Holding that one-fifth interest, we could insist upon our rights in these islands and we could at least have insisted—and this is what I think should have been done—upon the policy advocated by the President, as I understand, that all of the islands should be neutralized or internationalized.

We are not doing that. We are consenting to the mandate. That mandate means that the flag of Japan will float over these islands, that Japanese officers will be in control of the islands, and that whatsoever rights we have will be those stipulated in the treaty. It is true now that the several treaties taken together provide that Japan shall not fortify the islands. But suppose we get into a difficulty with Japan. The instant that occurs Japan of course will fortify the islands. It seems to me to take any other position is to deny the lessons of all history and particularly the lessons regarding Japanese history.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course Japan would then be in violation of the treaty.

Mr. REED. When two nations go to war all treaties are gone.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Would we not have exactly the same opportunity then to proceed to fortify that Japan would have; and likewise if Japan, in violation of the treaty, began to fortify one of these islands, would we not be equally entitled to begin to fortify Guam?

Mr. REED. The Senator's inquiry is proper. I will get to that point and try to answer it in a consecutive way.

Japan will be in possession. We will not be in possession. Japan's officers and Japan's flag will be there. Now, let me consider it from the standpoint from which great naval authorities have considered it, and we must consider it in connection with Japanese history.

I read from the work of Mr. Bywater:

It is reasonable to infer from their conduct on previous occasions that the Japanese would act with swiftness and energy once a rupture had become inevitable. In 1894 the Japanese naval squadron began hostilities against China a week in advance of the formal declaration of war, and the famous torpedo attack on Port Arthur in February, 1904, took place only a few hours after the Japanese Government had signified its resolve to terminate the negotiations with Russia. Once the Japanese had determined to take up arms, they would carry on their preparations behind an impenetrable veil of secrecy.

Long before the World War came to make us familiar with the meaning of a military censorship, Japan had brought the suppression of war news to a fine art. During both the Sino-Japanese and Russo-Japanese campaigns not a word of news leaked out of Japan which did not carry the official censor's imprimatur. Although the Russians maintained an army of agents in Japan to keep them informed of naval and military movements they received no trustworthy intelligence from these sources. The Japanese fleet concentrated at Sasebo had left that port for its war base at Mokpo, on the southwest coast of Korea, without a soul outside of Japan being any the wiser. Subsequent movements of the navy and army throughout the war were shrouded in the same secrecy. Divisions were assembled at the points of embarkation, transported across the Sea of Japan, and had reached the front before it was known that they were under orders to leave.

I think that it may be worth while calling attention to further remarks of this author. He is now discussing the very thing that will happen in the event we do not fortify Guam and if we yield these possessions to Japan.

If the hypothetical conflict we are now discoursing began in 1922 the Japanese Navy would dispose of 7 dreadnaughts, 4 battle cruisers, a large number of older armored ships, 12 fast, light cruisers, more than 100 destroyers, and about 60 seagoing submarines. This force could not hope to fight a successful action with the entire American battle fleet, which would have more than twice as many heavy ships and destroyers; but it would be quite strong enough to overpower and annihilate the American cruiser squadron stationed at Manila and to cover the landing of expeditionary forces in the Philippines and at Guam. The broadside fire of the seven dreadnaughts alone would be more than sufficient to sweep away the feeble defenses at Manila and Guam. Mine fields and any other obstructions which might be laid down in the fairways could be quickly removed by the sweepers and auxiliaries accompanying the Japanese fleet. By requisitioning the passenger and larger cargo steamers in Japanese ports at any average moment, tonnage for the transporting of 100,000 troops, with artillery and train, could be provided at the shortest notice.

The transport section of the Tokyo war office has made the most detailed arrangements for the transportation overseas of large military contingents. It has been estimated by competent military observers that a division could be landed on any coast within 1,500 miles of Japan in 14 days from the date of mobilization. Embarkation and landing exercises have been frequently carried out in connection with military maneuvers during the past 10 years, and the operation is, therefore, one with which the Japanese army is familiar.

It is desirable at this point to review very briefly the strength and organization of the imperial army, whose prowess in the war of 1904-5 against Russia earned it the right to be considered one of the finest and most formidable instruments of war in existence. Its rapid growth after the Chinese War of 1894-5 is shown from the following tables compiled by Marshal Prince Yamagata:

	Marshals and generals.	Other officers.	Noncommissioned officers.	Men.	Total.
Before Chinese War.....	36	4,235	8,770	65,241	78,482
Before Russian War.....	94	8,480	11,865	132,348	152,787
After Russian War.....	125	14,388	24,066	211,396	249,975

In the 1919-20 session of the (Japanese) Diet the war minister, Gen. Tanaka, on being pressed to disclose the peace strength of the army at that date, gave the following figures: Officers, 16,045; noncommissioned officers, 28,369; privates, 228,317; a total of 272,731. Like the sister service, however, the army has not by any means reached the maximum standard of strength to which the Government is determined that it shall ultimately attain. Their program calls for an establishment of 41 army corps, with a total of 1,000,000 bayonets, with corresponding additions to the artillery and other branches. It is hoped to have by 1930 not less than 740,000 troops in the first line, 780,000 in the second line, and 3,850,000 in the reserve.

This is not an abnormal figure in relation to the Japanese population, but whether the national finances will ever permit to be realized is open to doubt.

The Prussian Army is the master pattern on which Japan's military system has been fashioned, and the broad principles of organization and training laid down by Gen. Meckel, the Prussian officer who was appointed military adviser to the Japanese Government in 1885, have never been departed from. Beginning in 1918, however, a number of important reforms were introduced to embody the teachings of modern warfare. The army is to be entirely remodeled, and the process, according to Gen. Tanaka, will not be completed before 1936, though it is believed that this period will in fact be greatly abbreviated.

There follows a description of the details of the Japanese new arrangement which I ask to insert in the Record.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

One of the first changes to be approved was the constitution of each division on a three-regiment basis and the abolition of the brigade. An army corps will in future comprise 2 divisions, or 6 regiments. This arrangement will shortly result in an establishment of 32 divisions, or 6 army corps, exclusive of the guards' division. The program embraces also large additions to the cavalry, commissariat, engineering, railway, signaling, and aviation corps; and the creation of heavy and light tank corps. A certain Japanese general officer is credited with the remark that, however great the expense involved by this ambitious scheme may be, it will be a cheap price to pay for securing the tranquillity and undisturbed prosperity of the Far East. "Had England," he declared, "possessed 20 divisions on a peace footing, or—what amounts to the same thing—had Germany expanded her army into one of formidable strength, the world's catastrophe might have been avoided. Such preparedness would have sufficed to deter resort to arms." A Japanese infantry regiment contains four battalions, each of 600 men; a cavalry regiment four squadrons of 100 sabers each; a field artillery regiment has six 4-gun batteries, or a total of 24 guns; while an engineers' battalion consists of three companies, each 300 strong. In accordance with the lessons of the World War, very substantial additions are being made to the artillery, especially the heavier types, including field howitzers of 4.6-inch, 6-inch, 8-inch, 11-inch, and 12-inch caliber, and high-velocity guns for long-range bombardment. The extension of the machine-gun service began in 1917 and is proceeding at the rate of 10 new batteries per year. By 1927, perhaps before that date, every infantry regiment will have its own machine-gun section, equivalent to a strength of 15 guns to a battalion. Besides the heavy and light tanks mentioned above, armored cars and motor-transport vehicles are being added to the Army as rapidly as funds permit. A liberal bounty is now paid to manufacturers and owners who build their cars to war office specification and hold them at the Government's disposal in time of emergency.

Conscription, which applies to all males in good physical condition between the ages of 17 and 40, has been in force since 1873. Recruits, however, are not taken until they reach their twentieth year. After serving two years in the infantry, or three years in the cavalry, artillery, or other branches, they pass into the reserve for a period of five years, during which they must undergo 120 days' training with the colors. They are then transferred to the second line, in which they remain for 10 years, being called up for two 60-day periods of training. On passing out of the second line they enter the territorial or home-defense army for 32 months. This system, it will be seen, provides for a huge reserve of trained man power. Discipline in the Japanese Army tends to be draconic; and, although soldiering is very popular with the nation as a whole, the severity with which the rank and file are treated leads to many cases of desertion, a crime which has lately shown an increase.

MR. REED. The author adds:

It may be accepted as certain that by 1922 the peace strength of the Japanese Army will be not less than 300,000 of all ranks, with a first line reserve of 250,000 and a second line of 1,150,000 men. Since it is most unlikely that the fact of mobilization would be publicly announced, a formal declaration of hostilities would probably find at least 1,000,000 troops under arms, ready to start for any destination overseas. The transport problem would present no difficulty whatever. Thanks to the impulse given by the war, the Japanese mercantile marine has increased by leaps and bounds and since 1914, the increment amounting to approximately 1,300,000 tons. Before the war Japan occupied the sixth place among the maritime countries of the world; to-day she occupies the third place, and in spite of the slump which has recently set in she is still hard at work on the production of tonnage, her output for 1920 alone reaching 400,000 tons. The national merchant fleet now totals well over 3,000,000 tons.

MR. OVERMAN. Mr. President, in the address delivered this afternoon by the President of the United States he referred to the second line of defense. We have agreed in one of the treaties now before us to stop building ships and to scrap some of our ships. The President suggested a subsidy to build more merchant ships, for the purpose, I presume, of providing a second line of defense as well as for the purposes of promoting our overseas commerce. I will ask the Senator how many ships Japan has as a second line of defense?

MR. REED. I shall answer that practically a little later on.

The system of State subsidies has encouraged the building of many large and fast steamers for the services maintained by such well-known firms as the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, which operates lines to Europe, America, Australia, and India.

Then follows the names of other companies which I will not take the time to read.

Every vessel registered in Japan of more than 1,500 tons and 14 knots speed is on the books of the Army Transport Section as a potential troopship. The efficiency of this organization was demonstrated in the war with Russia, and it has been greatly developed since that time. We may, therefore, assume that a Japanese expeditionary force of 50,000 men could be placed on board a fleet of transports, possessing an average speed of 15 knots, within a few days from the issue of the mobilization order. If the embarkation took place at the southern ports of Japan the voyage to the Philippines would occupy less than five days; or if Guam were the objective, that island, distant only 1,360 miles from Yokohama, could be reached in four days.

The presence of a strong American fleet in the western area of the Pacific would, of course, deter Japan from undertaking military expeditions of this kind. On the other hand, her conduct in previous wars justifies the supposition that she would take good care to open the campaign at her selected moment, which would certainly not coincide with the visit of a formidable American naval squadron to the western Pacific. The cruiser squadron at present based on Manila could offer no serious opposition to the Japanese battle fleet, and unless the ships sought safety in flight—which would be impossible if Japanese battle cruisers were near at hand—their destruction would be inevitable. In view of the overwhelming strategic importance of Guam this island will doubtless be the first Japanese objective. The reduction of its feeble defenses would be a simple matter for the heavy ships, and, once the mine fields had been cleared out and the batteries silenced, the landing would proceed with the utmost celerity. The sanguinary fighting around Port Arthur in 1904 taught us that Japanese troops will cheerfully sacrifice themselves in hecatombs when the order goes forth to take an enemy position at all costs. Thus the resistance which the small garrison of marines would be able to offer could not stem for long the tidal wave of invasion. If the expeditionary force reached Guam at dawn, the Japanese might count on having firmly established themselves on the island before nightfall.

A simultaneous attack on the Philippines and Guam would place no abnormal strain on Japanese naval, military, or shipping resources. In the case of the Philippines expedition, the landing itself would doubtless be made at one or more points where there were no seaward defenses. The complete subjugation of the islands would not be attempted at once; it would suffice if the principal harbors were seized, garrisoned, and hastily fortified, an operation for which two weeks would be a liberal time allowance.

I call the attention of the Senate to that statement.

The conclusion is that within a fortnight after the beginning of hostilities the United States would find herself bereft of her insular possessions in the Western Pacific, and consequently without a single base for naval operations in those waters. Those who demur to what may seem a somewhat startling statement are invited to examine the premises on which it rests, and to judge for themselves whether any other inference can be drawn therefrom.

With Guam and the Philippines in enemy hands, the problem confronting the United States would become well-nigh insolvable. Here it may be interpolated that Japanese strategists, who have discussed in an academic way the possibilities of such a war as that we are now considering, have satisfied themselves that at this stage the United States would negotiate for peace, realizing the impossibility of retrieving the situation. In their case the wish is probably father to the thought. Whatever view the American Government might take, it is scarcely conceivable that public opinion in the United States would tolerate a passive acceptance of the accomplished fact and own defeat at the very outset of the struggle. It is far more likely that a vociferous demand for action of some sort would arise strong enough to compel the Government to bow to the popular will. If so, several courses would be open to the American naval command, but whether any of them would lead to the desired goal is doubtful. They might assemble the whole of their effective battle fleet at Hawaii and improvise an advanced base at Wake Island, whence they could either demonstrate off the Japanese coast or make a bold attempt to recapture Guam.

The former alternative might, or might not, bring about an action with the main Japanese fleet, though it is hardly to be expected that the Japanese would needlessly hazard the tremendous advantage they had won. Moreover, a stay of any length in Japanese waters would expose the American fleet to intensive submarine attack, the perils of which would be aggravated by the necessity of steaming at moderate speed in order to economize fuel. If the fleet were to cruise at high speeds, its coal and oil would soon be exhausted, and it would be compelled to return to Wake Island for fresh supplies, since the operation of coaling or oiling at sea would be attended with too much risk for submarine-infested waters. Wake Island, however, would afford no secure refuge for a large fleet. Not only are its anchorage facilities limited but it is situated only a few hundred miles north of the Marshall Islands, which would probably become the rendezvous of Japanese submarines. In these circumstances heavy losses would be almost inevitable; nor must it be forgotten that serious damage from torpedo, mine, or other cause would be equivalent to a total loss, in view of the absence of docks and repairing plant. Any attempt to tow a damaged ship from Wake to Honolulu, a distance of 2,010 miles, would be hopeless if enemy submarines were about. For the same reason a fleet action fought in the western Pacific would be a most perilous adventure for the Americans, who, being without a proper base, could reckon with certainty on losing every disabled ship.

There is more to the same effect. I call attention to this statement:

Failing authentic data it is impossible to say whether either fleet has a marked superiority in gunnery. All that can be said with confidence is that the shooting on both sides would be excellent, since both navies devote ceaseless attention to the gunnery branch. Japanese officers affirm, however, that battle practice in their navy has been developed by methods more scientific and effective than those in vogue in the American service. Be this as it may, it is a fact that the Japanese Navy, as early as 1915, was using fire-control instruments, which were not introduced into the American Navy until 1917 or later.

The Americans would be sorely handicapped by their want of fast cruisers and aircraft carriers, and would suffer a further disadvantage by reason of their inferior speed. It is most improbable that the action would be fought to a finish, for the Japanese could gain nothing by exposing themselves to the crushing preponderance of the American broadsides. They would be more likely to use their superior speed as a means of breaking off the action when it suited them, leaving their destroyers, submarines, and torpedo planes to harass the enemy and administer the coup de grace to his disabled ships. For the Americans any result short of a complete and overwhelming victory would be tantamount to defeat, for the reasons already propounded; and the Japanese could be trusted to employ tactics which would rule out the chance of such a decisive issue to the encounter.

And so forth.

Mr. President, I am aware that I am talking to a Senate weary of this question, most of which have retired to the cloak-rooms to engage in the profounder discussion of matters that are considered there. Nevertheless, I commend the attention of those who patiently remain to this lesson which comes out of what I have just read. As the matter stands to-day, without any treaty, we have the unlimited right to fortify the Philippines; we have the unlimited right to fortify Guam; we have the unlimited right to fortify Wake Island. With these points fortified we can defend the Philippines. With these unlimited rights standing as they are now we can, if we want to, preserve our control in the Philippine Islands. We can, moreover, preserve and protect our merchant ships by impregnable bases; and in the event of war with Japan, using the island of Guam as our advance point, we can recede our ships at Guam, we can repair them under the guns of our fortresses, and we can move from that point to the protection of the Philippines, and from the Philippines we can attack Japan itself. If we sign this treaty and the other treaties, we can do none of those things. To treat this as a light and inconsequential question is not the part of statesmen or of men who think for their country.

There are two views, and I am not quarreling with those who differ from me; but that this is a question of the greatest gravity will not be doubted by any man except one who is ignorant of the question.

Now I am going to answer the question of my friend from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. He asks what difference it makes whether Japan holds the mandate over these islands or whether she does not hold the mandate.

I want to reduce that question to a practical application. I am going to assume that Japan will do to us what she did to Korea, what she did to China, what she did to Russia—namely, to attack at the time best suiting her purposes and without giving us any notice.

Why, Mr. President, in the case of the Russian War, Russian statesmen and Japanese statesmen were sitting together at a table apparently as friendly as was the mutual admiration society recently dissolved at Washington. While they were sitting there Japan was mobilizing her fleet to strike, and when she had her fleet all in position she withdrew from the conference, and I think it was within five hours after that that the battle was on in the Pacific. If these islands were neutralized, then the moment Japan proceeded to land a single soldier on any of them we would have notice that something of a menacing character was transpiring; but if these islands are under the Japanese flag and Japanese protection she can, according to the authority I have just read, establish fortifications of importance in two weeks' time. She has complete control of all the governmental machinery, of the telegraph, of means of communication, and she could, in a case such as I am speaking of, land a vessel or two at each of the important islands she desired to fortify, take one or two batteries of cannon from those vessels which she would carry over, plant them in advantageous positions, command the ports of everyone of those islands, and it could be done before the United States dreamed of what was going on. It could be done so secretly and so thoroughly that we would find that there might be a hundred places where Japanese vessels, if pursued by our fleet, could take refuge beneath guns, not of forts—for it is no longer necessary to build forts—but beneath guns that have been planted back of earthworks, secreted in forests, hidden behind rocks, just as the Turks at the Dardanelles with a few cannon taken from aboard vessels of war, and I think principally from one German vessel, were able within a few days' time to plant those cannon in positions so that they commanded the Dardanelles.

So in this instance these islands could be rendered impregnable, and having been placed in that condition, would constitute the points of protection for the Japanese fleet, and with the Marshall Islands, granted under this mandate, and the Caroline Islands and the other islands placed under the mandate of Japan, Japan will be moved to a point practically as close to the Hawaiian Islands as is the coast of America itself.

There is already in the Hawaiian Islands a population which, I think, is nearly three-fifths Japanese. How many of them are soldiers of Japan I can not answer, but that there are enough to constitute a great nucleus of strength, if not an overwhelming force, is not doubted by those who have studied the situation.

If, therefore, we ratify these treaties we yield to Japan an advantage in case of war which will probably render her impregnable against any attack we can make and which will give her places so near the Hawaiian Islands that she can seriously menace them and probably take them.

To deal with this question as a light or trivial question is not in keeping with the interests of this country. I make no complaint of Senators absenting themselves from this Chamber when I speak, but they have absented themselves during the entire consideration of this treaty. They are paying no attention to this public business. Many of them do not know the simple A, B, C's of the proposition which I have presented, not because they are lacking in intelligence but because they are lacking in interest.

No information has been furnished to the public by the Committee on Foreign Relations with reference to this important matter. It is brought forward with the idea that if it is pushed through it can be proclaimed to our people as a great achievement of this administration. Unfortunately its evils will not be appreciated or its dangers known, probably, until it is too late to repair the injury done.

When we vote for this treaty, we should at the same time vote to abandon the Philippines, because we can not defend the Philippines. If I am answered that we are protected by a treaty, I answer that no treaty has ever protected any nation. Whenever a nation gets ready to break her faith, and desires to go to war, she of course finds occasion immediately to disregard a treaty.

There was a treaty between several nations for the inviolability of Belgium. It amounted to nothing when a nation got ready to invade Belgium. There were treaties protecting commerce upon the seas. They amounted to nothing when both England and Germany saw fit to invade the provisions of those treaties and of international law.

There was a treaty between the United States and Prussia, afterwards made applicable to Germany, which bound Germany, in case of war between it and any other country, to permit our commerce to go unmolested, and to treat our nationals even in the event of war practically the same as when we were at peace, and we were bound in the same way. Yet when the war came on we seized German property in the United States, and Germany seized American property in Germany.

When nations go to war treaties cease to exist. Therefore, there is no protection in this treaty, any more than there is in any treaty between two countries that they will remain at peace and have regard for each other's rights. The ordinary treaty, such as we have always had, is not changed in its character, its effect, or its importance, by anything which has happened here in the city of Washington, unless the view is taken that some of these treaties have united several powers, and that the other powers will insist upon the enforcement of the treaties, and that with their ships and their men they will enforce those treaties.

If that is the case, then we will be left to rely, in this instance, upon France and England taking our view and coming to our assistance to compel Japan to keep the peace with us.

If those be the terms of this treaty, then bear in mind that it has another aspect. If its powers can be invoked and if the united forces of the other parties to the treaty can be brought forward to sustain us in any controversy we may have with Japan, by the same reasoning those powers and forces can be united with Japan against us in the event the other powers decide that Japan is right and we are wrong. If that be the construction, then we will be submitting the vital interests of the United States, by treaty, to the arbitrament of three foreign nations, and at least two of those foreign nations are closely united in interests and have been bound together—aye, all three have been bound together—by secret treaties in the past, and those treaties may well still remain.

We therefore come to this position, that we are by this treaty ratifying and confirming the title of Japan to that vast group of islands lying in the north Pacific, which, in my opinion, will nearly double her influence and her power and which will enable her from some of them to attack Russia and to drag us into a war with Russia; but that is a question I want to discuss at a different time and as a separate proposition. It is enough now to know that we are about to ratify the title of Japan to islands which practically control and dominate the waters of the Pacific, particularly those parts of the waters which are contiguous to the coast of Asia.

Yet Senators who stood on this floor and inveighed against these very policies, Senators who protested that these questions should not be submitted to a general council of the nations of the world, are now supinely yielding control to the only country in the world with which it is believed by most people we have any reason to expect trouble.

There is no use in more than stating a question of this kind. I repeat, I make no complaint because I talk to empty benches. That could be attributed to personal reasons—personal incapacity on my part to state the case interestingly—but no matter who rises to discuss these treaties the same situation exists. We are confronted by an indifference that is appalling—by a total lack of interest—and I unhesitatingly say by an almost total lack of knowledge.

My own view is that these treaties should have been brought before the Foreign Relations Committee, and that before they ever were reported out the best naval experts should have been called there at public hearings, and the best military experts also called, and that their testimony should have been given, so that the people of this country might have understood the issue that is being presented. That has not been done. It is a question of rushing these treaties through to conclusion, getting them over with, and then going to the country and saying, "We did some wonderful things." I regret the situation more than I can express in words. I regret this determined attitude to force them through.

Mr. President, that is all I want to say on this particular treaty, except that it seems to me that if mooted questions arise, many of them will be referred to the League of Nations for settlement, the very thing which the distinguished Senator who leads the fight for these treaties protested against for 18 months.

This mandate, it is recited, is pursuant to the treaty of Versailles giving authority "to administer the groups of former German islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator, in accordance with the following provisions," and they are then recited. It is recited in the treaty that—

Considering that the United States did not ratify the treaty of Versailles and did not participate in the agreement respecting the aforesaid mandate:

Desiring to reach a definite understanding with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the aforesaid islands, and in particular the island of Yap, have resolved to conclude a convention for that purpose, and to that end have named as their plenipotentiaries—

Then followed the articles of the treaty. It is my judgment that the combination of the preamble and the recitation with the articles leaves the case so that the very tribunals which the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge] denounced will have the ultimate decision of important questions here.

We may ratify the treaty—I presume it will be ratified—we may ratify the others, but I hope that no one who supports them will be found on the platform declaring that he did the country a great service in preventing us from entering entangling alliances and that an American treaty has been proclaimed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to article 2 of the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Missouri has concluded and no other Senator desires to take the floor at this time—

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. I ask leave to present an amendment which I intend to offer later on. I ask that it may be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection it is so ordered. Mr. PITTMAN's amendment is, at the end of the third article, to change the period to a colon and to add the following proviso:

Provided further, That the United States shall be the exclusive judge as to whether the Government of Japan has maintained radiotelegraphic communication on the island of Yap as required in the foregoing proviso.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I merely wish to obtain recognition so that I may have the right to the floor to-morrow, if the Senator will yield for that purpose.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I expect to address the Senate to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION WITH CLOSED DOORS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in secret session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business with closed doors. After eight minutes spent in secret executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 13 minutes p. m.) the Senate in open executive session took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 1, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 28, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Spera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Spirit of the living God, Thou art the eternal source of all things good. Freely Thou dost bestow and only most gratefully may we accept. O come with us to-day and manifest Thy gracious favor and be our way, our truth, and life. Furnish us with the highest possible motive for self-improvement and inspire us to go on to the limit of all our powers in obedience to the urgent call of our country. All through our earthly lives be our rest in toil, our ease in pain, and always like an untold gladness about our hearthstones. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES OF CONGRESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I present a resolution and ask its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 48.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Tuesday, the 28th day of February, 1922, at 12.30 o'clock in the afternoon, for the purpose of receiving such communication as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

APPROPRIATION FOR THE EXECUTIVE AND SUNDRY INDEPENDENT BUREAUS, ETC.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 9981) with Senate amendments, that the Senate amendments be disagreed to and a conference requested, and the conferees on behalf of the House be appointed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for immediate consideration (H. R. 9981), which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 9981. An act making appropriations for the Executive, and for sundry independent bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there are three amendments which were placed on the bill by the Senate, one of them relating to the office of the Comptroller General placing an appropriation of nearly two and one-half million dollars at the disposal of the Comptroller General in a lump sum. The gentleman knows that the House by a decisive vote placed that office on a statutory basis, and I would like very much to have the gentleman consent to bring that amendment back and give the House an opportunity to again vote on it, provided the Senate conferees refuse to yield.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That will be done.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, another amendment is an amendment relating to the Shipping Board. Gentlemen will remember by action of the House it was provided that not more than six employees of the Shipping Board should be paid a sum exceeding $11,000 per annum. The Senate amendment, as I gather it, provides for raising that number to 13. I would like to ask the gentleman if he will agree to bring that back so as to give the House an opportunity to pass upon it if the Senate conferees refuse to yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; I will agree to do that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, there is one other Senate amendment; I really think it is subject to a point of order in the House; and that is the provision in the bill which was stricken out in the House providing that the Shipping Board may use certain sums collected from the sales of materials, plants, and so forth, not exceeding $55,000,000. I think possibly the conferees would have no right under the rules of the House to agree to that proposition, but if they have that right I think the House ought to have an opportunity to vote on it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that I am perfectly willing that should be brought back, and I think perhaps we may be able to convince even him it will be well to leave that in.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk reported the conferees, as follows:

Mr. WOOD of Indiana, Mr. WASON, and Mr. HARRISON.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. The business in order to-day is the business of Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the roll of committees.

When the Clerk called the Committee on Civil Service Reform—

RETIREMENT OF EMPLOYEES IN CLASSIFIED SERVICE.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 3164).

The SPEAKER. That bill is on the Union Calendar. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3164), with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 3164, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3164) supplemental to an act entitled "An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes" (Public, No. 215, 66th Cong.), approved May 22, 1920.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, it is only a very short bill, and I think it should be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in carrying out the provisions of the act to which this act is a supplement, the words in section 6 thereof "all employees to whom this act applies" shall be construed to mean employees who have reached retirement age after a length of service sufficient to entitle them to an annuity.

All employees who have been heretofore separated from the service without annuity under authority of section 6 of said act shall be immediately reinstated in their former positions.

Such periods of separation shall be included in any computations of length of service to determine any annuities to which such reinstated employees may become entitled.

Sec. 2. That in carrying out the provisions in section 6 of the act to which this act is a supplement, dealing with the continuation of an employee in the civil service for a term not exceeding two years, whenever an employee eligible for retirement shall make application for such continuation in the civil service, it shall be the duty of the head of the department, branch, or independent office of the Government in which he or she is employed to secure from the immediate superior in the service of such applicant all efficiency ratings and other information on file respecting the character of the work of such applicant and shall also obtain from such immediate superior his opinion in writing with respect to the efficiency of the work performed by such applicant. Should such information show that the applicant has been efficient and competent during the two years next preceding his application for continuance in the civil service, the head of the department, branch, or independent office of the Government shall as of course certify to the United States Civil Service Commission that by reason of the efficiency and willingness of such applicant to remain in the civil service of the United States the continuance of such employee would be advantageous to the public service.

Any employee who has heretofore been retired under the provisions of section 6 of the act to which this act is a supplement, notwithstanding his or her application for continuance in the civil service under the provisions of said section, shall have the right within 90 days after the approval of this act to submit to the United States Civil Service Commission evidence in writing of his or her efficiency at the time of retirement. The United States Civil Service Commission shall thereupon summarily hear and determine the facts under such rules and regulations as it may prescribe. If such employee shall be found to have been efficient and competent during the two years next preceding his or her retirement, such employee shall be immediately reinstated in his or her former position, and shall continue therein as if such employee had been certified for such continuance in the first instance.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, this bill is to clarify and to provide for the details of administration of the civil service retirement act in certain particulars. It does not in any way alter the basic terms of the act or amend it in any particular, but in two points it makes clear the intent of Congress when it passed the original law and directs its application in the administration of the act.

Section 1 of the retirement act reads as follows:

That beginning at the expiration of 90 days next following the passage of this act, all employees in the classified civil service of the United States who have on that date, or shall have on any date thereafter, reached the age of 70 years and rendered at least 15 years of service computed as prescribed in section 3 of this act, shall be eligible for retirement on an annuity as provided in section 2 hereof.

Section 2 of the act prescribes the manner of computing the annuity. Section 3 provides for the manner of computing the length of service under the terms of the act, and so on. Section 6 provides:

That all employees to whom this act applies shall, upon expiration of 90 days next succeeding its passage, if of retirement age, or thereafter on arriving at retirement age as defined in section 1 hereof, be automatically separated from the service.

Now, we again refer to section 1. It says:

That all persons who shall have reached the age of 70 years and rendered at least 15 years of service computed as prescribed in section 3 of this act, shall be eligible for retirement on an annuity.

Now, the Comptroller of the Treasury, and I make no criticism of his ruling, has ruled, notwithstanding the reference to section 1 thereof, that the words in section 6 "that all employees to whom this act applies" shall mean all those employees in the classes to whom this retirement act applies who shall have reached the age of 70, or 65, or 62 in certain particular classes, and that they shall be automatically separated, whether they have served 15 years in the service or not, or whether they shall be entitled under the terms of this act to an annuity or not. This was manifestly not the intention of the framers and not the intention of Congress when it passed this act. It was not the intention to procure the dismissal from the service of any employee. Adequate opportunity for dismissing employees for cause exists, and is not in any way lessened by the retirement law, but this section of the law provides for the dismissal, without annuity, from the service of employees against whom no fault is found, under the construction placed upon it by the Comptroller of the Treasury.

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. For a question.

Mr. LANHAM. As I recall section 6 of this act, there were two—

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman withhold his question until a little later?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time, and I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 3164, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had concurred in the following resolution.

House concurrent resolution 48.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Tuesday, the 28th day of February, 1922, at 12.30 o'clock in the afternoon, for the purpose of receiving such communication as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

JOINT MEETING OF SENATE AND HOUSE.

At 12 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m. the members of the President's Cabinet entered the Hall and took seats at the left of the Speaker's rostrum.

At 12 o'clock and 26 minutes p. m. the Doorkeeper announced the Vice President of the United States and the Members of the United States Senate.

The Members of the House rose.

The Senate, preceded by the Vice President and by their Secretary and Sergeant at Arms, entered the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT took the chair at the right of the Speaker, and the Members of the Senate took the seats reserved for them.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker appoints as a committee on the part of the House to wait upon the President and conduct him to the Hall the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE], the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SCOTT], the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Vice President appoints on the part of the Senate the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

At 12.30 o'clock p. m. the President of the United States, escorted by the committee of Senators and Representatives, entered the Hall of the House, was announced by the Doorkeeper, and stood at the Clerk's desk, amid applause on the floor and in the galleries.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House, the President of the United States. [Applause.]

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT.

The PRESIDENT. Mr. Speaker, Vice President, and Members of the Congress, when addressing the Congress last December I reported to you the failure of the Executive to carry out the intent of certain features of the merchant marine act of 1920, notably the provision for the notice of cancellation of all commercial treaties which hindered our grant of discriminating duties on imports brought to our shores in American ships. There was no doubt about the high purpose of Congress to apply this proven practice to the upbuilding of our merchant marine. It had proven most effective in the earlier days of American shipping; it had, at various times, demonstrated its effectiveness in the upbuilding of commercial shipping for other nations.

The success of the earlier practice for this Republic came at a time when we had few treaties, when our commerce was little developed. Its superseding by reciprocity in shipping regulations, and the adoption of other methods of upbuilding merchant marines, through various forms of Government aid, and the century of negotiation of commercial treaties, all combined to develop a situation which should lead to endless embarrassment if we denounced our treaties. We should not only be quite alone in supporting a policy long since superseded through the growing intimacy of international relationships, but we should invite the disturbance of those cordial commercial relations which are the first requisite to the expansion of our commerce abroad.

Contemplating the readiness of Congress to grant a decreased duty on imports brought to our shores in American bottoms, and facing the embarrassments incident to readjustment of all treaty arrangements, it seemed desirable to find a way of applying suitable aid to our shipping, which the Congress clearly intended, and at the same time avoid the embarrassment of our trade relationships abroad.

The recommendation of to-day is based wholly on this commendable intent of Congress. The proposed aid of the Government to its merchant marine is to have its chief source in the duties collected on imports. Instead of applying the discriminating duty to the specific cargo, and thus encouraging only the inbound shipment, I propose that we shall collect all import duties, without discrimination as between American and foreign bottoms, and apply the heretofore proposed reduction to create a fund for the Government's aid to our merchant marine. By such a program we shall encourage not alone the carrying of inbound cargoes subject to our tariffs, but we shall strengthen American ships in the carrying of that greater inbound tonnage on which no duties are levied, and, more important than these, we shall equip our merchant marine to serve our outbound commerce, which is the measure of our eminence in foreign trade.

It is interesting to note, in connection with the heretofore proposed plan of discriminating tariffs on imports, carried to our shores in American bottoms, that the total value of all dutiable imports for 1920, in all vessels, was $1,985,865,000, while the cargoes admitted free of duty, on which no discrimination was possible, were valued at $3,115,958,000. The actual tonnage comparison is even more significant from the viewpoint of cargo carrying, because the dutiable cargoes measured, in round numbers, 10,000,000 tons, and the nondutiable cargoes were 25,000,000 tons. The larger employment, by two and a half times, was in nondutiable shipments.

Continued trade must be reciprocal. We can not long maintain sales where we do not buy. In the promotion of these exchanges we should have as much concern for the promotion of sales as for the facilitation of our purchases. There is not a record in all history of long-maintained eminence in export trade, except as the exporting nations developed their own carrying capacity.

No story of national development is more fascinating or so full of romance as that of developing capacity for the exchanges of commerce. Expanding civilization may be traced over the avenues of exchanging cargoes. No matter how materialistic it may sound, nations have developed for themselves and have influenced the world almost precisely as they have promoted their commerce. We need not refer to the armed conflicts which have been incident thereto. When commerce has been destroyed fading glories have attended.

It will avail nothing to attempt even the briefest résumé of our own efforts to reestablish that American importance in commerce carrying on the high seas which was recorded in the earlier days of the Republic. The aspiration is nation wide. The conflict between two schools of political thought heretofore has defeated all efforts to employ the governmental aid which other nations found advantageous while we held aloof, and the term "subsidy" and "subvention" were made more or less hateful to the American public. But the nation-wide desire to restore our merchant marine has outlived all defeats and every costly failure.

Eight years ago the aspiration found expression in a movement to have the Government sponsor an enterprise in which individual genius seemingly had failed. It would be difficult correctly to appraise the policy, because the World War put an end to all normal activities. Before we were involved our shipyards were suddenly turned to feverish and costly activities by the call of the allied powers for shipping, without which they could not hope to survive. American energies were applied to construction for others, as we had never dreamed of doing for ourselves. When we were later engaged we trebled and quadrupled the output on our own account. Allied resources were called upon to build to meet the destruction by submarine warfare, and ships were so essential that material for them was given priority over arms and munitions. There was the call for ships, and ships, and yet more ships, and we enlarged old yards and established new ones without counting the cost. We build madly, extravagantly, impractically, and yet miraculously, but we met a pressing need and performed a great service.

A people indifferent to the vital necessity of a merchant marine to the national defense ungrudgingly expended at five times the cost of normal construction and appropriated billions where millions had been denied before. We acquired vast tonnage. Some of it, much of it, is suited to the peace service of expanded commerce. Some of it, much of it, may be charged to the errors and extravagances of war-time anxiety and haste. The war program, and that completion of contracts which followed because such a course seemed best to those then charged with responsibility, gave us something more than 12,000,000 gross tonnage, not counting the folly of the wood construction, at a total outlay of approximately three and one-half billions of dollars.

We thus became possessed of the vehicles of a great merchant marine. Not all of it was practical for use in the transoceanic trades; little of it was built for the speed which gives the coveted class to outstanding service. But here was vast tonnage for cargo service; and the Government, in the exceptional call of commerce which immediately followed the war, sought the establishment of shipping lines in every direction calculated to enhance our foreign trade and further cement our friendly relations.

The movement lacked in most cases that inherent essential to success which is found in individual initiative. It was rather a Government experiment, where lines were established in high hope and little assurance, because the Public Treasury was to bear the burden. There was the mere suggestion of private enterprise, inasmuch as allocations and charters were made under which private management was to share in profits and private interests were paid to make the experiment, though the Government was to bear all the losses. I forbear the detailed recital. The misadventure was so unfortunate that when the present administration came into responsibility the losses were approximately $16,000,000 a month, and to the cost of failure was added the humiliation of ships libeled in foreign ports.

In spite of all the later losses in operation, however, it is quite beyond question that our abundance of American tonnage was mainly responsible for our ability to share in the good fortunes of world trade during the two years immediately following the war. In all probability the losses we have sustained in our shipping activities were fully compensated to the American people in the saving of ocean freights in that period.

To-day we are possessed of vast tonnage, large and very costly experience, and the conviction of failure. It is fair to say that a mistaken policy was made more difficult by the unparalleled slump in shipping which came late in 1920 and prevailed throughout the year so recently closed. It was the inevitable reflex of the readjustments which follow a great war, and there were heavy losses in operations which had to be met by long-established and heretofore successful shipping lines, and ships built at top war costs took the slump in prices below the normal levels of peace.

But we have our ships, the second largest tonnage in the world, and we have the aspiration, aye, let me say, the determination, to establish a merchant marine commensurate with our commercial importance. [Applause.] Our problem is to turn the ships and our experience and aspirations into the effective development of an ocean-going shipping service, without which there can be no assurance of maintained commercial eminence, without which any future conflict at arms will send us building again, wildly and extravagantly, when the proper concern for this necessary agency of commerce in peace will be our guaranty of defense in case that peace is disturbed.

Out of the story of the making of great merchant marines and out of our own experience we ought to find the practical solution. Happily we are less provincial than we once were, happily we have come to know how inseparable are our varied interests. Nobody pretends any longer that shipping is a matter of concern only to the ports involved. Commerce on the seas is quite as vital to the great interior as it is to our coast territory, east, south, or west. Shipping is no more a sectional interest than is agriculture or manufacturing. No one of them can be prospered alone.

We have had a new manifestation of this broadened vision in the enthusiasm of the great Middle West for the proposed Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway, by which it is intended to connect the Great Lakes ports with the marts of the world. There is farseeing vision in the proposal [applause], and this great and commendable enterprise, deserving your favorable consideration, is inseparable from a great merchant marine.

What, then, is our problem? I bring to you the suggestions which have resulted from a comprehensive study which are recommended to me by every member of the United States Shipping Board. It is a program of direct and indirect aid to shipping to be conducted by private enterprise. It is proposed to apply generally the benefits which it was designed to derive from discriminating duties to all ships engaged in foreign commerce, with such limitation on remuneration as will challenge every charge of promoting special interests at public cost.

In lieu of discriminating duties on imports brought to us in American bottoms it is proposed to take 10 per cent of all duties collected on imports brought to us in American or foreign bottoms, and create therefrom a merchant marine fund. To this fund shall be added the tonnage charges, taxes, and fees imposed on vessels entering the ports of continental United States; also such sums as are payable to American vessels by the Post Office Department for the transportation by water of foreign mails, parcel posts excepted.

Out of this fund shall be paid the direct aid in the development and maintenance of an American merchant marine. The compensation shall be based on one-half of 1 cent for each gross ton of any vessel, regardless of speed, for each 100 miles traveled. When the speed is 13 knots or over, but less than 14, two-tenths of a cent on each gross ton shall be added; for 14 knots, three-tenths of a cent; for 15 knots, four-tenths of a cent; for 16 knots, five-tenths; for 17 knots, seven-tenths; for 18 knots, nine-tenths; for 19 knots, eleven-tenths; for 20 knots, thirteen-tenths shall be added to the basic rate. For 23 knots the maximum is reached at 2.6 cents for each gross ton per 100 miles traveled.

I will not attempt the details of requirements or limitations, save to say that all vessels thus remunerated shall carry the United States mails, except parcel post, free of cost, and that all such remuneration must end whenever the owner of any vessel or vessels shall have derived a net operating income in excess of 10 per cent per annum upon his actual investment, and thereafter the owner shall pay 50 per cent of such excess earnings to the merchant marine fund, until the full amount of subsidy previously received is returned to its source. In other words, it is proposed to encourage the shipping in foreign trade until the enterprise may earn 10 per cent on actual investment, whereupon the direct aid extended is to cease and the amount advanced is to be returned out of a division with the Government of profits in excess of that 10 per cent. The provision makes impossible the enrichment of any special interest at public expense, puts an end to the Government assumption of all losses, and leaves to private enterprise the prospective profits of successful management.

The cost of such a program probably will reach fifteen millions the first year, estimated on the largest possibilities of the present fleet. With larger reimbursement to high-speed vessels and the enlargement of the merchant marine to a capacity comparable with our commerce the total outlay may reach the limits of thirty millions, but it is confidently believed that the scale may in due time thereafter be turned, until the large reimbursements are restored to the Treasury. Even if we accept the extreme possibility—that we shall expend the maximum and no return will ever be made, which is to confess our inability to establish an American merchant marine—the expenditure would be vastly preferable to the present unfortunate situation, with our dependence on our competitors for the delivery of our products. Moreover, the cost for the entire year would be little more than the deficit heretofore encountered in two months during the experiment of the Government sponsoring the lines and guaranteeing the cost of their operation.

The proposed plan will supersede all postal subventions, postal compensations, and extra compensations, excepting parcel-post freights, all of which combined are fast growing to approximately five millions annually. It will ultimately take the Government out of a business which has been, and is now, excessively costly and wasteful and involving a loss in excess of the highest subsidy proposed. It will bring to shipping again that individual initiative which is the very soul of successful enterprise. It should enable the Government to liquidate its vast fleet to the highest possible advantage.

The making of a successful American merchant marine, which must face the stiffest possible competition by the fleets of the maritime nations, requires something more than the direct aid to which I have alluded. The direct aid proposed, even though it ultimately runs to $30,000,000 annually, is insufficient alone to offset the advantages of competing fleets. There are more than wage costs and working conditions and the higher costs of rationing, which no considerable American sentiment will consent to have lowered to competing standards.

The men who sail the seas under our flag must be permitted to stand erect in the fullness of American opportunity. There is the higher cost of construction, the larger investment, the higher cost of insurance outlay, even though the rate is the same. There are higher interest charges. Our problems in shipping are very much the same as are those of our industries ashore, and we should be as zealous in promoting the one as we are in protecting the other. We may and must aid indirectly as well as directly.

We need a favoring spirit, an awakened American pride, and an avowed American determination that we shall become, in the main, the carriers of our own commerce, in spite of all competition and all discouragements. With direct and indirect aid I bring to you a definite program. Those who oppose it ought, in all fairness, to propose an acceptable alternative. There can be no dispute about the end at which we are aiming.

Of the indirect aids there are many, practically all without draft upon the Public Treasury, and yet all highly helpful in promoting American shipping.

It is a simple thing—seemingly it ought not require the action of Congress—but American officials traveling on Government missions at Government expense ought to travel on American ships [applause], assuming that they afford suitable accommodations. If they do not afford the requisite accommodation on the main routes of world travel, the argument that we should upbuild is strongly emphasized.

I think we should discontinue, so far as practical, the transport services in the Army and Navy, and make our merchant and passenger ships the agents of service in peace as well as war.

We should make insurance available at no greater cost than is afforded the ships under competing flags, and we can and will make effective the spirit of section 28 of the Jones Act of 1920, providing for preferential rail and steamship rates on through shipments on American vessels. American railways must be brought into cooperation with American steamship lines. It is not in accord with either security or sound business practice to have our railways furthering the interests of foreign shipping lines, when the concord of American activities makes for common American good fortune. [Applause.]

Contemplating the competition to be met, there ought to be an amendment to the interstate commerce act which will permit railway systems to own and operate steamship lines engaged in other than coastwise trade. [Applause.] There is a measureless advantage in the longer shipments where rail and water transportation are coordinated, not alone in the service, but in the solicitation of cargoes which ever attends an expanding commerce.

We may further extend our long-established protection to our coastwise trade, which is quite in harmony with the policy of most maritime powers. There is authority now to include the Philippines in our coastwise trade, and we need only the establishment of proper facilities to justify the inclusion of our commerce with the islands in our coastwise provisions. The freedom of our continental markets is well worth such a favoring policy to American ships, whenever the facilities are suited to meet all requirements.

Other indirect aids will be found in the requirement that immigration shall join wherever it is found to be practical in aiding the merchant marine of our flag under which citizenship is to be sought [applause], and in the establishment of the merchant marine naval reserve. The remission of a proportion of income taxes is wholly compatible when the shipping enterprise is of direct Government concern, provided that such remission is applied to the cost of new ship construction.

Congress has already provided for a loan fund to encourage construction. It might well be made applicable to some special requirements in reconditioning.

It is also worth our consideration that, in view of suspended naval construction, the continued building of merchant ships is the one guaranty of a maintained shipbuilding industry, without which no nation may hope to hold a high place in the world of commerce or be assured of adequate defense.

A very effective indirect aid, a substitute for a discriminating duty which shall inure to the benefit of the American shipper, will be found in the proposed deduction on incomes, amounting to 5 per cent of the freight paid on cargoes carried in American bottoms. The benefits can have no geographical restrictions, and it offers its advantages to American exporters as well as those who engage in import trade.

Our existing ships should be sold at prices prevailing in the world market. I am not unmindful of the hesitancy to sacrifice the values to current price levels. We constructed at the top cost of war when necessity impelled, when the building resources of many nations were drawn upon to the limit to meet a great emergency. If there had come no depression, a return to approximate normal cost would have been inevitable. But the great slump in shipping has sent tonnage prices to the other extreme, not for America alone, but throughout the world.

If we held our ships to await the recovery we should only make more difficult our response to beckoning opportunity. One of the outstanding barriers to general readjustment is the tendency to await more favorable price conditions. In the widest view, the Nation will ultimately profit by selling now. We may end our losses in an enterprise for which we are not equipped, and which no other Government has successfully undertaken, and the low prices at which we must sell to-day will make a lower actual investment with which we deal in promoting permanent service.

If I were not deeply concerned with the upbuilding of our merchant marine I should nevertheless strongly urge Congress to facilitate the disposal of the vast tonnage acquired or constructed in the Great War emergency. The experiment we have made has been very costly. Much has been learned, to be sure, but the outstanding lesson is that the Government can not profitably manage our merchant shipping. The most fortunate changes in the personnel of management would still leave us struggling with a policy fundamentally wrong and practically impossible. [Applause.]

Having failed at such enormous cost, I bring you the proposal which contemplates the return to individual initiative and private enterprise, aided to a conservative success, wherein we are safeguarded against the promotion of private greed, and do not discourage the hope of profitable investment, which underlies all successful endeavor.

We have voiced our concern for the good fortunes of agriculture, and it is right that we should. We have long proclaimed our interest in manufacturing, which is thoroughly sound, and helped to make us what we are. In the evolution of railway transportation we have revealed the vital relationship of our rail transportation to both agriculture and commerce. We have been expending for many years large sums for deepened channels and better harbors and improved inland waterways, and much of it has found abundant return in enlarged commerce. But we have ignored our merchant marine. The World War revealed our weakness, our unpreparedness for defense in war, our unreadiness for self-reliance in peace.

It would seem as though transpiring events were combining to admonish us not to fail now to reassert ourselves. In the romantic days of wooden hulls and whitened sails and the sturdiest men of the sea we outsailed the world, and carried our own cargoes, revealed our flag to the marts of the world.

Up to the World War we were a debtor nation. Our obligations were held largely by the maritime powers. Apart from the advantages in carrying our commerce, they sought our shipments for the balances due to them. There is a different condition now. They are concerned with shipments to us, but not so interested in our shipments to them. It is our high purpose to continue our exchanges, both buying and selling, but we shall be surer of our selling, notably our foodstuffs, if we maintain facilities for their transportation.

Contemporaneous with the awakening, we have the proposal to carry our ocean-going facilities to the great "unsalted seas," which shall place the farms of the upper Mississippi Valley on a market way to the marts of the Old World. We should fail to adjust our vision to the possibilities if we halted in making for American eminence on the ocean highways now awaiting our return.

We have recently joined the great naval powers in a program which not only puts an end to costly competition in naval armament and reduces the naval forces of the world, but adds to the confidence in maintained peace. The relativity of strength among the powers would be wholly one of disappointing theory if ours is to be a merchant marine inadequate for the future. I do not care to stress it as a means of defense. The war and our enforced outlay have already stressed that point.

The merchant marine is universally recognized as the second line of naval defense. It is indispensable in the time of great national emergency. It is commendable to upbuild and maintain, because it is the highest agency of peace and amity, and bears no threat and incites no suspicion. And yet it is a supreme assurance, without which we should be unmindful of our safety and unheeding of our need to continued growth and maintained influence.

I am thinking of the merchant marine of peace. Commerce is inseparable from progress and attainment. Commerce and its handmaidens have wrought the greater intimacy among nations, which calls for understandings and guaranties of peace. However we work it out, whatever our adjustments are to promote international trade, it is inevitable that the hundred millions here, outstanding in genius and unrivaled in industry and incalculable in their resources, must be conspicuous in the world's exchanges. We can not hope to compete unless we carry, and our concord and our influence are sure to be measured by that unfailing standard which is found in a nation's merchant marine. [Great applause.]

At 1 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m. the President and the members of the Cabinet retired from the Hall of the House.

Thereupon the Vice President and the Members of the Senate returned to their Chamber.

The SPEAKER. The joint session of the two Houses is now adjourned.

REFERENCE OF THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the President's message just read be referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries and ordered printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that the President's message be referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries and ordered printed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

RETIREMENT OF EMPLOYEES IN THE CLASSIFIED CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3164.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3164. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The gentleman from Iowa will please take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3164, with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 3164, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3164) supplemental to an act entitled "An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes" (Public, No. 215, 66th Cong.), approved May 22, 1920.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I will just briefly make a résumé of what I said before the committee rose a short time ago with regard to the purpose of this bill, which is not intended to alter the provisions of the retirement law, but to clarify them in certain aspects, and to direct the manner of their administration.

As I said before, section 1 of the retirement law reads that "All employees in the classified civil service of the United States who * * * shall have reached the age of 70 years and rendered at least 15 years of service * * * shall be eligible for retirement on an annuity." That is section 1 of the act, and then it provides the classes to whom this act shall apply, and various sections provide the amount of annuity, and so forth.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield.

Mr. CLOUSE. I was just wondering whether this provision of the act referred to would embrace a clerk who had served 14 years and had arrived at the age of 62, where he was automatically retired, although he was physically able to perform his duties and had made his application to continue?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes. I was about to explain that section 6 of the act says that "all employees to whom this act shall apply shall, on reaching the retirement age as provided in section 1 of the retirement law, be automatically severed from the service." But section 1 of the retirement act, as I just read a moment ago, deals with all employees who have reached the age of 70 or 65 or 62 years, as the case may be, and rendered at least 15 years of service. Now, the Comptroller of the Treasury in a ruling construed the words in section 6 "to whom this act shall apply" to mean not those employees who had reached retirement age after 15 years' service, but construed it to mean all those who have reached retirement age, regardless of the length of service, which was not the intention of Congress when it wrote those words in the law.

Mr. CLOUSE. That is the point I was trying to get to, the ruling of the comptroller to the effect that when a civil-service employee reached the age of 62, for example, one who is employed in the rural mail service, notwithstanding his physical condition or his desire to continue in the service, was automatically retired, and, although he had served only 14 years, he could not be reinstated. Does that take care of that kind of a case?

Mr. LEHLBACH. It does.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. LANHAM. As I recall section 6 of the retirement act, it provided for two different periods of two years each, and if the employee reached the retirement age, if found physically able, he might, under certain circumstances, continue his employment. It seems the legislative intent in that regard was arbitrarily disregarded in the administration of the law.

Mr. LEHLBACH. That is true.

Mr. LANHAM. This bill, very properly, I think, provides for the reinstatement of those who were retired against the legislative intent. As to the man who now returns to work upon reinstatement, if this bill is enacted into law, will his two years begin to run from the time of his reinstatement or from the time of his retirement?

Mr. LEHLBACH. So far as computing his length of service is concerned, the time during which he was separated from the service will be counted in; but so far as compensation or anything of that sort is concerned, he will not be entitled to it.

Mr. LANHAM. He was entitled under the original act to remain for two years if physically able and efficient and upon proper certification thereof. If he is reinstated, should he not have the privilege of remaining two years after the time of his reinstatement?

Mr. LEHLBACH. He would be continued as from the time when his application should have been favorably considered. He will have the privilege of having his application favorably considered at the end of two years.

Mr. MANN. I understood when the bill was enacted that it required separation from the service when a man reached the highest age—72, or 64—unless he was retained for a two-year period. I understand the gentleman to say that that was not the intent of Congress?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I think it was not the intent of Congress, so far as I understand it and so far as I understood it at the time, that a person who simply reached the age fixed for retirement, but who was not by reason of length of service eligible for the annuity thereunder, should be affected by it.

Mr. MANN. Yes; I know all that; but—

Mr. LEHLBACH. I do not say that the construction of the comptroller is not justifiable by the language of the act. I am not criticizing him.

Mr. MANN. That is a moot question. Certainly there was nothing said on the floor of the House when that bill was before us to indicate that a man was not to be retired at the age of 70 because he had not been in the service long enough to get an annuity. I am sure of that.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that nothing was said on the floor here, nor was the suggestion made that this bill was to provide an additional method of separating people from the service except for retirement on an annuity.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; it was expressly stated, and that was one of the arguments in favor of the bill, that arbitrarily a man should be separated from the service when he reached the age of 70 unless he showed that he was efficient. The department did not have to show that he was inefficient. That was one of the purposes of the bill, to get rid of the older people in the service without any reflection upon them. However, I have no desire to insist.

Mr. LEHLBACH. In the vast majority of cases that would be absolutely so, because the maximum age limit for appointment to the great majority of jobs under the civil service is 45 years of age. Therefore, when a man reaches 60 he will have had 15 years of service, unless he entered the civil service in violation of the rule.

Mr. MANN. I believe when you make a mistake it is wise to acknowledge it without trying to say it is the fault of some one else. Now, I should like to ask the gentleman this question: These people who are reinstated, who have been out for a year or two, and who have the time that they were out counted, in order to give them the period of service to entitle them to retirement, do they contribute anything for the time they were out?

Mr. LEHLBACH. No; but they draw no salaries either for that time.

Mr. MANN. They draw no salaries, but they draw an annuity based upon contributions from the salaries of others. They will be in the Government service.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes; the years of separation will count in the period which is the basis for computation of the annuity.

Mr. MANN. But they make no contribution during that time.

Mr. LEHLBACH. They contribute no percentage of their salaries because they drew no salaries during the time they were separated from the service.

Mr. MANN. They could pay a percentage by having it deducted from the annuity. Suppose a man had been out 10 years, and should be, as you say, "immediately reinstated." I do not know what that means.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The reinstatement provision is entirely retroactive. It stops as soon as this bill becomes a law, because the bill does two things. It prevents such separations in the future and reinstates those who have been separated in the past. So as there will be no more such separations in the future, the reinstatement is entirely retroactive and can not go back further than August, 1920.

Mr. MANN. I wish to ask about section 2 of the bill. Supposing a man in the Postal Service has reached the age of retirement and he is separated from the service, notwithstanding his application to be retained. Under this he can be reinstated and go back to the position he held?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That means necessarily to fire somebody else out.

Mr. LEHLBACH. To put somebody else back where he was before. If he was in the service in a lesser capacity he goes back there.

Mr. MANN. Suppose the superintendent of a postal station goes out of the service and somebody else is promoted to be superintendent of that postal station. Under this bill the man who has been promoted is kicked back. There can not be two superintendents of one station.

Mr. LEHLBACH. No.

Mr. MANN. And the man who has been out goes back in. Is that correct?

Mr. LEHLBACH. That is correct. That point was considered, and it was thought that where there are two people, one of whom must be inconvenienced by reason of a mistake, the one who suffered under the mistake is not the one to be inconvenienced, but the man who profited by the mistake is the one to be inconvenienced.

Mr. MANN. This provision requires that the Civil Service Commission shall summarily hear and determine the facts where an application for reinstatement is made. Does that mean that the applicant has to come to Washington?

Mr. LEHLBACH. No; no more than when the Civil Service Commission is authorized to hold an examination do the persons taking the examination have to come to Washington.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, ordinarily a man takes a written examination. This is a requirement that the Civil Service Commission shall summarily hear the application.

Mr. LEHLBACH. They can hear it by depositions or otherwise.

Mr. MANN. Has this provision had the construction of the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I do not know how the Civil Service Commission will construe a law that is not yet enacted.

Mr. MANN. It is sometimes possible to obtain that information, and I merely inquired to know whether the committee had obtained it. Otherwise, of course, I am just as good a judge of what it means as my friend from New Jersey is.

Mr. LEHLBACH. There is no question about that.

Mr. MANN. And he is as good a judge as I am. Nobody will know just what it means unless it has been construed.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The intent of the language in stating that they may summarily hear and determine, under such rules and regulations as they may prescribe, was to make it so broad that the Civil Service Commission should be unhampered. It was intended that they might do it in any way they desired, and with as little formality as they desired.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will.

Mr. SNELL. How does this affect a man who was separated from the service on his own application, but who after he had been out a while decided that he would rather go back in?

Mr. LEHLBACH. It does not affect him at all.

Mr. MANN. Such a man can not get back?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Oh, no; not at all. While, theoretically, a man might have been appointed on his sixty-ninth birthday and separated from the service on his seventieth birthday and not have had the 15 years' service, yet as a practical matter those people who were separated at the age of 70, and postal employees and mechanics who were separated at the age of 65, and in the Railway Mail Service at 62, were people in the main who lacked possibly a month, or six months or so, of the prescribed minimum of 15 years which would entitle them to an annuity. That follows from the limitations of the maximum ages under which men can be appointed to the civil service. The cases that were brought before the committee when they gave the bill consideration were cases where people within one or three or six months of the minimum limit for annuity were separated from the service under the construction of the Comptroller of the Treasury, which, I will say to my friend from Illinois, as far as I am concerned I am willing to admit was a proper construction. I am not trying to put the blame on the comptroller; the fault was in drafting the bill and not in the construing of it by the comptroller; but it was not the intention of those who secured the passage of the measure at the time it passed.

Mr. SNELL. And that is one of the reasons why it is necessary to pass this measure?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Was it the intention of the committee that a man might go into the service at the age of 69 and serve 14 years?

Mr. LEHLBACH. It was not.

Mr. MANN. That is what this bill does.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The committee had some knowledge of the rules and regulations of the Civil Service Commission, and knew that they had to be passed upon by the civil service and could not get into the service over the age of 45.

Mr. MANN. Oh, lots of men have got appointed to a Government job and then covered into the classified service.

Mr. LEHLBACH. They ought not to.

Mr. MANN. I do not say that they ought to, but they have.

Mr. LEHLBACH. If these men are anywhere near the age of retirement after a service of one or two years and they reach the age and are no longer efficient, there is nothing in this act nor in the original retirement law that will continue them. All this does is to prevent a compulsory dismissal, and in the instance which the gentleman from Illinois points out the dismissal should take place, not by reason of the retirement law but on general principles.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, I am in favor of the bill, but when it comes to the dismissal of men for inefficiency on account of old age, what is the use? We carried for years a provision in the law, applying to all departments in Washington, requiring a dismissal of any superannuated employee of the Government, and there never was one separated from the service on that account, although all of the departments were reporting that they were overburdened with superannuated employees.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Even the man appointed after the age of 60 and becoming superannuated after he has given years to the service, it would entitle him to some consideration.

Mr. SNELL. Does this make it absolutely compulsory to dismiss persons after they have reached the age of retirement?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Unless certified by the head of the department that they are efficient and competent, and then they may continue for two years.

Mr. SNELL. But they can do that under the old law.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes; this does not change that; this only makes clear what was the intention of Congress—that when men are able to work they ought not to be compulsorily retired.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. How many employees will this measure apply to?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I have not the number; but as far as section 1 is concerned it will not affect probably more than 100 employees. They were in almost every instance under this strict construction separated without giving them an opportunity to round out the 15 years.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Under all the provisions of the bill there are not more than 100 involved?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Under section 1; and that is all I have been discussing so far.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. In the colloquy with the gentleman from New York in relation to compulsory retirement, as I understand it, as the law was passed by Congress there was no provision for compulsory retirement if the employee was physically and mentally able to carry on his duties in an efficient manner.

Mr. LEHLBACH. There was no intention of that sort, but by a perversion of the terms of the law there was a compulsory retirement injected into it.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. That was true of the Postmaster General.

Mr. LEHLBACH. And it was true of some other departments. Let me read from the testimony that came in under another matter. This statement was given by a supervisor in one of the ordnance plants in a navy yard in this country.

He says with regard to the retirement at the age of 65—and that is the age at which mechanics are retired. He says:

I will give a case of this at the plant. An officer in charge wanted to be just. He was just. I will give the officer credit for that. He was just. At that plant he allowed nobody to continue. It was justice to everybody at that plant.

That is the way this fat-head officer reasoned. He did not want to tell those who were inefficient that they must get out and allow the efficient to stay; so he said they must all get out.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. That is what the Postmaster General did.

Mr. LEHLBACH. He did. The statement goes on:

There was a man there, a wagon builder. It is hard to find them these days. This man has been back in the woods. He reached 65 last May, and had to retire. He had been only four years with the Government, but they could not find a man to take his place. They had a carpenter on that work, and he did the work, but he was not a wagon builder, and was not satisfactory. The superintendent said: "Old man Woodman is the best man I have got and the only man who knows that class of work."

Yet that man was retired, and we want to stop that sort of nonsense by this bill.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Do I understand that by this measure automatic or compulsory retirements will be done away with?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Section 6 of the original law provides that persons who make application for continuance in the active service, if they are found to be competent and efficient, may be so certified by the head of the department, and, with the approval of the Civil Service Commission be continued for a term not exceeding two years, and at the end of two years he or she may be by similar approval and certification continued for an additional term not exceeding two years, and so on.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. That was done by some of the department chiefs, but it was not done by the Postmaster General and one or two other heads of the executive departments.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Section 2 of the act under consideration provides that where such employee shall make application for continuance in the civil service it shall be the duty of the head of the department, branch, or independent office of the Government in which he or she is employed to secure from the immediate superior in the service of such applicant all efficiency ratings and other information on file respecting the character of the work of such applicants and shall also obtain from such immediate superior his opinion in writing with respect to the efficiency of the work performed by such applicants.

It further provides that should such information show that the applicant has been efficient and competent during the two years next preceding his application for continuance in the civil service, the head of the department shall, of course, certify to the United States Civil Service Commission that he or she is efficient. That was the intention of the act, but inasmuch as people have willfully or ignorantly disobeyed the law we have to supplement it by the passage of this act to show them how to apply it.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I agree with the gentleman that the construction by the Postmaster General in cases under my own observation, in my own city, was a perversion of the terms of the act, and men were retired who were perfectly able to continue in the service, to give the Government the very best of service, who are now out on pension, when they ought to be working for the Government and drawing no pension money whatsoever.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Section 2 further provides in this connection as follows:

An employee who has heretofore been retired under the provisions of section 6 of the act to which this act is a supplement, notwithstanding his or her application for continuance in the civil service under the provisions of said section, shall have the right within 90 days after the approval of this act to submit to the United States Civil Service Commission evidence in writing of his or her efficiency at the time of retirement.

"Evidence in writing" means some sort of a statement or the efficiency ratings during the two years before retirement. It does not mean their own opinion; it does not mean that everybody that has gone out shall bother the Civil Service Commission for reinstatement. It means those who in writing can submit a prima facie case, and if they are found to be efficient and competent and should have been retained they will be reinstated.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. What is going to be the situation in reference to the additional employees who had previously been substitutes, but who have been added to the regular roll, and who will find themselves displaced by this action?

Mr. LEHLBACH. As I said in answer to the same question put by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], of course, in only exceptional instances will it mean separation from the service for the new people. They will be absorbed in their department in some way or another, but if it should come to the extreme case which the gentleman suggests, the committee took this position, that where through wrongful act there are two who will be, by reason of its rectification, inconvenienced, the one to bear the inconvenience is the one who profited by the wrongful act and not the one who suffered because of it.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Almost a year and a half has passed since the act took effect.

Mr. LEHLBACH. It took effect, August 22, 1920.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Here is a man of retirement age, of 70 years, and a year and a half have elapsed and his physical condition may have changed, his mental condition may have changed. He may not be able to go back into his work and be as efficient. Yet his efficiency records, his showing, made at the time of retirement would indicate that he should continue. In what way has the committee protected the Government in that situation?

Mr. LEHLBACH. The basic act provides that notwithstanding the extension of the service, if in fact they do become inefficient by reason of age or for other cause, certificate or no certificate, they may be retired.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Does not the gentleman think some sort of provision should be made here to meet that situation, and if a person is given reinstatement for the reasons indicated, there should be some kind of a showing of his continued physical good health?

Mr. LEHLBACH. It was not deemed necessary to put that in the act for the reason, in the first place, if a person is no longer capable at the present time of doing work, it would be folly for him to make application for reinstatement on the basis that a year and a half ago he was capable of doing the work. Furthermore, the basic act, retirement law, provides that where a person is continued for a space of two years on such a certificate if during that period he becomes inefficient, he can be retired nevertheless, so that if he is as a matter of justice reinstated, he would be immediately retired.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Just to interrupt there. I rather think there is some force in what the gentleman from Minnesota says. I presume that the gentleman was referring to the reinstatement under section 1, was he not?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I am referring to reinstatement in cases where there has been compulsory retirement on reaching the age limit.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Notwithstanding the application for an efficiency certificate.

Mr. BLACK. While we are on that point, let me call the attention of the Chairman to the same thought that I had in mind. I was not present in the committee when this bill was reported out, because I was busy in another committee. I am in favor of the general idea of the bill. This section 1 gives the right of automatic reinstatement to all that class of employees who have been retired because of reaching the age, who are not entitled to annuity pay. I think they ought to be reinstated, provided they are physically able to perform the duties, but if in the passage of time that has taken place they have become incapacitated to perform these duties, I do not think they should be reinstated.

Mr. LEHLBACH. If the gentleman will permit, section 7 provides various things, and there is a semicolon, and the last five lines in section 7 of the retirement law itself applies to the entire act, and reads as follows:

But nothing contained in this act shall be construed to prevent the compulsory retirement of such employee when in the judgment of the head of the department, branch, or independent office in which he or she is employed such retirement would promote the best interests of the service.

Mr. BLACK. That is true, but we will automatically reinstate all of these employees and we will not give the head of the department any discretion in the matter at all, but I am perfectly willing that we pass this particular section because of the situation that exists, but I do have an opinion in the matter that it ought to be amended so that he or she must be able to show that he or she is physically qualified for performing the duties.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I want to ask the gentleman from Texas a question. In the case of a man who served 14 years and 9 months and was summarily dismissed, though there was abundant evidence that he was in good physical condition and perfectly able to continue in the duties of the office, that summary dismissal cuts him out of the annuity. The gentleman does not think that even if he were to-day physically able and would be reinstated so that the period of time which had elapsed and during which he might have the 15-year period could be attained, the gentleman is not opposed—

Mr. BLACK. No; I did not have those cases in mind.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I have a number of cases of that kind in my district, men who have served up to within a year's time, some of them within a month or two months' time, who were summarily dismissed; no recognition, a manifest injustice to those men.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I would like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey a question. In my district, the city of Richmond, Ind., is a railway mail terminus. On the Pennsylvania line running from there to Chicago there was a man who had been running for years as a railway mail clerk on said route, and one of the most expert there was on that line. He was in good health and in possession of all his faculties, and was arbitrarily dismissed by Postmaster General Burleson under the retirement law. The man did not want to be dismissed, but wanted to keep on with his work. As soon as he was discharged from the service he went out on a farm, shucked corn, and did all kinds of hard work, such as is usually done there, because he said that he did not want to lay down and quit. Now, the other day this man was in my office, and if I am not mistaken he went over to explain the matter to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I saw him.

Mr. ELLIOTT. As I understand this bill, it is designed to take care of that kind of a man if he is able to work and wants to get back into the service?

Mr. LEHLBACH. The bill provides he shall lay evidence in writing before the Civil Service Commission that he was in fact efficient and competent at the time he was summarily retired, and if upon hearing the case the Civil Service Commission determines that he was competent and is still competent to do the work he goes back.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will.

Mr. KETCHAM. Do the provisions of this bill cover cases of rural mail carriers who have been subject to the interpretation—

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM (continuing). The same as described by the gentleman who just preceded me?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. They may be reinstated upon a proper showing?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes. A very large number of cases which are sought to be corrected were in the Post Office Department, but there were cases in other departments also.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will.

Mr. DOWELL. Assuming that he was in proper condition to perform the work at the time of his retirement and is not at the present time, he then would not be returned to his place? Is that correct?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Technically he might be entitled to return to his place, but if in fact he could not do the work he would come under the provisions of section 7 of the retirement law which I read, which says in no case shall he be retained on the roll if he is no longer able to do the work.

Mr. DOWELL. As I understand, if two years ago he was able to perform this work and was retired, but at the present time he is not able to perform his work, he would be reinstated to the point of being retired at the present time under the same terms as though he had served to the time when he was disabled?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield right there? Suppose a man was forced out of the service after serving 14 years and 9 months. He would not be entitled to the annuity. Now, he gets reinstated, and immediately upon reinstatement it is ascertained that he is not able to go ahead with his duties. Now, he is again forced out of the service, this time because of his condition. Does he get his annuity?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Sure, because the time he was separated counts.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. So the time that he was actually forced out of the service would be to his credit?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I may read to the gentleman this provision:

Such periods of separation shall be included in any computations of length of service to determine any annuities to which such reinstated employees may become entitled.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The latter part of section 1?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes. That was all thought of.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I was not present in the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service at the time this bill was considered, on account of having other committee work to do with the Banking and Currency Committee at that time, but I think the bill in the main carries out the purpose of the original retirement act. I was not a supporter of the act to retire Government employees and pay them an annuity. I am not now an advocate of the idea. But, nevertheless, I am willing and anxious to assist in the correct administration of the law after it has been passed.

Now, there are two sections in this bill, and each of them deals with a different situation. Section 1 deals with that class of employees who have reached the retirement age, but have not been in the service a sufficient length of time to entitle them to receive an annuity at the time of retirement. It seems that a certain number of employees have been retired, have been deprived of their employment, and have not only lost their position, with its salary, but also have received no annuity. I dare say that a certain number of these employees, at least, were entirely competent to continue efficiently the performance of their duties, and therefore I think in such cases it is but an act of justice that they should be restored to their former positions. And that is the purpose of section 1. Though, I do believe, and I suggest this for the consideration of the House, as well as the chairman of the committee, that a proviso should be added on page 2, after the words "positions," on line 2:

Provided, That no such employee shall be restored to active duty in a department unless he is physically able to discharge the duties of the position in which he was serving at the time he was retired.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The difficulty with that is that there is no distinction known among employees on the rolls of those on active and passive duty. And to preclude, as this might preclude, the reinstatement at all of a man who was retired in 1920, and who at this time may not be efficient and competent, would be to lose to him the ability, in a few months, which would be counted in under the last paragraph of section 1, to get the annuity to which he would be entitled.

Mr. BLACK. I understand the apparent injustice which the gentleman has in mind to protect, and it was not to that particular class of cases that I expected to direct my amendment.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will suggest to the gentleman this, as possibly it will meet his views and will also take care of the situation which he says I have in mind:

But that no person so reinstated shall continue upon the rolls unless he is able to physically perform the duties of the position.

That would take care of your proposition.

Mr. BLACK. That would do it all right, and so far as I am concerned I am quite willing to accept it. I am quite sure that some of these employees who have been retired are no longer competent to render active service, and for that reason I do not think they should be put back into the departments.

Mr. CLOUSE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. CLOUSE. The last three lines of section 2, on page 3, provide that under certain conditions these men who have been previously retired shall be reinstated to their former positions. I was just wondering what will become of the men who now hold such positions. For instance, a man might have come to Washington and passed a civil-service examination, and purchased himself a small home, in the hope that he would be continued in the service. Now he gives up the position and will have to leave everything in Washington behind him. How would that take care of that class of men?

Mr. BLACK. There is no way to do it that I know of, if we pass this bill. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] answered that argument by saying if Congress determines to do what seems justice to these employees who have been retired without an opportunity to show that they are still efficient, the department in which they are reinstated would have, of course, to provide the positions so as to let them back, and that would involve the discharge of the employees who had taken their places. At least in some cases.

Mr. CLOUSE. The last employee is also an innocent man, because he took the position in good faith.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Just a word, if I may trespass on the gentleman's time. The situation which the gentleman from Tennessee states is, of course, theoretically possible, but the great number of people who are in the service now supplanting those who have been dropped will be absorbed in some other way.

Mr. BLACK. Then another thing I will suggest right at this point. I suggest that there will be a good many cases where these employees will not care to come back into the service. For instance, the only one that I know of in my congressional district who will be affected by this legislation was a rural carrier, who, while he had reached the age of 65, was a very vigorous, energetic, healthy man, and he had not been in the service a sufficient length of time to give him annuity pay, but was retired under the order of the Post Office Department. I saw him some time ago when I was in Texas, and I called his attention to this pending bill. He said, "Well, I was very sorry to leave the service at the time I left it, but since then I have gone into other employment and will not seek reinstatement, even though the opportunity is offered." Undoubtedly there will be other cases of that sort.

That brings me to section 2 of the bill. I think it was clearly the intent of Congress to give every efficient, healthy, energetic employee an opportunity to stay in the service even though he had reached the retirement age, provided he could prove his efficiency, and the Post Office Department—I am not criticizing it, although I did differ with their view of the matter—took the view that whenever a rural carrier reached the age of 65 or a railway mail clerk reached the age of 62 or a postal clerk reached the age of 70 he should be automatically separated from the service. Now, I do not take that view of the matter. I opposed the retirement law originally upon the theory that a real workman, a man of energy, a man of thrift, wants to work, and I do not want to deprive a man of the opportunity so long as he is able to "carry on."

That was one of the reasons why I originally opposed the retirement law. Automatically separating a man from the service without giving him an opportunity to show that he is able to discharge the duties of his position is not fair and is liable to work great injustice. Therefore I favor section 2 of this bill. But I think section 1 should be protected in the manner that I have indicated, and if the gentleman from New Jersey will offer an amendment I am very sure the House will be glad to accept it.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Should not the same provision accompany the last paragraph of section 2?

Mr. BLACK. I do not think it would be so necessary in that section, because section 2 does not provide automatic reinstatement. A man's efficiency and all that has to be investigated, and the burden will be upon him to show that he is efficient.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I can not agree as to that.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman may take the view that the language of the bill makes his reinstatement rest entirely upon his past record.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. If it should be found that he is efficient and competent, and so forth, such employee shall be immediately reinstated.

Mr. BLACK. I will be frank to say that it might be well to put the amendment I have suggested in both places.

Mr. LEHLBACH. It is already in the law. Let me read the proviso. Section 7 of the retirement law contains this proviso:

Provided, however, That in the case of an employee who is to be continued in the civil service of the United States beyond the retirement age as provided in section 6 hereof, he or she may make application for retirement at any time within such period of continuance in the service; but nothing contained in this act shall be construed to prevent the compulsory retirement of such employee when in the judgment of the head of the department, branch, or independent office in which he or she is employed such retirement would promote the best interests of the service.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I know; but the gentleman is talking about getting rid of a man after you reinstate him. My point is that you ought not to reinstate him unless his physical condition is such that he can perform his work.

Mr. BLACK. I think that suggestion is sound. We are not providing that these applications for reinstatement shall be filed with the department that originally retired these employees, but with the Civil Service Commission, and the commission is the authority which is to order the reinstatement, and I think the employee ought to be compelled to show as a prerequisite that he is physically able to engage in active employment.

Mr. MANN. Suppose that he does not want to go back to work. Is he to be required to?

Mr. BLACK. We are discussing section 2 at this time. The gentleman is now referring to section 1.

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. COUGHLIN. How long a time will such an individual have to determine whether or not he will go back?

Mr. BLACK. I believe 90 days is provided in the bill.

Mr. Chairman I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Jersey desire to use any of his time?

Mr. LEHLBACH. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas desire to use any of his time?

Mr. BLACK. I do not know of any who desire time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in carrying out the provisions of the act to which this act is a supplement, the words in section 6 thereof "all employees to whom this act applies" shall be construed to mean employees who have reached retirement age after a length of service sufficient to entitle them to an annuity.

All employees who have been heretofore separated from the service without annuity under authority of section 6 of said act shall be immediately reinstated in their former positions.

Such periods of separation shall be included in any computations of length of service to determine any annuities to which such reinstated employees may become entitled.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN: Page 1, line 3, insert after the word "act" the following: "Entitled 'An act for the retirement of employees in the classified service, and for other purposes,' approved May 22, 1920."

Mr. MANN. I should have made that "classified civil service."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN: Amend page 1, line 3, by inserting after the word "act" the following: "Entitled 'An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes,' approved May 22, 1920."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to be heard on his amendment?

Mr. MANN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LEHLBACH: Page 2, line 2, after the word "positions," insert: "Provided, That after such reinstatement if any such employee is not able to perform his work in an efficient manner he or she shall be immediately separated from the service."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Jersey desire to be heard on his amendment?

Mr. LEHLBACH. This amendment is in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], a member of the committee, and I think it meets with his approval.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. CLOUSE. Would not that amendment have this effect: Suppose the employee is physically unable to resume his former position. What provision in this act is there that would grant him the benefits of the annuity?

Mr. LEHLBACH. The last paragraph in the first section. If he should have been separated in June, 1920, and been out and reinstated and then separated from the service because of his inefficiency, such separation should be included in the computation of the length of his service so as to give him the annuity. That would include the year and a half during which time he was out, to make up the 15 years requirement.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from New Jersey if it is the intention to have the employee reinstated by the terms of the act "immediately," or is it the intention to allow the person employing him to have the opportunity to reinstate him. When does it apply?

Mr. LEHLBACH. That might be in the middle of a month. People are employed every day in the week.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. He might be in California at the time. This says "immediately" under the terms of the act.

Mr. MANN. "Immediately" is a term somewhat indefinite. It may be to-day or two years from now.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Would anything further have to be done after the passage of this act?

Mr. MANN. Of course, he would have to be reinstated by order. This is a permission and a direction.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think it is permissive.

Mr. DOWELL. In determining the question of his reinstatement will they take into consideration his physical condition at the present time, or will it be under the same terms as those under which he originally entered the service?

Mr. MANN. This is a direction to reinstate him in his former job.

Mr. DOWELL. Provided—

Mr. MANN. There is no "provided" about it. The "provided" is after he is reinstated, that if he is inefficient he may be dismissed. There is no "provided" about his reinstatement. Of course, I do not think they could reinstate a man who would not take the job.

Mr. DOWELL. The Civil Service Commission have no opinion about his reinstatement?

Mr. MANN. They have nothing to do with it.

Mr. DOWELL. All they have to do is with his retention in the service?

Mr. LEHLBACH. No; they have nothing to do with that.

Mr. MANN. The Civil Service Commission have nothing to do with it except that if he should be discharged on the ground that he was inefficient and he should claim that it was for political reasons, they would have an investigation.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Just the same as in any other case.

Mr. DOWELL. Just the same as in the case of the separation from the service of any civil-service employee?

Mr. MANN. Yes; excepting us. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That in carrying out the provisions in section 6 of the act to which this act is a supplement, dealing with the continuation of an employee in the civil service for a term not exceeding two years, whenever an employee eligible for retirement shall make application for such continuation in the civil service it shall be the duty of the head of the department, branch, or independent office of the Government in which he or she is employed to secure from the immediate superior in the service of such applicant all efficiency ratings and other information on file respecting the character of the work of such applicant and shall also obtain from such immediate superior his opinion in writing with respect to the efficiency of the work performed by such applicant. Should such information show that the applicant has been efficient and competent during the two years next preceding his application for continuance in the civil service, the head of the department, branch, or independent office of the Government shall as of course certify to the United States Civil Service Commission that by reason of the efficiency and willingness of such applicant to remain in the civil service of the United States the continuance of such employee would be advantageous to the public service.

Any employee who has heretofore been retired under the provisions of section 6 of the act to which this act is a supplement, notwithstanding his or her application for continuance in the civil service under the provisions of said section, shall have the right within 90 days after the approval of this act to submit to the United States Civil Service Commission evidence in writing of his or her efficiency at the time of retirement. The United States Civil Service Commission shall thereupon summarily hear and determine the facts under such rules and regulations as it may prescribe. If such employee shall be found to have been efficient and competent during the two years next preceding his or her retirement, such employee shall be immediately reinstated in his or her former position and shall continue therein as if such employee had been certified for such continuance in the first instance.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LEHLBACH: Page 3, line 15, after the word "retirement," insert the words "and is now efficient and competent."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Jersey desire to discuss his amendment?

Mr. LEHLBACH. No. The provision will read:

If such employee shall be found to have been efficient and competent during the two years next preceding his or her retirement and is now efficient and competent, such employee shall be immediately reinstated.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. What the gentleman desires to do is to provide that if he is competent and efficient at the time of reinstatement he shall be reinstated; but the word "now" in a bill means at the time of the passage of the act.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will change the word "now" to "then."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the gentleman's amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LEHLBACH: Page 3, line 15, after the word "retirement," insert the words "and is then efficient and competent."

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I want to know if that would cover this sort of a case, in which I happen to be interested. Under the original law under which these employees were retired when they arrived at the age of 65—

Mr. LEHLBACH. Employees of the Postal Service and mechanics; yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. That law provided that if application were made by a person who had arrived at that age, within 60 days after the passage of the act, he might be continued for two years longer, as I recall, if he was physically fit. Well, of course not a great many people of the United States knew within 60 days after the law was passed that there was such a law. Certainly there were a great many who did not know it. The particular rural letter carrier whom I have in mind received his first information of the passage of the law on the fifty-ninth day after it was passed. That was the first information the postmaster had that any such law had passed. One of these printed forms sent out by the Postmaster General's office reached the postmaster 59 days after the passage of the act. He immediately notified this rural letter carrier, who as soon as he could undertook to make his application, but the 60 days got by before he could do it, and I think he made his application on the sixty-first or sixty-second day. He had been in the service 14 years. There was no question of his physical fitness to continue on the job. He was dropped. Of course he did not get his application in within the 60 days. He was physically fit according to the certification of the postmaster and of the people on the route, and I know that fact of my own personal knowledge, but he was dropped. He did not get in his application within the 60 days, and he had been on the rolls 14 years.

Mr. MANN. He could get back under the first section of this act.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. He could not get back under the law as it has been heretofore. That, of course, was an injustice.

Mr. LEHLBACH. He would get back under the first section, whether he had made such an application or not.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. That is what I want to know. I hope he will get back.

Mr. BLACK. I would like to suggest this to the gentleman from New Jersey. If his amendment is adopted the section as amended will read:

If such employee shall be found to have been efficient and competent during the two years next preceding his or her retirement and is then competent—

And so on. I am not sure that the interpretation of the word "then" would be very clear, and I am wondering whether it would not be better to say "and is at the time of the hearing of his application for reinstatement efficient and competent."

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will accept that as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DOWELL. Should it not be at the time of his making application?

Mr. LEHLBACH. No; at the time of the hearing. That is when the order is to be entered.

Mr. DOWELL. That might be indefinite. His application will show the date.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Supposing he was all right at the time of the application but was not all right at the time of the hearing?

Mr. BLACK. I offer my amendment as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers a substitute which the clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. BLACK for the amendment offered by Mr. LEHLBACH: After the word "retirement" in line 15, page 3, insert the following language: "And is at the time of the hearing of his application for reinstatement efficient and competent."

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. May I inquire of the gentleman from Texas if the examination should go beyond the date of the application—in other words, when the application is submitted would the civil service hold him up until they had written to find out whether he is in a proper condition or not? Should not this refer to the date when he makes his application, for that is the time the evidence is submitted?

Mr. BLACK. I think there may be some force in the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. DOWELL. In other words, there is no way to definitely ascertain what the condition may be after he submits the final evidence.

Mr. LEHLBACH. On the other hand, you might say that at the date of the application the Civil Service Commission has no knowledge of the present physical condition, but at the time of the hearing they can ascertain it.

Mr. DOWELL. The Civil Service Commission would assume that he is in proper condition if he makes a showing at a certain date.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman from Iowa has in his mind what occurred to me, and that is whether the Civil Service Commission being ready to reinstate a man would have to send out a messenger or a wire to find out whether he is in proper condition.

Mr. BLACK. I am willing to substitute the words "filing application for reinstatement." Mr. Chairman, I ask that my amendment be modified so as to strike out the word "hearing" and insert "filing," so that it will read "and is at the time of the filing of his application for reinstatement efficient and competent."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to modify his substitute; is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman from Texas a question. I want to understand this: An employee is discharged from the service, although he is efficient and competent he was arbitrarily dropped under the proceedings of section 6. He is competent to discharge the duties of the position which he held at the time. Now, this bill as it is drawn seeks to rectify that wrong. If, as a matter of fact, he was efficient when arbitrarily dropped, he can establish that fact and be reinstated. The gentleman's amendment is going to change that altogether. He may have been entirely efficient and no objection to him when he was arbitrarily dropped. He has been off two years, and you do not intend to right the wrong if that was the theory.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I think I know what the gentleman has in his mind. This amendment of the gentleman from Texas modifying my amendment applies only to those who were refused a two-year certificate; it does not apply to those who lacked a year or so of the minimum of 15 years. They will be reinstated without any question as to their present status.

Mr. BLACK. May I add that section 2 refers only to those employees who have been retired with an annuity and drawing an annuity. Therefore I think if they come into the service they should show that they are efficient and competent.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, we want to get this correct, and the gentleman from Illinois suggests that my amendment be modified again so that it will read "and is at the time of the making of his application efficient and competent." I move to strike out the word "filing" and substituting the words "making his application."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to modify his substitute as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] for the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

The question was taken, and the substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I offer a new amendment as a new section.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the bill insert a new section as follows:

"Sec. 3. That any employee entitled to the benefits of the act to which this act is a supplement, who, prior to the passage of this act, has been continued in the service without the approval of the Civil Service Commission as provided in section 6 thereof, or, who has been reemployed in the civil service subsequent to retirement, shall be entitled to credit for such subsequent service and to receive salary, pay, or compensation therefor at the regular rates, but shall not be entitled to annuity covering the same time; and this act shall operate as a direction to the Commissioner of Pensions to remove suspension of annuity in all such cases, and shall be warrant for the proper fiscal officer of the Government to make payment or adjustment of salary, pay, or compensation earned by such employee."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, when the retirement law went into effect and the employees were retired thereunder, some of them by refusal of certificates for continuation in the service and some who were retired without any protest on their part, it was found that in certain instances their services were desirable, either when the work piled up in the department or offices in which they had previously been employed, or because of lack of experienced substitutes. So, in some instances these people were continued after the age of retirement was reached, and in other instances they were reemployed. After this state of affairs had continued for a while, a ruling by the Treasury was made that it was illegal to continue in the service those who under the terms of the retirement law were to be separated under section 6, and that it was equally illegal to reemploy them, and notwithstanding the fact that they had actually performed the work for which they were reemployed or continued in employment, they could not be paid the salaries.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Did we not pass the Merrill Moores bill?

Mr. LEHLBACH. We passed it in the House, but it was not passed in the Senate. That was in the last Congress. At this session of Congress we passed a rider on the postal appropriation bill, or on some postal bill, taking care of such employees in the Postal Service, but that left everyone else in the civil service high and dry, and this is to take care of the rest.

Mr. MANN. This carries out the provisions of the Merrill Moores bill?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I remember at the time we had the Merrill Moores amendment under consideration I opposed it for the reason that the language as I construed it would entitle the employee to both his salary pay and his annuity pay. The language which has been read from the desk in the gentleman's amendment makes it quite clear that there is to be no annuity pay as long as the man draws the salary.

Mr. LEHLBACH. That is explicitly provided for.

Mr. BLACK. I am wondering what the purpose of the latter part of the language of the amendment is, which provides that the right of the Commissioner of the Bureau of Pensions to continue to pay annuity shall not be suspended.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The Treasury further ruled that if a man had received the wages, for which he worked, and which the Treasury said were illegally paid to him, because he had no right to be employed, that that money should be recovered back to the Treasury by suspending the payments of the annuities to which he was entitled until the illegal payments have been made up.

Mr. BLACK. And the gentleman is quite clear in his own mind that the language is so safeguarded that there will be no possibility for these employees to draw salary and annuity at the same time?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Absolutely. It is so explicitly stated in the act.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. NOLAN. I rise to ask the chairman of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service if his committee has given any consideration to cases of men in the unclassified service and whether any effort is being made to bring them within the provisions of this retirement law.

Mr. LEHLBACH. There have been suggestions made to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service that the act be amended so as to embrace classes of employees other than those originally in the act. The original retirement law provides that the President by Executive order may extend the provisions of the act to any or all classes of employees to whom he may deem it expedient. It seems to us as a committee that the proper procedure for the classes of employees who seek to be covered under this law is to make out a case to the Executive and not seek to have the law amended.

Mr. NOLAN. In line with that suggestion, I think the matter has been called to the attention of the President; but it seems to me that a committee in this House, sitting in session considering amendments to the retirement law, ought to themselves try to correct any errors or abuses in the original act and take care of a large number of the deserving cases where men have worked for 30 or 35 years in the mechanical establishments and in the customs service, who now find themselves, because they were not included in this act in the first place, about to be singled out of all of the Federal employees and not given the benefits of retirement. The Civil Service Commission has a number of cases before it where men had to go out, and they have called it to the attention of the President. He has had it under consideration for something like 90 days.

I know that because at a recent visit to the White House the subject was brought up and the President wanted to know the opinions of people about it. It seems to me that the committee, regardless of the fact that the President has that authority, ought to give consideration where there is a large number of cases of men about to be put out without any retirement pay at all, and when you are amending the original act it seems to me the committee could very well give consideration to these very meritorious instances.

Mr. LEHLBACH. We are not amending the act, in the first place. We are passing an act here directing how certain provisions shall be construed and how certain provisions in the act shall be administered. We are leaving the body of the act intact. We are not changing a comma or a syllable in the retirement law in this bill that we are passing this afternoon. It is much more difficult to get the action of both houses of Congress than to have the President act. There were bills introduced to take care of certain classes of laborers in public buildings. It was found on examination of the proposed bill that it would work to the detriment of the administration of the civil service in lines that were never considered by the introducers of the bill, but which were called to our attention by the Civil Service Commission, and it was by reason of these difficulties that arose from time to time when attempting to consider that subject that it was deemed to be a matter to be dealt with by the Executive under the particular powers granted in the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 3164, supplemental to an act entitled "An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes," approved May 22, 1920, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to. The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LEHLBACH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Has the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service any further bills?

Mr. LEHLBACH. It has no further bills which it desires to call up at the present time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will continue the call of committees.

When the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress was called,

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this committee be passed, to be called after the next committee on the list that has business, because of the absence of the author of the resolution under consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the committee be passed now and may be called next after the committee that has the next business. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not think we ought to single out this committee for that kind of treatment when we have gone through Calendar Wednesday call with other committees losing their chance by not being ready. I think committees that are about to be reached under the Calendar Wednesday call ought to be ready to have something to present or to take their chances when they are reached again on the regular call. I do not think we should make an exception of this committee, and I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Then, if there is objection, the committee may proceed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I call up House joint resolution 252.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska calls up the House joint resolution which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 252) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present. If we are going to have a constitutional amendment discussed, we ought to have some people here to know what it is about.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order there is no quorum present. It is quite clear there is no quorum present.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Almon	Edmonds	Longworth	Robertson

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 287 Members answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. Has the gentleman from Nebraska called this resolution up by authority of the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress?

The SPEAKER. The Chair assumes he has.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman did not so state.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, the committee directed the report to be brought in its call and I was acting with that understanding.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, since the author of this resolution is not here, to refer it to the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the bill be referred back to the committee. Is there objection?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, in view of the absence of the author of the resolution, who was very desirous that he should be present when the resolution was called up, I ask unanimous consent to pass as indicated a few moments ago. I shall offer no objection to the unanimous-consent request presented by my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Brooks], a member of the committee. In the absence of any other objection I would consent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it seems to me that this constitutional amendment is something that should be considered by the Judiciary Committee. I do not know what the custom of the House has been, but certainly it is a very unusual proceeding for a legislative body to pass a constitutional amendment that has not been at least considered by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

CONSTRUCTION CHARGES ON FEDERAL IRRIGATION PROJECTS.

Mr. KINKAID (when the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands was called). Mr. Speaker, I am authorized by the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands to call up for consideration the bill H. R. 9606.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9606) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, to extend the time for payment of construction charges on reclamation projects, units of reclamation projects, or in individual cases, for not exceeding three years, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Accordingly, the House automatically resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9606, with Mr. Hicks in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9606, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9606) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, to extend the time for payment of construction charges on reclamation projects, units of reclamation projects, or in individual cases, for not exceeding three years, and for other purposes.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the bill is short, and I think it should be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.
The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, after due investigation, to extend the time for payments of all construction, operation, and maintenance charges falling due and payable on December 1 of the years 1921, 1922, and 1923, upon Government reclamation projects, units of such projects, or in individual cases, to water-right applicants or entrymen who are in arrears for more than one calendar year for the payment of any charge for construction, operation, and maintenance, notwithstanding the provisions of section 6 of the act of August 13, 1914 (38 Stats. L. p. 686): Provided, That no penalties shall accrue upon such payments so extended during the period of time such payments may be extended hereunder.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That where an individual water user or individual applicant for a water right under a Federal irrigation project constructed or being constructed under the act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stats., p. 388), or any act amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, is unable to pay any construction charge due and payable in the year 1922 or prior thereto, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to extend the date of payment of any such charge for a period not to exceed one year from December 31, 1922: Provided, That the applicant for the extension shall first show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior by a detailed verified statement of his assets and liabilities, an actual inability to make payment at the time the application is made and an apparent ability to meet the deferred charge when the extension expires; also in cases where water for irrigation is available, that the applicant is a landowner or entryman whose land against which the charge has accrued is being actually cultivated: Provided further, That similar relief in whole or in part may be extended by the Secretary of the Interior to a legally organized group of water users of a project, upon presentation of a sufficient number of individual showings made in accordance with the foregoing proviso to satisfy the Secretary of the Interior that such extension is necessary: And provided further, That each charge so extended shall draw interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from its due date in lieu of any penalty that may now be provided by law, but in case such charge is not paid at the end of such extension period, any penalty that would have been applicable save for such extension, shall attach from the date the charge was originally due the same as if no extension had been granted.

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized in his discretion after due investigation, to furnish irrigation water on Federal irrigation projects during the irrigation season of 1922 to landowners or entrymen who are in arrears for more than one calendar year in the payment of any operation and maintenance or construction charge, notwithstanding the provisions of section 6 of the act of August 13, 1914 (38 Stats., p. 686): Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to relieve any beneficiary hereunder from payments due or penalties thereon required by said act: Provided further, That the relief provided by this section shall be extended only to a landowner or entryman whose land against which the charges have accrued is actually being cultivated."

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, relief is asked by way of an extension of time to make installment payments on construction charges by water users, due to the Government under Government reclamation projects. It also asks, further, for relief from the payment of the current expenses known as operation and maintenance charges, or, abbreviated, known as O. and M. charges.

The provisions of the bill are very conservative considering the character of the relief sought. Demand has been made on a number of projects for an extension of time for three years, and this bill so provides. Other bills ask for an extension of time for three years, and a bill in the Senate asks for an extension of time for three years. But this bill was referred to the Secretary of the Interior for his advice. The Secretary, I should say, having returned from a several weeks' tour over the irrigation States of the West, took this bill for consideration after he had become advised, in many instances, by personal inspection of projects, and incidentally meeting many representing other projects which he did not visit. After a very careful consideration the Secretary of the Interior wrote a letter to our committee recommending the amendment which has been read to you. The amendment restricts the relief to one year's time. There is but one year's extension allowed in the amendment which the committee will ask the House to adopt.

Now, the bill does not provide for blanket relief for irrigation projects as a whole, or for each project, but provides for relief in individual cases, relief for the owner of one farm unit singly, and the bill requires that application be made singly by the individual water user and owner of the farm unit. He is required to make an inventory, as it were, of his assets, also of his liabilities, and disclose fully his inability to make payment of operation charges at this time, and in addition thereto he is required to show that it is probable, with the resources which he possesses, at the end of one year, when the extended time expires, to then meet his obligations promptly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKAID. I yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I wanted to ask the gentleman, although he may be coming to it, about the meaning of the language in the second proviso. I am reading, beginning at the top of page 3:

That similar relief in whole or in part may be extended by the Secretary of the Interior to a legally organized group of water users.

The gentleman has spoken of the individual water users. What is the meaning of a legalized "group" of water users?

Mr. KINKAID. I will say to the gentleman that the word "group" was given very careful attention by all the friends of irrigation, and the friends of irrigation who wished to be conservative, because they wished to preserve in its fullest integrity the national irrigation law, to the end that its popularity may not be diminished, but that reclamation may be advanced and extended. For that reason great care was taken not to so provide that relief would be granted to any individual where he was not entitled to it, but as to some of the projects, the legal relation of the project to the Government is such that the Government is not permitted to deal with the individual water user direct, but must deal with the project as a whole, and then leave it to the project itself to deal with the individual water user. Therefore the word "group" was provided to cover such cases as that, and another case or two, without going into details. But even in those cases of a group, where they construe the relations to be such as to permit granting relief to a group, they will nevertheless require that it be proven that inability of a large percentage of those composing the group actually exists, and then if relief be granted in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, that percentage of inability only will be granted an extension of time, and in no case will a group be given consideration except it is a legal group, as construed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. May I ask the gentleman, further, if the word "group" is in the present reclamation law? Has it a well-defined and well-accepted meaning?

Mr. KINKAID. No. And for that reason it was given a great deal of attention by the committee and by the legal advisers of the Reclamation Service and by the friends of irrigation. However, the hearings show expressly that the word "group" is to be applied where there was a contract back of it, like a project in Arizona, where the relation is such that they must deal with the project as a whole, as a corporation, as it were, having many stockholders, and then the project will itself deal with the individual stockholder. But relief will only be granted to the extent of the percentage of inability shown to exist by the showing of the condition of a sufficient number of individual water users. There is only a small percentage of delinquencies on all the projects, considered as a whole. At the same time, if it is only two or three of the very small and newest projects whose delinquencies are comparatively high, their delinquencies aggregate a small amount.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 10 minutes. He wanted to be notified.

Mr. KINKAID. I will yield to myself another five minutes.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKAID. I yield for a question.

Mr. SNELL. Have we ever passed legislation like this before?

Mr. KINKAID. Not as conservative as this; but relief legislation has been passed before. This is the most conservative of any of the relief bills that have come before Congress where water users have asked for relief.

Mr. SNELL. There have been several of a similar nature, have there not?

Mr. KINKAID. Yes; there have been two or three instances. One was last year, approved May 20, 1921, I believe, where the delinquent water users were allowed to receive water. Without this legislation they would have been unable to irrigate and grow their crops last year.

Mr. SNELL. In some cases outside of those instances they have been granted water even if they were delinquent in their payments?

Mr. KINKAID. Perhaps it has been done sometimes, but never by authority of law.

Mr. SNELL. But it has been done?

Mr. KINKAID. I do not know for certain that it has.

Mr. SNELL. I understood from the department down here that there were considerable delinquents on all these projects, and that the money had come in much more slowly than they had expected to receive it; and still, I suppose, they were furnishing water all the time.

Mr. KINKAID. I do not know of any case, except that possibly there might be one out of a hundred sometimes who would get water even if he were delinquent. They may have been indulgent in some cases.

Mr. SNELL. On some of these projects up to June 30, 1921, only about 50 per cent for the year before had been paid. I was wondering how they would get water. That was the last report.

Mr. KINKAID. Pardon me; there has never been such a delinquency. According to the report, that has not been the case. The delinquents amounted to only, say, 15 per cent in 1918, and 14 per cent in 1919, and a higher per cent in 1920, and a little higher in 1921. Some of them went up almost to 40 per cent.

Mr. SNELL. The one Mr. Davis, the Director of the Reclamation Service, sent me for 1921 ran up to over 40 per cent; in fact, to nearly 50 per cent.

Mr. KINKAID. It was thirty-nine and some hundredths. That is the extreme. It is now lower. I have figured out or approximated as nearly as I can the percentages of present delinquencies. Of course, I could only approximate the rates. The figures show less than 25 per cent delinquency on both construction and operation and maintenance charges.

Mr. SNELL. How many projects will this apply to?

Mr. KINKAID. It will apply to all who need relief.

Mr. SNELL. I know that; but what percentage of them?

Mr. KINKAID. Oh, it will apply to something like one-half, I should say.

Mr. SNELL. Not over half?

Mr. KINKAID. Not over half, and a small fraction of each of those projects.

Mr. SNELL. What is the actual necessity of doing that at this time?

Mr. KINKAID. The actual necessity is to save the particular individuals who would otherwise go to the wall, and not raise crops this year. They would forfeit their rights, too.

Mr. SNELL. This is practically the same as if a man who could not pay his income tax could get an extension.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKAID. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. It is the same thing as the situation where a man owes something to a bank and he can not meet his obligation, and he goes to the banker and gets a 30-day extension. He is in a position to pay that back in 30 days. In this case these water users can get a crop.

Mr. SNELL. This is special legislation for the benefit of a lot of fellows on farms. There are a lot of other fellows who would like to get an extension on their income tax for next year. If you are going to do it with one, why not do it with all?

Mr. KINKAID. The Secretary of the Interior compares the situation in his letter to that of the farmers of Iowa, one of the richest States of the Union, and their dealings with their tenants, and suggests that it would be wise business management and economy for both the landlords of the Iowa farms and the tenants to give the tenants time to raise another crop and square up with the cash rent that they could not pay for the previous year.

Mr. SNELL. Is this the exact bill that the Secretary of the Interior sent up with his letter or report?

Mr. KINKAID. It is the exact bill.

Mr. SNELL. It is?

Mr. KINKAID. Yes, sir; it is the exact bill.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, permit me to suggest that there is a mighty big difference between a man paying an income tax and a farmer having water rights and desiring to get that water and without any income at all. A man paying an income tax can get along somehow, but the man without water can not plant a crop and can not get anything to eat, and his family will starve to death.

Mr. SNELL. If they have this water right they will raise a crop?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; if they get water.

Mr. SNELL. How much better off will they be next year?

Mr. LITTLE. They will raise another crop.

Mr. SNELL. And then you will give them another extension?

Mr. ROACH. They did not get anything for last year's work.

Mr. SNELL. Last year they got a big price. This is for water for 1920.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee and Mr. LONDON rose.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKAID. I will yield first to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understand the crop made last year was not worth anything under this administration. [Laughter.]

Mr. SNELL. I did not say anything about that.

Mr. LONDON. Speaking of legalized groups, or legally organized groups, the State of New York is not interested in the irrigation of arid lands, but it is interested in the irrigation of arid throats. [Laughter.] I would like to understand the construction of the term "legally organized groups." In some instances does the Government charge a particular sum to an individual user of water and in other cases the Government deals with a collective body?

Mr. KINKAID. Yes. That is the distinction.

Mr. LONDON. In other words, in one case they deal with the neighbors using the water and then they deal with the others as a collective body?

Mr. KINKAID. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has again expired.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be recognized for the other hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN. I shall not use all the time, because I am anxious that this bill shall pass the House to-day. The bill should pass, because in this case the United States happens to be the creditor, standing in the same relation as the banks which have loaned money to individuals engaged in agricultural pursuits in various parts of the United States. The same depression in prices has seriously affected the farmers under the United States reclamation projects just as farmers elsewhere in America have suffered from like causes. The reclamation project farmers have grown magnificent crops, but there has been no market, and for that reason they are at present unable to meet their financial obligations to the Government.

The bill first provides that relief may be extended to individual water users where after careful investigation the Secretary of the Interior is satisfied that they are unable to pay the charges assessed against them. On a majority of the Federal reclamation projects there exists a contractual relation between each water user and the Government whereby the individual water user promises to pay the sums due for construction and operation and maintenance year by year.

On seven of the projects the water users' association or irrigation district has entered into a contract with the United States whereby the association or district, as the case may be, has promised to pay the total amount due for construction. This legally organized body acts for all of the water users of the project and the Government has no individual contracts with them. It is therefore necessary for the bill to provide, as it does, that where organized groups exist, where as a matter of fact the Federal Government does not deal with individuals but with groups, that relief may be extended in whole or in part to any such group. It was explained to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands that the policy of the Secretary of the Interior would be to require the same individual showing from the members of a group, whether it be an irrigation district or a water users' association, as to their ability to pay.

For example, if there is $200,000 due the United States from a project organized in this manner, and it is ascertained by the Secretary that one half the water users are able to pay and the other half could not, then the Secretary of the Interior would say to the water users' association or irrigation district, "I will require you to pay one-half of the total sum that you owe to the United States, or $100,000." It will then be the duty of the association or district to collect from those of its members who are able to pay the amount necessary to satisfy the demand made by the Secretary. I make this explanation for the benefit of gentlemen who seem to be confused as to the meaning of the term "legally organized group of water users" as it appears in this bill.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman from Arizona yield for a question?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LONDON. In this case where the Government deals with the association, will the law provide that the association shall be held liable for the indebtedness of the individual members?

Mr. HAYDEN. This bill in no way changes existing law, which authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to enter into contracts with irrigation districts or water users' associations; that is, with groups of water users in their organized capacity. An irrigation district is a municipal corporation, and there is no way under the law, when a contract exists between the Secretary of the Interior and such a district, by which the Secretary can distinguish between the members of the group thus organized. But he can require individual showings to be made, and on that basis ascertain the ability of any particular group to pay. He can then insist that a lump sum shall be paid and that the officers of the organized group collect the money from those able to pay and turn it over to the United States.

Mr. LONDON. What I want to know is whether there is collective responsibility on the part of the association to the National Government?

Mr. HAYDEN. There is, and in my opinion the Federal Government has better security on every project where that condition exists. It is better to have the joint and several promise to pay of all the water users than it is to have individual obligations by contracts with each water user, because some of them may fail to pay and cause a loss to the Government.

In conclusion, let me say that by this bill we are seeking to do nothing more in the way of relief for the water users on the Federal reclamation projects than has been previously extended to other classes of our citizens. Congress has relieved the owners of mining claims by extending the time for doing annual assessment work. An act has been passed extending the time for the payment of grazing fees on the national forests. Through the revival of the War Finance Corporation credit has been extended to many lines of industry. In all of these cases it is expected that with improved business conditions each person benefited will ultimately do all that is required of him and fully discharge his obligations. And so it is in this instance, where the Secretary of the Interior is merely given discretion to extend the time for the payment of reclamation charges that can not now be collected.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, unless there is some one who wishes to be heard in opposition to the bill, I will ask the Clerk to read the bill.

Mr. MANN. I should like to have some time.

Mr. HAYDEN. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois such time as he may require. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. MANN. I do not know how much I desire to start with. I want to get some information. I notice by the report of the Secretary of the Interior on this bill that the maintenance charges of the irrigation projects are $2,500,000 a year and that the amount estimated to be received for the next fiscal year in the way of payments for maintenance charges is $1,850,000; in other words, that $650,000 will be expended by the Government for the operation of irrigation projects, which it is not expected to get back.

Mr. MONDELL. Where does the gentleman get that?

Mr. MANN. Do gentlemen think that is a correct statement?

Mr. HAYDEN. I do not understand that there is one dollar to be appropriated out of the reclamation fund for operation and maintenance that it is not expected will be returned. It may not be repaid this year in cases where water users are unable to pay, but the charge remains a lien against the land and must ultimately be paid in full.

Mr. KINKAID. As I understand it, the clause to which the gentleman from Illinois refers simply means that they would break about even if the payments were made. Nothing is to be lost and no liability is released by any provision of the bill, and all of it is required to be paid within one year, with interest at 6 per cent, and with interest at 12 per cent if not paid promptly at the expiration of the time limit.

Mr. MANN. Last year the cost of operations, which is, under the law, supposed to be paid wholly by the users of water, was $2,500,000. Of that we recovered $1,850,000, a loss up to date, as far as the Treasury is concerned, of $650,000.

Mr. MONDELL. Just where does the gentleman from Illinois get those figures?

Mr. MANN. On pages 3 and 4 in the report on this bill from the letter of the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary says that the construction charges last year were $1,380,000. I do not know how much the construction charges of all the Government projects would amount to, some gentleman probably can inform me.

Mr. MONDELL. The sum of $1,850,000 carried in the table at the foot of page 3 is an estimate of receipts—of receipts, I assume—

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken; it is not an estimate of receipts, it is a statement of the receipts for last year. The Secretary says "Allowing for these two items, last year's receipts as a basis for forecast, they are as follows." As I read it, it is a statement of what was collected last year, although I do not think it is very important.

Mr. MONDELL. I did not understand it so; I understood it to be a forecast, although it is true that there was quite a delinquency at the beginning of this year in the matter of maintenance charges.

Mr. MANN. How much have we spent for irrigation to date—$100,000,000?

Mr. KINKAID. One hundred and thirty million dollars.

Mr. MANN. And we got back 1 per cent of it last year.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. One million three hundred and eighty thousand dollars on construction charges were paid.

Mr. MANN. That is 1 per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. In addition, there was $1,000,000 paid last year on money borrowed from the Government. Two millions have been paid back, including the million that was paid last year on the $20,000,000 loan.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is better informed than I am; I am taking the statement of the Secretary of the Interior, who, I suppose, is reasonably well informed.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. If the gentleman will look on page 3 of the report, he will see that the last item represents the payment on loan of $1,000,000.

Mr. MANN. I supposed that was interest. The gentleman says that was principal and not interest?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. That was principal.

Mr. SNELL. Where does it show the receipt of interest?

Mr. MANN. It does not show it. However, that has nothing to do with the repayment for the construction charges. Here we have spent $130,000,000 that the law provides shall be repaid in installments. I suppose we have passed some recent laws postponing the payments. Whenever any of these items come due the people do not want to pay them and we extend the time. And I do not say that we ought not to.

Personally I am in favor of the passage of this bill, but there is the impression, and the gentlemen from irrigation districts know it better than I do, whether they admit it or not—there is an impression on the part of the large number of the people settled in the irrigation districts that they never will be expected to pay the bill back to the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The gentleman will admit that these good people have been disappointed in that expectation. With the exception of the extension of one year ago provided in the resolution of last May, no relief has been afforded.

Mr. MANN. I will not admit it, they are not paying it back. Here is $130,000,000 expended with the agreement to pay it back, and only 1 per cent of it was paid back last year.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. ARENTZ. The gentleman will recognize that there are a number of projects under construction which are not completed and the payments do not begin until the project is completed. For that reason only $1,380,000 has been paid, but that does not represent the amount that will be paid back. The $1,380,000 paid back represents the payments due on projects that are completed. The $130,000,000 will be paid back. I have lived in irrigation districts for a great number of years, and this is the first time that I ever heard that the people are expecting that these payments will not be made.

Mr. MANN. But they do not pay them.

Mr. ARENTZ. Everyone expects to make the payments. We are not a bunch of mendicants, we are going to pay the money due to the Government.

Mr. MANN. I have heard that statement in the Hall of the House before, but on the other hand I know a good many people out there are claiming to their Members of Congress that they ought not to be required to pay the money back.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman from Illinois is absolutely correct in his statement. About a year ago we had this same trouble about an irrigation scheme in the Indian Service. We passed an act to force the users of water to at least agree to pay for the water and the maintenance of operation for what they had had and for the future, if they got any more water. What was the result of that? The scheme has not been in operation a year and they are here now asking for a limitation of that language so that they need not pay. We found that 75 per cent of the users of water never expected to pay and do not expect to pay it now. So I think the gentleman from Illinois is absolutely right.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I would like to say that I represent a district in which there is a considerable number of irrigation projects, and I never have heard it mentioned by any man on an Indian project or a white man's project that they did not expect to pay.

Mr. KINKAID rose.

Mr. MANN. I will be very glad to yield to all of the other Members representing irrigation districts to make the same statement.

Mr. KINKAID. I want to add my testimonial. I have never learned of more than one water user who thought the liability of water users to the Government should be discharged and that they should go free. I know of just one instance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I want to call this fact to the attention of gentlemen representing irrigation States: There is a fund set apart for irrigation purposes. That comes from the sale of public lands, and so forth. When the money is expended for irrigation purposes, for construction charges, and is paid back, it goes back into that fund and can be used over again. When the original irrigation law was passed it was expected that these irrigation projects settled upon by people raising large crops upon them would be able to pay back the money into the fund, which would go to help finance some other irrigation project. The fact is that the men who have gotten their irrigation projects are hogs. They have kept the money; they do not refund it. There are many places in the West which ought to be irrigated. The men who have the money and who have their irrigation projects now are living upon the land, owning valuable land, and they ought to pay back the construction charges in order that that money may be used in some other irrigation project to help settle other people upon the land. We hear in all of these reports the statement made that here is a piece of land worth nothing as it stands and if we put water upon it it will be worth $100 or $150 or $200 an acre in producing crops.

Mr. SNYDER. Some of it is worth $1,000 an acre.

Mr. MANN. And yet these people say when they get upon this valuable land that they can not pay any portion or not much of the original construction charges, although the time of payment has been stretched out over a long period of years. If the land is worth what they say it is, and if they have any intention of repaying the money, they ought to help pay it back as it comes due. Land out in my State for farming purposes is worth from $100 to $500 and $600 an acre—not because the men who have it claim it is worth that, but because the men who live upon it raise crops which make it that valuable.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does the gentleman know how much has been paid back altogether of this $130,000,000 of construction charges?

Mr. MANN. I do not recall.

Mr. MONDELL. A little over $10,000,000.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. In how many years?

Mr. MONDELL. A little of $10,000,000 of construction charges.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. How many years?

Mr. MONDELL. During the period the work has been going on.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. What is that period?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The first project was finished about 10 years ago. The money that is being paid back comes from projects that have been finished. Only a few of the 26 projects have been finished.

Mr. MANN. Oh, let us be fair about it. We extended the time for the repayment of those charges some years ago, at a rate of interest which I think was 2 per cent, and people do not like to pay back money which draws only 2 per cent interest, if they can help it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes additional.

Mr. KINKAID. There was no interest imposed when we extended the time for 20 years. The gentleman from Illinois did propose that interest should be paid.

Mr. MANN. Oh, it was done without interest? Well, I guess I tried to have it draw at least 2 per cent. I probably thought they ought to be able to pay 2 per cent, but the gentlemen from these States who say they want it paid back defeated my proposition in order to get it paid back rapidly, I suppose.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois referred to the value of land in his State, ranging from two to four hundred per acre, and I assume that he thinks the farmers out there are prosperous at the present time. I had a letter a short time ago from a friend who owns 400 acres of land within 100 miles of Chicago. He said that he could not sell his crops this year for enough to pay the expense of managing his farm.

Mr. MANN. There are lots of people who say that; but the men who do the work are able to do it just the same, there or elsewhere. I hope you gentlemen will try to have this money paid back, because if you do not we will soon be met with a request to loan you more money for irrigation projects. You got $20,000,000 in addition to the original fund. You have not paid back much, if any, of it as yet, and I do not know whether you intend to do it or not.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. But the gentleman must remember that the $20,000,000 was not to be repaid until after the lapse of 10 years, at which time it was to be repaid at the rate of $1,000,000 per annum. It is being so repaid. Two million dollars has been repaid, and that is all that has fallen due. That is all we can do.

Mr. MANN. That is not all you can do by a long shot. You can pay back the construction charges and use that money over again in constructing new irrigation projects.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. That is not what we were discussing. I say that we are meeting the terms of the contract.

Mr. MANN. Nobody said anything against that.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I thought the gentleman said that little or nothing was being paid.

Mr. MANN. Little or nothing of the original charges are being paid. The $20,000,000 is taken out of a fund which, fortunately, you have not any control over under the law. If you had, we would postpone that.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. I suggest that Congress change the law so that the irrigation districts may bond themselves, sell the bonds, and make the district accountable to the bondholders rather than to the Government. If you would do that you will cut out all that sort of thing.

Mr. MANN. Well, they can do that now.

Mr. ARENTZ. They can not under the present law.

Mr. MANN. They did it so long and they failed so many times, and they have lost their courage. There were many projects all over the country under the Carey Act and under other acts where bonds were issued which they have not paid.

Mr. ARENTZ. I think that matter could be safeguarded.

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not know; if you can safeguard it you can get all the money you want.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. KINKAID. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] for his emphasis on the importance of repayment to the Government of irrigation costs, if the work is to go on. I am glad the gentleman from Illinois has assumed that the water users will meet the payments. Those of us who have been here from the beginning of this Federal irrigation development have repeatedly assured the Congress and the country that the money expended in reclamation development would in the main be repaid. There have been some disappointments in that regard, but in the main the people, except where conditions are very extraordinary and unusual, have lived up to our expectations and have met their obligations. There have been expended on reclamation projects up to this time in construction costs $128,000,000 in round figures. Of that there has been repaid of construction charges $10,677,250.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment—and up to last fall there was a comparatively small proportion of construction charges due and unpaid.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman does not mean that includes $25,000,000 that we have spent to be reimbursed on Indian projects?

Mr. MONDELL. I am not speaking of Indian projects.

Mr. SNYDER. We have spent that much in addition to this, none of which has been returned.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, of course, that is another story and a very long one, and one that I have not time to go into now.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment. Up to the recent past the construction charges have in the main been paid when due, and ten and a half million in all have been already repaid to the Treasury.

Now I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman does not agree with the director of the reclamation project when he says they have come up to expectation in paying, because when I was trying to get some definite information of what the projects had paid and what projects had not, he said that the return from those projects had been very disappointing to the department.

Mr. MONDELL. Recently, that is what I said.

Mr. SNELL. But he did not put the word "recently" in. I asked for the whole period of the reclamation projects and asked for definite information.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman will have no trouble in getting definite information if he will go to the records of the Reclamation Service, because they are full and complete.

Mr. SNELL. He gave me the information, but he said it was very disappointing, and the gentleman from Wyoming said it was up to expectations.

Mr. MONDELL. There are some projects on which unforeseen difficulties, unfavorable conditions that were not anticipated, have been encountered and where the payments have been slow; two or three of the projects where it has been necessary to adjust the contracts in an effort to improve conditions and begin over again. On one project in my State up to last fall all but about 2 per cent of the construction charges due had been paid, a repayment of a little over half a million dollars out of a total expenditure of approximately $6,000,000.

There is one project in Colorado where no construction payments have been made up to this time. That is due to the fact that when the time came, when the construction costs were to be fixed and determined under the law and when payments would be due, a former Secretary of the Interior had some doubts as to the validity of the contract that had been entered into, and in the face of threats on the part of a small minority of the water users he extended, on questionable authority in my opinion, for five years the payment of the construction charges and made a new contract with the water users. My understanding is that the present Secretary has recently issued or will very soon issue a statement of construction charges on that project and the repayments will begin. It has been an unhappy thing for the entire reclamation policy that it was necessary—if it was necessary—to relieve the people on that very considerable project of their construction charge repayments for this period.

Just now we are passing through a very trying period of agricultural conditions in this country. The cost of production advanced very rapidly during the war period and following the war, and then suddenly all farm products fell, in some cases below prewar prices and below the cost of production, leaving the farmers of the country in a very trying situation, confronted with a very serious condition of their affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I may have five minutes more.

Mr. KINKAID. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. The people on these projects were particularly embarrassed, because as pioneers in a new country they had been called upon to make very considerable investments for improvements, for the smoothing and leveling of their lands, the extension of their laterals, the irrigation of their fields. They have not only suffered from all the losses that have come to the farmer generally but have had in addition to that difficulties which always confront the pioneer, whether he be on irrigated or unirrigated land. For these reasons it is proposed to give the Secretary of the Interior authority to extend for one year the payments now due or to become due within the year. This extension is not altogether satisfactory to some of the people on some of the projects. They think there should be a longer extension. I want to say to the gentlemen here who are disposed to question even this measure of relief that they owe a vote of thanks to the men who come from the sections where these enterprises are being carried on because of the fact that, in the face of a very insistent demand from many of their people that a more liberal provision be made than is contained in this bill, they have united in their agreement that this is as much as should be asked at this time, and that in the long run it will be better for the people on the projects, certainly better for others to whom we hope to extend the benefits of irrigation, to limit the request for extensions of payments to those provided for in this bill. It is true that, judging from the expressions we have heard, no further extension would be approved.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment.

No general or blanket extension is granted. Provision is made that the settlers must make it very clear to the Secretary and to his agents that they are unable to meet their payments and that it is essential that this relief should be granted. There is no question but what this relief must be granted or some of the people on all of the projects or most of the projects will lose their homes and the investments they have made. We believe that there are some people on all of the projects that can pay, and we believe just as much as you do that those who can pay should pay. It is better for them in the long run that they should pay. It is certainly better for their neighbors, who hope for extension of irrigation development, that they should pay, and it is in keeping with the pledge that the West has made under this law.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. CARTER. These payments are to be made annually, are they not?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. That makes it become due at the same time the next annual payment is to become due. What is to become of the next annual payment? Is the settler expected to pay both these amounts at the same time?

Mr. MONDELL. It may be that on some of the projects it will be necessary to follow this relief with further relief in some cases.

These people will we hope be more prosperous another year than they have been the last year or two. We hope that those engaged in agriculture the country over will be more prosperous, and we anticipate a condition under which most of them will be able to meet their payments. But if we shall find at the end of the period fixed by this bill further relief is needed, the matter will of course be presented to the committee and to the Congress. I am of the opinion that it will be necessary to have a readjustment of costs and payments on many of the projects in order to reduce excessive costs and bring about a plan of payments that can be met even in unfavorable years. That is something that must be provided for in the early future.

Mr. DUNBAR. What are the principal products of Wyoming?

Mr. MONDELL. You mean on its irrigation projects?

Mr. DUNBAR. I mean of their soil.

Mr. MONDELL. Grass, alfalfa, sugar beets, potatoes, wheat, corn, rye—

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman please tell us the value of the agricultural products of the State?

Mr. MONDELL. I have not the figures at hand per acre; they are more than the value per acre of the products of many other States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk proceeded with and concluded the reading of the bill.

Also, the committee amendment was read.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota is recognized.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. The only trouble with this bill, as I see it, is that it does not go far enough in extending relief. Upon the irrigation project in my district this year the operation and maintenance charges and construction charges were approximately $6 per acre, while the total value of the crops amount to only about $11 per acre on the average. This is the gross value without deducting any part of the expense of producing the crops. It is very apparent that it is absolutely impossible for the people upon this project to pay the operation and maintenance charges, much less the construction charges, under present conditions.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SNELL. What is the crop there?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. They raise alfalfa mostly, and some potatoes, corn, wheat, and barley. They also raise hogs, cattle, and a few sheep. There has been no market, practically, for the alfalfa. Four or five dollars a ton was the most that could be obtained for it during the last year. There has been little local demand, and prohibitive freight rates have made it impossible to ship to outside markets. Personally, I think the bill should provide for an extension for a period of at least three years, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, so as to give these people an opportunity to work out and pay up.

I do not think there is any question but that this project will pay out in the end. There is a movement on foot now to go into the beet-sugar industry and to raise sugar beets, which will greatly increase the value of the crop per acre. Dairying is also being encouraged, and once established is bound to greatly improve conditions.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. What do they raise on these irrigated projects?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. On these irrigated projects in the United States they raise mostly alfalfa, sugar beets, hay, potatoes, and corn. At any rate, these are the principal crops on irrigated land out there in my State.

Mr. MANN. How much alfalfa to the acre is produced on an irrigated project?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. It will run all the way from 1½ to 2 tons an acre on the average on the Belle Fourche project.

Mr. MANN. Only that on an irrigated project? We raise many times that much on land that is not irrigated at all. What is the use of irrigating land if you can not do better than that?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. It takes a good many years to get it established.

Mr. MANN. Not if you have alfalfa.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I am not speaking of other projects except our own. Some fields are producing 4 or 5 tons per acre and some almost nothing. Some are practically drowned out by reason of seep water.

Mr. MANN. You cut the alfalfa three times a year, do you?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Twice a year; seldom three times.

Mr. MANN. You certainly ought to cut alfalfa and produce three crops a year. I have raised alfalfa. I suspect the gentleman has not.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. However, I shall not offer an amendment granting a period of three years in which to make payments at this time, because I realize that such an amendment would not meet with the favor of the committee and would be defeated in this House. But the bill is too limited in its scope. I think that this bill should provide for a spread over a series of years, so as to give the men on each project a fair opportunity to work out and pay the assessments. They can not do it in one year.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. What is the reason for this small yield? Is it because the irrigation project is defective, or is not completed, or because the soil is not adapted to the crop that they are trying to raise, or because the men do not work hard enough? What is the reason why there should be such a sparse crop on the land?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. The main reason lies in the seep water and lack of drainage. There must be drainage to make it a success. Where there is seep water in the ground which rises to the surface, the alkali comes up, and it will take some time to take the alkali out of the soil and get it in condition. This is local in character, however. Last year, in addition, a considerable area was hurt by the hail, and as a consequence the crop was small. The soil is good and the people on the project as a whole hard working and intelligent.

Mr. LITTLE. You are speaking of the average?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Average yield of crop; yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, irrigation in spots, where I have seen it, is very good. Large crops can be raised by irrigation where there is plenty of water and the weather helps. But many of these projects are located in sections where they are of a very doubtful character.

But this proposition of extending aid as desired here is a very bad precedent. In the Indian Service there are a great many irrigation projects. Some of them, very few of them, are reasonably satisfactory. Many of them ought never to have been constructed at all, and some of them, in addition to that, are of a doubtful nature.

But we have one, a prize project, known as "the Wahpeton," up in the district represented by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS], which has been a great success. It has been pointed out as the one which is the object lesson, the champion, the exemplar that we should examine for our information in regard to expending large amounts of money on other projects. But, lo and behold! on account of the period and area of extension, they are here now from that wonderful project asking us to reduce the amount that they are to pay annually per acre, which is $5, to $2.50, and they base their request on the assertion that the alfalfa crop was poor, or something else. There is not any more reason, to my mind, why an extension should be granted up there than there would be on any other business that has been properly conducted that had run into a temporarily serious period. They should be forced to carry their load the same as does everybody else.

Take this proposition: We are fixing a period of extension, and we are going to make fish of one and fowl of another. There are some projects which are able to pay. As to these, they can not pay.

What chance has the man who is raising the same crop, who is forced to pay, in competition with the fellow who has the same facilities, but is not forced to pay his taxes or his rental? Out in the oil country we have a situation which is very similar to this. In Oklahoma, in the Osage country and on the property of all restricted Indians, there is a production tax of 3 per cent. There has recently been a court decision to the effect that you can not tax the oil which comes from the land of a restricted Indian; but up in the Osage country where leases have been made, where an agreement has been made to pay, those men must continue to pay, while the other fellows will be able to get their oil without paying this 3 per cent. There are many small operators in the Osage country who produce oil who do not make a profit of 3 per cent upon the oil that they produce. Now, in this irrigation matter, we are entering into a condition practically similar to that. We are going to have producers on each of these projects, some of whom are forced to pay and the others not forced to pay, or having their payments extended from year to year.

Mr. HAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. HAYDEN. Those who are compelled to pay are those who have made a financial statement, such as a bank requires from a borrower, which statement shows that they can pay. If the statement shows that they can not pay, they will be given an extension of time, the same as a bank would give it.

Mr. SNYDER. It is building up another special class and giving them special consideration. I do not say that I shall vote against this bill, because I am a kind-hearted old fellow, and where a man really thinks he ought to have some assistance I believe, perhaps, we ought to give it to him. Nevertheless I do not think it is good policy. I do not think we ought to continue to do this sort of thing. I think when we go to the expense of setting up an irrigation system and putting the water on the land when a man takes the property and starts to operate it he ought to know what his charges are going to be, and he ought to put himself in the position to pay them, the same as anybody else.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent to correct the spelling of the word "foregoing," on page 3, line 5.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona has the only time remaining.

Mr. HAYDEN. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. KINKAID the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HICKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9606) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, to extend the time for payment of construction charges on reclamation projects, units of reclamation projects, or in individual cases, for not exceeding three years, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

By unanimous consent the title was amended so as to read: "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time for the payment of charges due on reclamation projects, and for other purposes."

On motion of Mr. KINKAID, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WILLEM VAN DOORN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Acting Secretary of State inclosing a draft of a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to permit Mr. Willem van Doorn, a subject of the Netherlands, to receive instruction at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis at the expense of the Government of the Netherlands.

The Acting Secretary of State points out that the passage of the resolution would be regarded as an act of courtesy by the Government of the Netherlands and that it would follow established precedents.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 28, 1922.

The message, with the accompanying document, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Wednesday, March 1, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 1, 1922.

(Legislative day of Thursday, February 23, 1922.)

The Senate met in open executive session at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

IRRIGATION OF IMPERIAL VALLEY, CALIF.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As in legislative session, the Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of studies made of the Imperial Valley, Calif., and related subjects with respect to irrigation from the Colorado River, with the recommendations of the Secretary relative thereto, which, with the accompanying papers and documents, will be referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

As in legislative session.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Tri-State Association of Credit Men at El Paso, Tex., February 22, 1922, favoring the appointment of a commission to adjust pending questions between the United States and Mexico, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LODGE presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from Hon. Percival P. Baxter, governor of Maine, praying for the prompt ratification without reservations of the treaties prepared by the Conference on Limitation of Armament, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ODDIE presented resolutions adopted by the Nevada State Sheep Commission, of Reno, Nev., favoring inclusion in the proposed reclassification of the Federal civil service of the field service of the executive branch of the Government, which were referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

Mr. POMERENE presented a resolution adopted by the Italian-American Citizens Club, of Stark County, Ohio, favoring the making of October 12 a legal holiday to be known as Columbus Day, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of Jewell Post, No. 72, American Legion, of Jewell City, Kans., praying for the enactment of the so-called soldiers' bonus bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LADD presented the petition of J. E. Backlin and 14 others of Oakes, N. Dak., praying for the enactment of legislation reviving the Government Grain Corporation so as to stabilize prices of certain farm products, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. FLETCHER presented a petition of sundry citizens of St. Augustine, Fla., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILLIS presented a resolution adopted by officers of the Ohio Federation of Women's Clubs, favoring ratification of the treaties prepared by the Conference on Limitation of Armament, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry employees of the Guernseyware Co., of Cambridge, Ohio, praying for the prompt passage of an adequate tariff law based upon American valuations, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. McLEAN presented a resolution adopted at a meeting of the Fairfield County Organization, the American Legion, Connecticut Department, of Bridgeport, Conn., favoring the prompt passage of the so-called fourfold soldiers' adjusted compensation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Connecticut Chamber of Commerce at Hartford, Conn., protesting against the proposed transfer of the Forest Service from the Department of Agriculture to another department and against proposed water-power development in certain national parks, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the New England Association of Marketing Officials, of Storrs, Conn., protesting against the proposed transfer of the Bureau of Markets and Crop Estimates from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of Commerce, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented the petition of members of Mount Aetna Commandery, No. 473, the Knights of Malta, of Hartford, Conn., favoring the enactment of legislation creating a department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a resolution adopted by members of McSwiney Council, American Association for the Recognition of the Irish Republic, of Bridgeport, Conn., protesting against the continued detention of political prisoners by the Government of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of Dr. Isaac W. Reed, pastor of the Grace Baptist Church, of Waterbury, Conn., praying for the passage of the so-called Dyer antilynching bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of 609 employees of the American Pin Co., 170 employees of the Patent Button Co., 29 employees of the American Fastener Co., and 11 employees of the Princely Pearl Novelty Co., all of Waterbury, Conn., praying for the prompt passage of the so-called Fordney tariff bill with the American valuation plan included therein, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

As in legislative session,

Mr. POMERENE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 2919) to extend for the period of two years the provisions of Title II of the food control and the District of Columbia rents act, approved October 22, 1919, as amended, reported it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and submitted a report (No. 523) thereon.

Mr. BALL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 3170) regulating corporations doing a banking business in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report (No. 524) thereon.

Mr. FERNALD, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9597) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 257) to appoint a commission for the exchange of sites for a post-office and courthouse building at New York between the Federal Government and the officials of the city of New York, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

As in legislative session, bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JOHNSON:

A bill (S. 3218) granting an increase of pension to Augusta Barlow Greene; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ODDIE:

A bill (S. 3219) granting an increase of pension to Mary J. Forbes; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HARRIS:

A bill (S. 3220) to amend section 2 of the United States warehouse act, approved August 11, 1916; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. SHIELDS:

A bill (S. 3221) granting a pension to S. S. Fair (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 3222) for the extension of Rittenhouse Street, in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

AMENDMENT OF DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $150,000 for the enforcement of the laws regulating immigration of aliens into the United States, including the same objects specified under this head in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1922 intended to be proposed by him to the second deficiency appropriation bill for 1922, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PROTECTION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS.

Mr. SPENCER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1452) providing for establishing shooting grounds for the public, for establishing game refuges and breeding grounds, for protecting migratory birds, and requiring a Federal license to hunt them, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed acts and a joint resolution of the following titles:

On February 28, 1922:

S. 1247. An act for the relief of Frank Carpenter; and

S. J. Res. 137. Joint resolution transferring to the custody of the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution certain relics now in the possession of the Department of State.

On March 1, 1922:

S. 2072. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to make and receive conveyances effecting an exchange of title to the railroad rights of way at Camp Henry Knox, Ky., and for other purposes;

S. 2138. An act providing that the Government property known as the St. Francis Barracks, at St. Augustine, Fla., be donated to the State of Florida for military purposes; and

S. 2774. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provisions for the national defense, and for other purposes,' approved June 3, 1916, and to establish military justice," approved June 4, 1920.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WARREN. As in legislative session, I submit the conference report on House bill 10267, the legislative appropriation bill, and ask for its present consideration.

The report was read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10267) "making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 14, 15, 20, 21, 22, 25, and 26.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 7, 8, 9, 10, 12, 13, 16, 18, 23, and 27 and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 11: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out line 7 of the matter inserted by said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$3,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 17: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 17, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$35,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 19: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 19, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$9,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 24: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$92,985"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have not agreed upon amendments numbered 5, 6, and 28.

F. E. WARREN,
CHARLES CURTIS,
A. A. JONES,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. G. CANNON,
SYDNEY ANDERSON,
JAMES A. GALLIVAN,

Managers on the part of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate further insist upon the amendments in disagreement, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. JONES of New Mexico conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference.

TREATY WITH JAPAN.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty between the United States and Japan with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator, in particular the island of Yap, signed at Washington on February 11, 1922.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Harreld	Myers	Simmons
Brandegee	Harris	Nelson	Smith
Bursum	Harrison	New	Spencer
Cameron	Heflin	Newberry	Stanfield
Capper	Hitchcock	Nicholson	Sterling
Caraway	Johnson	Norbeck	Swanson
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Oddie	Townsend
Culberson	Kellogg	Overman	Underwood
Cummins	Kendrick	Page	Wadsworth
Dial	King	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Edge	Ladd	Pittman	Walsh, Mont.
Ernst	Lenroot	Poin Dexter	Warren
Fernald	Lodge	Pomerene	Watson, Ga.
Fletcher	McCormick	Rawson	Weller
France	McKellar	Reed	Williams
Gerry	McKinley	Robinson	Willis
Gooding	McNary	Sheppard
Hale	Moses	Shields

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was requested to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] are detained at a hearing before the Committee on Finance.

I was also requested to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent on account of a death in his family.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, may I inquire what is the pending question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to article 2.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask for a vote on the question.

Article 2 was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to article 3, which will be read.

The reading clerk read as follows:

ARTICLE III.

The United States and its nationals shall have free access to the island of Yap on a footing of entire equality with Japan or any other nation and their respective nationals in all that relates to the landing and operation of the existing Yap-Guam cable or of any cable which may hereafter be laid or operated by the United States or by its nationals connecting with the island of Yap.

The rights and privileges embraced by the preceding paragraph shall also be accorded to the Government of the United States and its nationals with respect to radiotelegraphic communication; provided, however, that so long as the Government of Japan shall maintain on the island of Yap an adequate radiotelegraphic station, cooperating effectively with the cables and with other radio stations on ships or on shore, without discriminatory exactions or preferences, the exercise of the right to establish radiotelegraphic stations on the island by the United States or its nationals shall be suspended.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I submit the following amendment and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 4, at the end of article 3, after the word "suspended" and before the period, insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided further, That the United States shall be the exclusive judge as to whether the Government of Japan has maintained radiotelegraphic communication on the island of Yap as required in the foregoing proviso.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I believe that but few Senators heard the reading of the amendment. I doubt if there is any prospect of the adoption of the amendment, no matter how necessary it may be. I am presenting it, however, because if the terms of the treaty mean anything it is well to consider them. I am proposing to amend the article of the treaty that provides that the United States Government shall not erect any aerial telegraph station on the island of Yap so long as the Japanese Government maintains a satisfactory station there. I am not now even objecting to that provision; it may be all right to let the nationals of Japan or Japan operate the aerial electrical systems on the island of Yap; but our Government has deemed it of sufficient importance to us and to our nationals to require that Japan shall efficiently operate those aerial systems. Our Government has also considered it of sufficient importance to provide that we shall build there our own aerial system when Japan fails properly to conduct its system.

Now, the pertinent question which arises is who is to determine those facts? It is undoubtedly the intention of the Secretary of State, who negotiated this treaty, that our right or the right of our nationals to build an aerial station there shall only be suspended so long as Japan efficiently conducts its aerial system connecting with other systems, and without discrimination or preference. There is, however, no provision in the treaty with regard to who shall determine when Japan ceases so to conduct her radio system; there is no provision in the treaty for determining when Japan shall discriminate against our nationals in the operation of that system.

This question came up in the debate the other day, and let me quote what the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who is a strong proponent of this treaty, had to say on the subject. On the 27th day of February I asked the Senator from Alabama this question when he was discussing this matter:

What would be the result if there were a protest against the Japanese communications with the Orient, as they have been for several months, and we should start to build on that island? Would it not be a source of trouble from the very beginning?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I have not a doubt in the world that Japan construes that treaty as all treaties are construed. The determination of the event is not fixed in the treaty. When it is for the right or benefit of one of the parties, the parties to it determine it. As they grant us the right to erect a radio station, we would have the perfect right to determine when that event should take place. There is no doubt in my mind about that. I realize that the Senator does not agree with me about it.

Mr. PITTMAN. Does not the Senator think these things should be definite and that where there is a probable cause of dispute somebody should be designated to settle that dispute and determine it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the best way, in this case of the building of a radio station, is to leave it as it is—that is, that the United States Government determine it for itself. But it is not important. It evidently was put in there to retain a right. It is absolutely unimportant.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PITTMAN. I will.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I merely wish to pursue the idea. The Senator is correct with reference to the statement I made; but later on in the debate the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] asked me a question similar to that which the Senator from Nevada has propounded. The treaty provides that we shall not build a radio station so long as Japan furnishes adequate service, using the word "adequate." As I stated to the Senator from North Carolina several days ago in reference to the matter of which the Senator from Nevada now speaks, to my mind there can not be any doubt about the situation, when the treaty provides that when adequate service is not rendered we may build a station, because when the framers of the treaty use the words "adequate service" they do not mean adequate service to the nationals of other countries; they do not mean adequate service to Japan; but they mean adequate service to the United States Government and its nationals. Japan can not possibly determine when we have adequate service; she would have no knowledge as to that. The only way she could know when we had adequate service would be when we ourselves determined it. The finding of the fact as to whether adequate service is furnished can only be ascertained by one nation or its nationals, namely, those to whom adequate service is to be furnished, and the question, therefore, must be determined by the United States and its nationals and by no one else.

If I felt there was the slightest doubt about the United States having the right to determine when adequate service is rendered, if I had any doubt about the United States itself making that determination, I should vote for the Senator's amendment; but as I have not a particle of doubt as to that, as I think the treaty is perfectly clear, I do not think it is necessary to adopt the amendment.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Will the Senator from Nevada allow me to ask the Senator from Alabama a question?

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama this question: The words "adequate remuneration" are used in one of the clauses of the treaty. To what standard of pay, in the Senator's mind, could that language be applied?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not think those sections are at all material. I was talking about a radio station. I think all there is in this treaty is the consent of Japan to allow us to establish a cable line and a radio station. The other grants in the treaty are grants made by Japan of her own free will. In my judgment, as I said the other day, we had no rights left after we refused to take our seat at the table in Paris. The Senator probably does not agree with me, as others do not, but to my mind the only thing we acquired by the treaty of Versailles was the right to act as a trustee, and when we declined to take our seat at the table as a trustee further proceedings necessarily interested us no more. The other trustees went on and acted, and any concessions that Japan makes to us is merely a gratuity.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. But, Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Nevada, there are incorporated in the treaty other provisions, for instance, the prohibition clause, of which we talked yesterday.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I say they are gratuities. We should not look a gift horse in the mouth.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. All Europe is torn with strike questions and wage questions now, and this treaty will simply carry those disputes to the Orient.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What I mean is that we get that much because Japan is willing to give it. She is under no compulsion to give anything.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Are we to be put in the position of taking gratuities from Japan?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. All we get under this treaty, in my judgment, is a gift, just as we received a gift from Canada, as I said the other day, when she conceded to our fishermen the right to get bait in Canadian waters. We have repeatedly granted similar gratuities to other nations. There is no moral reflection on a man or on a nation in a proper spirit and in a friendly way taking a release from some one else.

I do not think for a moment that we had any claim on Japan to make concessions in this matter when we refused to take our seat at the table in Paris after we had refused to ratify the treaty of Versailles. Of course, that is only my viewpoint. To Senators who look at the matter from a different viewpoint, as I am sure the Senator from Georgia does, these questions may mean a very different thing; but, if I am right about it, that we yielded up our rights when we refused to sit at the table, then what we get out of it comes in a very different way.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Alabama a question?

Mr. PITTMAN. I hope the debate will not depart from the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply wish to ask the Senator from Alabama a question.

Mr. PITTMAN. Very well, but I desire to keep the amendment in the foreground. I yield to the Senator, however.

Mr. SIMMONS. The question I wished to ask the Senator from Alabama is this: If I contract with the Senator for adequate service of any character whatsoever, and subsequently I bring an action against the Senator on the ground that I failed to get adequate service, does the Senator think that I alone have the right to determine the question of whether the service is adequate or not adequate?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I see the point of the Senator's question, but the proposition which he suggests is very different from that contained in this treaty. This is not like a contract that you shall furnish me with adequate service, but it is that I shall have permission to do a certain thing on the happening of an event, and the happening of the event is when adequate service is not furnished. That is a very different thing from a contract such as the Senator suggests.

Mr. REED. Who is to determine that?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, nobody can determine whether I have adequate service except myself; nobody possibly can come to that understanding. It is for me to withhold my hand until that event happens.

Mr. REED. Then, it follows that the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada ought to be accepted.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It follows just the other way. If we have in this treaty the right to dispose of this proposition ourselves, as we undoubtedly have, I differ with my friend from Nevada—and I do not wish to say this so emphatically as to indicate that I have not full respect for his judgment in the matter—for to my mind there never was a plainer proposition ever written than that, when it is provided in this treaty we shall have the right to erect a radio station if we do not get adequate service; we and we alone are to determine when that adequate service is rendered.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nevada will yield, if it is perfectly clear to the mind of the Senator from Alabama that the treaty means exactly what it would mean if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada were inserted, what can be the objection of the Senator to adopting it if it is not clear to the minds of other Senators, as it is perfectly evident that it is not clear?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The only difficulty about that is that it is an amendment, and if adopted will have to go back to Japan. Of course, in determining these questions each Senator has got to decide for himself what is meant.

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And there is no reason for sending this treaty back to Japan if we are of the opinion that there can be but one interpretation of it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield for a brief statement?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. While I have no authority to bind the Senator from Nevada, I apprehend the Senator from Nevada would not object to putting his amendment in the form of a reservation.

With all due respect to the Senator from Alabama—and I have very great respect for any opinion which the Senator expresses—I can not agree with him that it is perfectly clear who shall determine this question of fact. The provision is that the right is granted the United States to construct and operate means of radiotelegraphic communication. There is, however, a provision that this right shall be suspended—not "may," but "shall"—so long as Japan furnishes adequate facilities, and there is a definition in the provision of the treaty as to what shall constitute adequate facilities: First, "co-operating effectively with the cables"; second, "and with other radio stations on ships or on shore"; third, "without discriminatory exactions"; and, fourth, "or preferences," so that the treaty itself carries a clear definition of what shall constitute adequate service.

Suppose the United States should claim that Japan was intercepting her messages, that Japan was refusing to render radiotelegraphic service to her ships, or that she was giving preferential treatment to Great Britain or France or the nationals of Great Britain or France over those of the United States; and suppose Japan should, as she undoubtedly would, deny that she was violating this provision of the treaty; what would be the remedy of the United States?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To build a radio station.

Mr. ROBINSON. But suppose Japan should prevent her or deny her the right to build a radio station?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That would be a casus belli.

Mr. ROBINSON. Why, certainly it would be a casus belli; but who would want to go to war about a question of that sort? Why not make it so clear in the treaty that Japan could not deny the claim of the United States?

Mr. WILLIAMS. If we made it clear in the treaty it would still be denied, and still be a casus belli.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator says it is clear. I say it is not clear.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. These Senators have agreed among themselves that it would be a cause for war if the United States should assert its right to build a station, notwithstanding the opposition of Japan.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the Senator's pardon—and if Japan were to deny it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now I want to ask the Senator from Nevada this question: Suppose we ratify the four-power treaty. Under the terms of the four-power treaty we enter into an agreement that if any differences arise which diplomacy is unable to settle regarding the rights of the four nations in any of these islands, that question shall be submitted to a conference of the four powers. Would we not be compelled, under that provision in the four-power treaty, to submit this question for adjustment at a conference between the United States, Japan, Great Britain, and France?

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator ask me that question? Undoubtedly we would. If we ratify the four-power treaty, all Pacific questions must be referred to a conference of the four powers for adjustment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. PITTMAN. I must decline to yield further, until I have answered some questions put to me—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada has the floor, and declines to yield further.

Mr. PITTMAN. I would have answered the question of the Senator from Nebraska, but the Senator from Arkansas has answered it for me, and I am much obliged to him.

Mr. ROBINSON. I beg the pardon of the Senator from Nevada. I asked the Senator from Nebraska whether he was asking me that question.

Mr. PITTMAN. It is all right, as long as it relates to this amendment.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question on that very matter, to get his opinion? If this question came to a settlement by conference, how would the conference decide—by unanimous vote, or by a majority vote?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, there is a subject of great argument, if the four-power treaty is adopted, as to what disputes go to the four powers and what disputes go to the international court of justice. I assume that that is going to be debated extensively very soon. I think the statements made by the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from North Carolina and by other Senators clearly show that unless the position taken by the Senator from Alabama is made clear in this treaty there will be trouble.

I have no doubt that it is the purpose of this Government, in negotiating this treaty, to take the position that the Senator from Alabama has taken; but the language of this treaty can not be so construed. I will read the proviso. It says:

Provided, however, That so long as the Government of Japan shall maintain on the island of Yap an adequate radiotelegraphic station, co-operating effectively with the cables and with other radio stations on ships or on shore, without discriminatory exactions or preferences, the exercise of the right to establish radiotelegraphic stations on the island by the United States or its nationals shall be suspended.

That is the language of the treaty. It is very probable, if under that proviso we should charge Japan with discriminating in favor of her own nationals, that she would deny it. There is not any doubt in my mind that if we attempted forcibly to build a radio station on that island in the face of that denial it would be a casus belli, as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has stated; but if the treaty says in addition to that:

Provided further, That the United States shall be the exclusive judge as to whether the Government of Japan has maintained radio telegraphic communication on the island of Yap as required in the foregoing proviso.

Then when the United States decided that question exclusively, Japan having agreed to it, there would be no question that we could proceed to build our own radio stations there without opposition.

I still contend just exactly as the Senator from Arkansas did. If it is the intention of this treaty that the United States shall determine this question for itself exclusively, and the language now existing in the treaty is not clear that the United States has that right, then there can be no harm in so stating. Of course those of the Senate who do not believe that the United States has the right that the Senator from Alabama contends for, and do not believe that the United States should have that right, would naturally vote against the proposed amendment that I am offering.

The question arises as to whether or not there are objections to it in the form of an amendment. I know that some objections have been made. The only objection made yesterday against the amendment I offered, preserving the rights of our nationals in these islands under former Japanese-American treaties, was made on the ground that it was an amendment and not a reservation.

While I do not see any distinction between an amendment and a reservation as far as this treaty is concerned, I have prepared all of these things in the form of reservations to be subsequently offered, if that will satisfy the minds of any of the Senators, and I have them on my desk; but I do not see the distinction between the amendment and the reservation. I did see the distinction between an amendment and a reservation in the Versailles treaty, because an amendment to the Versailles treaty would have changed the very text as affecting forty or fifty nations, while a reservation only would have changed the text as affecting us; but where there are only two parties to a treaty, as there are here, just as though it had been a treaty between the United States and Germany, if Japan agrees to the modification of the language of the treaty, it does not affect anyone except Japan and the United States. It affects Japan just as much if the text of the treaty is changed by a reservation at the end which is made a part of the treaty as if it is made in the middle of the contract as an amendment to the treaty. If the language is changed, either by reservation or by amendment, Japan has a right to say what that change means, and whether she agrees to it. You can not make any change in a written contract, I do not care how the change is made, unless a mutuality of minds is brought to bear on it.

What constitutes a ratification of the change is another question that I do not care to go into, because it is immaterial, whether you ratify it formally or informally, by consent or by silence, whether it is open, or whether it is by an estoppel. That is not the question. The question is that there is no distinction between the effect of certain language whether it is called an amendment or called a reservation, whether it is put in the middle of a contract or at the end of a contract, and the same formalities with regard to the consent to the change are absolutely essential. Therefore, I have offered this as an amendment, because it is in more direct contact with the thing that I am trying to explain. I take this proviso, which provides that we shall not erect a radio station on that island so long as Japan gives adequate service and does not discriminate, and just simply says: "Provided further, That when in the judgment of the United States Japan is not furnishing that adequate service, this right shall not be suspended any longer."

It seems the proper place to put it; but if the Senate disagrees with me as to the method of doing it, it is immaterial to me. I wanted a vote on this method first, because I think it is more intelligent to put it in direct contact with the article itself; but if it is voted down that way I am going to offer this amendment in the form of a reservation, and I am going to offer the other amendment that was defeated the other day in the form of a reservation, and allow those Senators who think that this treaty should be made more definite, allow those Senators who think that it does not guarantee the rights and privileges that the Senator from Alabama thinks it does, to vote for language—either the language I have suggested or some other language—that will make it clear as between Japan and the United States as to just exactly what the rights of the United States are, because unless there is a distinct understanding as to what the rights of the United States are in this matter we have every reason to look for a dispute, and if this treaty has any benefit whatever it is for the purpose of forever settling any dispute with regard to these islands. That is exactly what we state in it.

What is the rush, what is the hurry, to have this treaty jammed through? There are not numerous nations involved in it. The parties who negotiated this treaty are in Washington to-day, or will be in a few days. If the Senator from Alabama is correct in this matter, if this is such a general form of construction of a treaty, it is not to be assumed that the Japanese Government will hesitate a moment to say to their agents here, "Certainly; agree to that." It is a very simple matter. But even if it should result in a delay of 30 days, it is a matter which may settle or may bring on disputes with Japan of sufficient importance to justify even that delay.

We are dealing with the rights of our nationals in foreign countries. Most nations think the rights of their nationals in foreign countries are important matters, but I am sorry to say that it has been charged throughout the world, it has been charged in publications and in speeches, that the rights of the nationals of the United States are less protected in foreign countries than the rights of the nationals of even the smallest nations. It is a well-known fact that missionaries of all of the other great countries of the world, carrying religion into foreign countries, have greater protection than the missionaries of the United States. Great Britain protects her nationals everywhere, and her nationals are respected by reason of that. Time and time again our nationals have had to appeal to the British representatives in foreign countries to protect them, because of the supine policy of our own Government, as expressed through its foreign representatives, with regard to the protection of the life and liberty of our nationals.

This whole question involves the rights of our nationals in foreign countries—commercial rights, religious rights, freedom of travel, and all those questions—and yet when such a dispute arises with regard to the construction of language, as has arisen here to-day, when several Senators disagree with the construction of one Senator, to say that we shall stand on the construction of that one Senator, when the whole thing can be remedied by just reasserting in plain language what he now asserts it does mean, seems to me to be inexcusable.

I offer this amendment. If it is voted down, I intend at the proper time to offer a reservation, and that reservation will read as follows:

The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide at any time whether the Government of Japan has maintained or is maintaining on the island of Yap an adequate radiotelegraphic station co-operating effectively with the cables and with other radio stations on ships or on shore, and whether such cable service is being conducted without discriminatory exactions or preferences and in accord with the proviso set forth in article 3.

I shall offer that as a reservation if this amendment is defeated; but it does seem to me that there is no more trouble over consenting to an amendment to an article than there is in consenting to a reservation to an article, and the context will be plainer if it is put in as an amendment, so that it may always stand out as a part of the article itself. That is the better plan to follow; but I am not at all captious about my plan.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to say merely a single word. Article 3 provides that—

The United States and its nationals shall have free access to the island of Yap on a footing of entire equality with Japan or any other nation and their respective nationals in all that relates to the landing and operation of the existing Yap-Guam cable or of any cable which may hereafter be laid or operated by the United States or by its nationals connecting with the island of Yap.

The rights and privileges embraced by the preceding paragraph shall also be accorded to the Government of the United States and its nationals with respect to radiotelegraphic communication.

That is, a substantive right is conferred to establish radiotelegraphic communication; but a proviso is made that that right shall not be exercised while Japan maintains an adequate radiotelegraphic station cooperating effectively with the cables and with other radio stations, without discriminatory exactions or preferences. It seems to me perfectly clear that a substantive right is only to be suspended under certain conditions, and necessarily the party affected, the United States, is the party to judge. It does not appear to me that there is the slightest doubt about it at all, and I see no reason for opening up the treaty for further negotiations, which would be done either by a reservation or an amendment; it would not make any difference. I see no reason for doing that. It would only delay the treaty, lead to a repetition of the long debate we have had on it here; other equally astute amendments would be offered, and we would get nowhere.

The other objection is not a legal objection or a legal interpretation, but the plain fact is that this is a right to radiotelegraphic communication which the United States probably would never exercise; there would be no need of it. She has never sought hitherto to have a radiotelegraphic station there, and the whole thing is put in out of an abundance of caution. We have three radio stations in the Philippines—at Tavidas, Olongapo, and Los Baños. That is 700 miles away. If we need another radio station, and desire to establish another one, of which there seems to be no likelihood, we have our own island of Guam, a very much better position than the island of Yap.

It seems to me it would be a mistake to reopen this treaty for further negotiation on a point which seems to be wholly needless, whether rightly or wrongly, to those who have been dealing with it, and I personally hope that no amendment of this kind will be made, either by direct amendment or by reservation.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question. When the Senator says that "we" have a station on Guam and several stations in the Philippines, does he mean the Government or a private corporation?

Mr. LODGE. I mean the Government or its nationals. The treaty provides for both. There is no private company concerned in it, and no private company in its senses would think of putting a station there.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Does the Senator mean that the Government has a cable at Yap?

Mr. LODGE. No; the only cable from Yap to Guam is the German-Netherlands cable.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, as has already been admitted, I think on both sides of the Chamber, the adoption of this amendment would mean the reopening of the negotiations. Speaking very briefly, I do not feel that the question which has been raised will warrant that delay, or whatever difficulty it may entail.

Try as hard as I can, I have been unable to find it possible to develop very much excitement or fear of possible damaging results in connection with this treaty from any viewpoint.

One group in the Senate seems to feel that it is unwise to ratify the treaty because by so doing they contend we will give up a one-fifth interest in the former German possessions in the Pacific, and for that reason they oppose ratification, because they feel that we should retain that one-fifth interest for whatever influence it might bring to this country.

For an entirely opposite reason, another group apparently oppose ratification, contending we do not give up the one-fifth interest, and therefore may in some way be brought into alliances with other countries who have possessions in the Pacific, entangling or otherwise.

There seems to be still another group who oppose ratification because our country is not receiving sufficient benefits from the treaty, and because the little advantage of having rights on the island of Yap is not of sufficient importance to warrant the ratification of the treaty.

While thoroughly appreciating our responsibilities and prerogatives in connection with the treaty-making powers, I have about reached the conclusion, Mr. President, that the time has almost arrived when the country will be entirely safe if the Senate accept the judgment of a distinguished Secretary of State, who, in this particular case, had the rather unusual cooperation and help of three other distinguished Americans, the four delegates representing the United States in the recent Conference on the Limitation of Armaments.

While I thoroughly appreciate that the negotiation of a treaty is a matter entirely within the jurisdiction, as far as its initiation is concerned, of the President, through the Secretary of State—and I assume this treaty was so negotiated—still, I repeat, that in this particular instance the Secretary of State was associated for 10 weeks, in connection with the settlement of various far eastern problems, with three other distinguished citizens of the country, and this particular treaty, as all others, I understand, met their unanimous approval.

I do not believe, whether we ratify this treaty or do not ratify the treaty, that it will have any particular influence on the daily life, the domestic life, of the citizens of this country. Frankly, I do not consider it of extreme importance.

True, it has been more or less discussed and apparently has been an unsettled question since the Versailles treaty was negotiated, and perhaps it is well—and I believe it is—to settle and dispose of it at this time; but I do not believe it requires reservations, amendments, or reinterpretations, or the consumption of the time which is taken to discuss the dire possibilities of a misunderstanding if we enter into this treaty with Japan.

I sometimes think that we in the Senate are perhaps a little too jealous of our prerogatives, and when I say that I do not want to be misunderstood.

I appreciate the responsibility we have in considering the ratification of treaties, the concurrent responsibility or whatever it may be termed, but I feel very positive that the country to-day would be very much better satisfied if, after proper and ordinary consideration of the possibility of misunderstanding, the Senate would record its judgment on a treaty of this character rather than through amendment or reservation, making it necessary to send it to Japan or, through the representatives of Japan in this country, to reinterpret or to definitely state just what it seems to me plain language already makes perfectly clear.

Perhaps it is apart from the question—in fact, I know it is—but I have been impressed with the fact that we have so many domestic problems in the country to-day the solution of which are of so much direct importance to the people of the country, and there is no comparison between that necessity and a proper solution, and what might be termed the interpretation of some of the sections of a treaty giving us the simple privilege of erecting a radio pole or installing radio machinery on the island of Yap. I repeat, while I recognize our responsibility and that we must not consider lightly even a treaty that is relatively unimportant, still the country is demanding action, and properly so, on many domestic questions which are of importance to the peace, happiness, and prosperity of the people of the country, and we should not waste what I consider an unnecessary length of time in the consideration of technical points in connection with the right to erect telegraph poles on the island of Yap.

It forms almost a libel on American statesmanship that we can not trust or have so little confidence in the judgment of our representatives and apparently believe it necessary to rewrite and reinterpret their efforts.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, in one of the private letters of Abraham Lincoln, written to a friend of his in Illinois, occurs the statement:

I have been listening to a speech of Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, and it brought the tears to my old eyes.

Mr. Stephens lived within a few miles of my own home. At his feet I reverently knelt and learned the doctrines of Jeffersonian Democracy. To Mr. Stephens, Mr. Lincoln wrote on November 30, 1860, just after the secession convention had adjourned. That convention was held at the old capital, Milledgeville, and in that convention Mr. Stephens made a heroic fight against Robert Toombs, against secession, and Mr. Lincoln asked for a copy of the speech. Had I been there, Mr. President, I would have spoken with Mr. Stephens and against Mr. Toombs, because I hold the Andrew Jackson doctrine, that division of the Union necessarily means subdivision, and again division, and again division, until the Union would be resolved into its original elements.

Had Mr. Stephens been heeded there would have been no four years of civil war, with wounds scarcely yet healed. Had Mr. Stephens been heeded at the Hampton Roads conference, where President Lincoln met him and told him, "Write the word 'Union' at the top of the page and you can write the other terms to suit yourself"—had Mr. Stephens been given the authority to do just that, he would have done just that, and the Southern States would have rejoined the Union without the years of sorrow which we call the reconstruction period.

But, Mr. President, while these two great men had the same thought as to the necessity of a continuous Union, because they knew that if the States divided into separate units there would be a fertile field for foreign intrigue, they never dreamed that the Union itself would become a victim of foreign intrigue, as it has now become.

In the treaty with reference to the island of Yap, there are numerous causes for future war—the question as to whether or not Japan pays adequate wages, gives adequate service, confines the military to police duty, maintains law and order. What are the standards? How will we measure wages in the Pacific islands? We can not measure them here. They are the source of strikes in this country, in England, in France, in Germany, throughout the world except in soviet Russia, so far as the West is concerned. What is your scale of wages? What are your hours of work? There are no standards agreed on. Necessarily the door is open to disputes. Who is to settle the disputes? Are we to be flouted by Japan in open violations of the treaty or are we to send expeditionary forces to have the treaty respected?

Article 1 of the treaty says that we consent to Japan's absorption of the islands that used to belong to Germany. By that act we ratify the secret treaty of which we were ignorant when we entered the war. Is there any Senator here who will say that we would have entered the war, if we had known of this secret treaty for the division of the spoils? Would we have conscripted our young men, the flower of American manhood, and sent them 3,000 miles away from home to die for Japan, to march and suffer and perish for the aggrandizement of Japan? I do not believe there is a Senator here who would say that we would have done that, had we known of the secret treaty between Great Britain and Japan. We were lured into it without knowledge of those secret compacts. The men who deceived us then may be deceiving us now. How do we know? If they kept their secrets from us then, they may be keeping some away from us now. How do we know?

Mr. President, as I have said, I learned my democracy at the feet of the man who loved Abraham Lincoln and was loved by him. He used to recite, in the other House, the preamble to the Constitution of the United States. It may not be amiss for me to read it now. It was written by men who had won their spurs on fields of battle and won their laurels in fields of literature. One ranked high in the fields of science and art. America has never produced stronger and loftier, more intellectual men. Here is what they said:

We, the people—

And of course they meant to insert the names of the States of Georgia, Virginia, New York, Massachusetts, and the others, but they did not know which seven would ratify the Constitution and put it into operation. Therefore, they left the names of the States a blank, a fact which Mr. Webster did not state in the great debate, and which Mr. Calhoun did not dig up, but a fact nevertheless.

We, the people of the United States in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty—

To whom? To ourselves and our posterity—do ordain and establish the Constitution of the United States.

No visionary altruism, no taking care of the universe, but a government for ourselves and our posterity. There are the limits of our authority.

Mr. President, I contend that we Senators have no right under the supreme law to give our consent to Japan's spoiliations in the Pacific Ocean. We are exceeding our constitutional authority. We are embarking upon uncharted seas. We are jeopardizing our future, surrendering a part of our independence.

With whom are we going into partnership? If we, as individuals, were approached with the offer of a copartnership, we would make some inquiry into the character and the reputation of those who were seeking to have us become their partners. What is the character of Japan? A blacker one is not borne by any nation. In 1902 she pledged her faith, by a formal treaty, to respect the independence of Korea. In 1907 she repeated that pledge in a formal treaty. What did she do? She murdered the Queen of Korea in her palace and then atrociously reduced the country to subjection. She is holding it now, after a record that reeks with human bloodshed by herself in Korean homes and Korean streets.

By going into partnership with her, by taking her bloody hand in ours, we become morally an accomplice, in part at least, for crimes she has committed in Korea. We become accessories after the fact, and the American conscience will rise up against us and it will be felt in the election that is soon to come. In a few months all who have upheld the treaty will have to face the people whose rights we have in part surrendered without having authority to do so.

Time and again Japan has, by formal, solemn treaty, every bit as sanctimonious as this which she signed here in Washington, pledged herself to respect the integrity of China. At the very time we were straining every nerve, financial and physical, to save England and France in the great World War, Japan, without shedding one drop of her precious blood in Europe, was absorbing the territories of China. Manchuria is an empire in itself, so is Mongolia; and while the gallant North Carolina and South Carolina and Georgia and Alabama and Arkansas regiments were fighting in France, Japan was simply absorbing the unarmed and helpless Chinese. Now we are asked to become accessories after the fact. Have we no sense of national honor? Is there no such thing as a national conscience?

Mr. President, in reading over this treaty on yesterday I could not help but think of the few short months ago when American soldiers were standing on the outer rim of the Arctic circle, reddening the snows of Siberia with their lifeblood. For what? To protect a railroad. Owned by whom? By the international bankers, of course. Think of it! Could Francis Marion or the heroic Cleveland or the gallant Sevier or the invincible Andrew Jackson or the still greater heroes of the Revolutionary War have thought, when they struggled for years and years to establish American independence, that we would be sending our southern boys and our northern and western and eastern boys to the Arctic circle, to march over the ice, to starve, and to die in the interest of an internationally owned railway in Siberia?

In this treaty there crops up an international cable company. That is what this treaty means; it does not mean anything else, either. If Senators desire to deceive themselves about it now, they may go ahead and do so, but that is what it means. The fact can hardly be concealed in the bungling, vague verbiage of the treaty, that it is all to get a right of way for an international cable company. We are asked to prostitute our power as Senators and as a Government to get a right of way for an international cable company owned, no doubt, by J. P. Morgan & Co., by Kuhn, Loeb & Co., by the Rothschilds, and the other great confederated international banks.

Mr. President, I feel more disheartened than I have felt at any time since I have been here in Washington. There is so much indifference that the apathy is chilling. The Senate is asked to go blindfolded into a treaty that has in it at least a dozen possibilities of war, and to surrender, almost without a word of protest, the unfettered independence for which your fathers and mine fought and bled. I know that speech is unavailing, but I can not allow this departure from our historic national policy without a word of protest, although I know that word is futile.

The system of mandates is in itself pregnant with unborn wars. Need I remind Senators that the recent World War was the direct result of a mandate. At the Berlin congress, in 1878, the great powers found themselves unable to solve the problem of the Balkan Peninsula. Mankind has not yet found how to solve it. It is a country where the remains of tribes, ebbing and flowing across the Bosphorus, from west to east and from east to west, left their remnants; there is no predominating race in that narrow passway between the east and west. The Berlin congress gave to Austria a mandate over Bosnia and Herzegovina. There was an editor in the State of Georgia—a New Englander by the name of Finch—who wrote editorial after editorial for the Atlanta Constitution, pointing out the certainty that that mandate would sometime lead to a European convulsion. His warnings were laughed aside. They left a deep impression upon my own mind, and when the war rose out of that very mandate I thought of the prophecies of this obscure editor, whose name is unknown to fame.

Senators will remember that Austria bided her time, and when a great war was raging between Greece and Turkey, involving Bulgaria and to some extent involving Serbia, she took advantage of the embarrassments of the greater Governments and the exhaustion of Russia, in consequence of the war with Japan, and she seized those wards of hers, and did it under circumstances of the greatest brutality. Then, after having swallowed these two smaller nations, she hungered for Serbia, which was a Greek Catholic country, having over 2,000,000 Greek Catholics and about 10,000 Roman Catholics.

Austria forced old King Peter to sign a concordat in June, 1914—mark the date—by which the old King was made to promise that the Greek Catholics of Serbia should pay the salaries of certain Roman Catholic dignitaries and should give almost complete control of education and of the press to the Roman Catholics. The Greek Catholics were naturally inflamed, and when the Austrian archduke, Ferdinand, the heir to the Austrian throne and believed to be the author of these measures, came on a triumphal progress into Bosnia a fanatical youth shot him and killed him, just as the Prince of Wales, now journeying in India, was shot at last week. Austria demanded of Serbia certain concessions which would have meant the loss of her independence. The King offered to concede everything demanded of him except that Austrian officers should come into Serbia and establish courts to try Serbian subjects—an unprecedented demand—one of the very demands that King George III made of our country, arousing our country to rebellion against the Crown. The old King offered to submit the whole question to The Hague Peace Tribunal. The offer was rejected. Then Austria launched her armies against Serbia, having been assured of the support of the Kaiser. The most pathetic telegrams of that era were those of the Czar urging his kinsman, the Kaiser, to stay the hand of war. Senators who have not forgotten that correspondence will remember with melancholy those telegrams when they also remember the horrible fate that afterwards befell the Czar and his family. The Kaiser, perhaps, was unable to resist his military clique, and he went into the war, not against Serbia but against France.

Russia had her revolution and withdrew her 4,000,000 men after having forced the Kaiser to detach from the onward march to Paris some of his best divisions to protect east Prussia. That detachment of the crack divisions of the German Army was, perhaps, what saved Paris. Russia fell out when the revolution occurred, and then we got in. The rest we know.

Mr. President, while we were single-minded and single-hearted in that great conflict, England and Japan had secretly conspired to rob the world. This treaty, so far as I can see it, puts us in the attitude of indorsing everything that Japan has done, including the ravishment of Shantung. Who knows whether she will give up Shantung? Who knows that she will get out of Siberia? Who knows that she will get out of Manchuria or Mongolia?

Mr. President, the Japanese believe in the divinity of their Emperor. To them he is a god. To them his powers are divine, and their ideal is the absolute control of the East, and we are helping them get that control.

The time was when no American knew of the Philippines. We got along splendidly for a hundred years without knowing anything about them. The time was when we knew nothing about the Hawaiian Islands. For a hundred years we got along splendidly without them. In acquiring the Hawaiian Islands we condoned an act of criminality against a weak, inoffensive, independent people. I protested against it then, and I have not changed my attitude about it. It was a crime, and we had no provocation to commit it; and a commissioner from my State, Mr. Blount, with whom I served in the other House, condemned that outrage and asked our Government to make atonement by liberating those people and restoring the Queen to her hereditary throne. Read her story of that some day and it will melt your heart.

In the Philippines, what did we do? In Oscar Browning's History of Modern Times he states that Admiral Dewey and President McKinley came to an agreement with Aguinaldo, who was leading a revolt against Spain, just as we had revolted against Great Britain, and in that agreement they pledged themselves to the independence of those islands if Aguinaldo and his forces would help us in the fight with Spain. Of course, President McKinley had no authority to make that agreement without the consent of the Senate, but Aguinaldo did not know it. Admiral Dewey had no such authority, but the Filipinos did not know it. We took their help, we conquered the Spaniards, and then we turned upon our allies and conquered them. It was a shame. Gen. Wood was sent down there to find that they were not fit for independence, and of course he found what he was sent to find. You send a doctor to find poison in a body, and he will find it every time. It is a fat office for Gen. Wood; it is a fat office for hundreds of other American carpetbaggers who are down there feasting on the substance of those people. We have promised, time and again, to give them independence. Why not keep our word and do it? Is it any of our business what becomes of them afterwards? I do not think it is. Our supreme law says that we made this Government for ourselves, and we swore to support that Constitution. Why not keep our oaths?

This Government was not made for the Filipinos, for the Hawaiians, for the Chinese, or for the Japs. This Government was made for us, and if it can administer our affairs to the satisfaction of our people it will be doing all that its founders ever expected it to do.

Mr. KING. We are not succeeding so very well now in handling our domestic affairs.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Indeed we are not.

Mr. President, it is saddening to think that we are now going back into the European system from which our ancestors fled. Why did they come here? What was the motive that impelled them to risk the dangers of the ocean in those days when the vessels were mere little tubs, at the mercy of every wind and wave? What impelled them to risk conflict with the savage, with the wilderness, with the diseases incident to a new land? What motive impelled those forefathers of ours who settled Massachusetts and who settled Jamestown? In the Mayflower compact, written while the little vessel was still tossing up and down on the waves, you will find absolute democracy. In the proceedings of the very first legislature that met at Jamestown you will find the planting of the trees of civil liberty—trial by jury, manhood suffrage, representative government, free press. There is the nucleus; there is the germ.

What had our forefathers fled from? In England the King proceeded upon the idea that the land and the people were his; that he could tax them without limit; that he could drive them into foreign wars to fight out his private quarrels. No parliament voted for a declaration of war. There was no referendum to a people.

Thousands and thousands of men went abroad to fight out personal quarrels with the dynasty. The death of the soldier on French fields or Flanders fields threw weeds around the English widow and to the lips of English children brought the wail of the fatherless. Press gangs were out at every seaport to seize returning sailors from merchant ships and press them into the King's navy. One instance is recorded where a bridegroom, coming out of the church with his bride, was seized, rushed on a battleship, and he never again—never, never—saw the bride to whom he had plighted his faith at the altar.

There were 223 offenses punished by death. Think of it—223! To shoot at a rabbit, death. To put an ax to a sapling in a nobleman's park, death. To steal any article of personal property worth a dollar and a half, death. To steal anything from a bleach field, death. To write your name on Westminster Bridge, death. To put a mask on your face on a public highway, death. To imagine the King's death, capital punishment!

There was a tavern keeper whose place was called "The Crown." A baby boy was born to him in the reign of King Edward III, and he, with unthinking joviality, said to his friends next morning, "An heir was born to the Crown last night," meaning, of course, his inn, his tavern. Some busybody, some spy, some toady, somebody wanting the smile of a king, carried the word of it to Edward III, and that man paid with his life for his jest. Thirty thousand men owned nearly all the land in Scotland and in England. The burdens of tenure became unendurable. There was no freedom of speech, none of press, and none of worship. Our forefathers shook the dust of England from their feet and came to this country to have all of those civil liberties, and to be sure of it they wrote them down even before they put their feet on the soil of the New World, never dreaming that their representatives would allow any of those jewels in the diadem of civil liberty to be lost.

How was it in France, because, you know, the Huguenots came over and settled in North and South Carolina. How was it in France? The King's confessor told him that all the property in France belonged to him; that he could tax it without limit; and he did so.

Five-eighths of all that the peasant could raise on his land went in taxes, and there was nothing he could carry to market without paying duty after duty in leaving one zone and going into another's. His grain had to be ground at the lord's mill, and the lord took toll of it. His grapes had to be pressed at his lord's wine press, and the lord took toll of it. His labor was at the command of his lord, especially in the making of roads. If the lord's lady fell sick and was nervous and sleepless at night, and there was a marsh near the castle where the frogs croaked, the peasant could be commandeered to go out and beat the bullrushes, the tall grasses around the marsh, and still the frogs, so that my lady in the castle could sleep. The king could imprison any man or any woman by his mere word, and there was no habeas corpus that could bring the prisoner out for trial.

There was a case of an Englishman, incarcerated in the Bastille for 30 years, and nobody ever could tell who put him in there, and for what offense. Think of it! Thirty years taken out of a man's life, at the mere whim of somebody who disliked him! There was a poet who wrote a couplet about one of the king's mistresses that she did not like, and she had him put in jail for 14 years. As a special favor to his friend, the king would sign in blank these lettres de cachet, and your enemy could fill in your name, and the law did the rest.

Mr. KING. And Voltaire was arrested under the lettres de cachet and imprisoned in the Bastille.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. That is true. The heroic pioneers of the Carolinas, where heroism has always blazed brightly, and always will, I am sure, as it will on our side of the river, came to this country to escape all that. The question is now, Are we drifting back into it? Our fathers founded a government to be as different from the European Governments as possible. Is it not true? Now we are trying to imitate. We are becoming the national ape, the international donkey, driven by international bankers. Is it not so?

Mr. President, in 1920 there was but one great, overshadowing issue—the League of Nations. None are so blind as those who will not see; none are so deaf as those who will not hear. Our people said, in a voice that was heard around the world, as the patriot's musket was in the old days of Lexington, that they meant to maintain the independence which their forefathers had won. Are we doing that? By a majority of seven million they said it; but it does not impress our friends on the other side. They have forgotten it.

They say an elephant has a long memory and a mule a short one. The situation is reversed. It is the elephant who has forgotten and it is the mule who remembers. Do not let our friends on the other side deceive themselves for one minute; the people who voted in November, 1920, are going to vote again in November, 1922. They have not forgotten why they voted against President Wilson in 1920. Some of the proud heads on the other side are going to lie low. Some of the Hotspurs on the other side are going to be like Percy's—they will grow cold.

There is nothing more dangerous in politics than a big majority. You have more people to satisfy. You have more people to please. The more you have to please the less likely you are to please them. You have 7,000,000 people to please besides your usual number, and I do not believe you have pleased them.

Senators on the other side will not debate this treaty. They are afraid. They can not meet our debaters. We could answer them by reading the speeches they made in 1920. I would like to see my good friend, the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] try to debate the treaty. I would like to have the Secretary read from the desk some of those fine speeches he made against the League of Nations. It certainly would be interesting and instructive. They are a good deal better than any speeches he has made about this treaty. I see I do not attract his attention. Perhaps it embarrasses him to listen to me, and therefore he is retiring. He, at least, knows when he gets disgusted, and he is now plainly disgusted. I do not blame him.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, would there be very much greater divergence between those speeches than there was between those he made in 1915 and 1916 and those he made in 1920?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Not the least bit. There never was a man who denounced the Colombian treaty in more violent terms and nobody who advocated it more earnestly afterwards. As a political acrobat he is well trained. He can go through a hoop and turn somersaults as he does so. My friend the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] is almost as much of an expert.

Mr. CARAWAY. Especially in the Newberry case.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does the Senator from Georgia observe that there is only one Republican on the other side of the aisle present, the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Yes, Mr. President, I observe that.

Mr. CARAWAY. Why does the Senator call attention to that? The Senator from Washington will be out in a minute. Give him time.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I thought perhaps we could get a rise out of him. We have not been able to get any of them into the ring. They will not fight. If we treat Japan as they are treating us, Japan will never get any fight out of us. She can just walk off with us.

Mr. President, I merely rose to voice a protest. If we could prolong this debate until the people knew what the Republicans are doing, this treaty would not be ratified. Senators would hear from them. Now, we are hurrying to have the United States Government acquire a right of way for an international cable company. We provide in this treaty that Japan shall exercise her right of eminent domain to get land for that company. No wonder Senators on the other side can not talk about it. No wonder they evade debate.

FEDERAL RESERVE BANK AT ATLANTA.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I have listened to my good friend from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] speak about the old days when 30,000 people owned four-fifths of all the land in Scotland and England. I have had a great deal to say recently as to how thousands of farmers in the United States have lost their farms under the deflation policy carried on by the Federal Reserve Board. I have brought to the attention of the Senate the activity of that board in politics, and of the Federal reserve bank at Atlanta in distributing a speech made in the Senate by the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], assailing my position and that of other Senators upon the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board.

I hold in my hand a copy of that speech sent out by the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta. I also have a copy of it, which, it is said, was sent out by the New York Federal Reserve Bank of New York. The gentleman who wrote me about this speech said that he thought all of the Federal reserve banks were distributing that speech.

I brought to the attention of the Senate the fact that the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta was circulating a speech of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], and that that speech had assailed my position, as I said before, and that of other Senators and Representatives who had taken the same stand I had taken, and I said it was wrong for this governmental institution, conducted by Government officials, to take the speech of one Senator, in which he criticized another Senator and the position of that Senator, and distribute that speech.

As I said before, the officials of this bank wrote a letter with that speech calling upon the local banker to read that speech, calling upon him to write them the impression that he had about the subject before he read the speech, and calling upon him to write them his opinion after he read the speech.

Those letters were sent out by the bank, the postage being paid by the bank, so that the bank was guilty of using the funds of the bank, a Government institution, presided over and conducted by Federal Government officials, to go into politics, using the power of the bank to carry on a political propaganda.

I want to read what the Republican platform said in 1912 about the banking system. It contained this language:

This is the sentence I wish to read:

In attaining these ends the independence of individual banks, whether organized under national or State charters, must be carefully protected, and our banking and currency system must be safeguarded from any possibility of domination by sectional, financial, or political interests.

The Democratic platform said, that same year:

We believe the people of the country will be largely freed from panics and consequent unemployment and business depression by such a systematic revision of our banking laws as will render temporary relief in localities where such relief is needed, with protection from control or domination by what is known as the Money Trust.

Banks exist for the accommodation of the public, and not for the control of business. All legislation on the subject of banking and currency should have for its purpose the securing of these accommodations on terms of absolute security to the public and of complete protection from the misuse of the power that wealth gives to those who possess it.

Now I read from the Progressive Party's platform of the same year:

The control should be lodged with the Government and should be protected from domination or manipulation by Wall Street or any special interests.

Mr. President, all three of these parties, at the time the Federal reserve act was about to be enacted into law, expressed themselves as favoring an institution free from political manipulation. The Republican Party said that it should be kept free from the domination of political interests. The Democratic Party said it should be kept free from the misuse of this power and manipulation by the Money Trust. The Progressive Party said that it should be kept free from the domination of Wall Street.

The cry of the hour was for a banking system which would be free from political manipulation, a system which would serve the business needs of the country, which would assist the people in all sections of the country, regardless of politics, to carry on their business.

For a long time this Federal reserve banking system did that thing, but it got into politics and has been guilty of the things I have mentioned.

I want to read in this connection what President Wilson said as the candidate of the Democratic Party in 1912. He said:

It is the mere truth to say that the financial resources of the country are not at the command of those who do not submit to the direction and domination of small groups of capitalists who wish to keep the economic development of the country under their own eye and guidance. The great monopoly in this country is the monopoly of big credits. So long as that exists, our old variety of freedom and individual energy of development are out of the question. A great industrial nation is controlled by its system of credit. Our system of credit is privately concentrated. The growth of the Nation, therefore, and all our activities are in the hands of a few men. An invisible empire has been set up above the forms of democracy. We have been dreading all along the time when the combined power of high finance would be greater than the power of the Government. Have we come to the time when the President of the United States, or any man who wishes to be President, must doff his cap in the presence of this high finance and say, "You are our inevitable master, but we will see how we can make the best of it." We have restricted credit and control of development and we have come to be one of the worst ruled, one of the most completely controlled and dominated Governments in the world.

That was the language of the man who was elected President in 1912. He continues:

No longer a Government of free opinion; no longer a Government by conviction and the vote of the majority, but a Government by the opinion and duress of a small group of dominant men.

Mr. President, the great Federal reserve banking system was born out of a desire of the American people to set up an institution upon a hill far removed from the canon of special interests, far removed from the dictates of partisan politics, to serve and bless and benefit the whole American people. We brought such a banking system into being, and for nearly seven years that banking system worked in admirable fashion. That banking system met the requirement of every locality in the country. Whenever money was scarce in the North or West it went to the rescue and supplied it. Whenever money was scarce in the South it went to the rescue and supplied it. But in the spring of 1920 the deflation policy was born, born in the resolution introduced by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] in this Chamber, then in the advisory council of the Federal Reserve Board, and then in the board itself, and the wheels of this mighty engine of destruction started upon their way.

Mr. President, I have shown that this Money Trust, this Wall Street crowd, criticized in some way by all three of the parties in 1912, have again wormed their way into control, and they literally dominate the Federal Reserve Board to-day and have control of the Federal reserve banking system through that board.

I have dared to say that upon the floor of the Senate, and this system, under its board's direction, is circulating literature which replies to the speeches that I have made and is writing letters on that subject to the local banker, asking him how he feels upon the subject, calling upon him for an opinion; and yet these party platforms demanded that the individual bankers should be free and independent. Here is this bank in Atlanta seeking to influence the local banker who must come to it for accommodation in cash and credit.

Is that right? Is that fair? Is it just to the American people? Whose Government is this? In whose interest was this system created? Was it intended to be an instrument of torture in the hands of Wall Street or the Money Trust to smite the American people, to punish them, to rob them? That was not my intention when I helped to create it, but it has been perverted from the ends of its institution and is now working exactly as Wall Street would have it work.

Let me read to you a statement from the New York Wall Street Journal of February 25, 1922:

BROAD STREET GOSSIP.

While W. P. G. Harding, governor of the Federal Reserve Board, has won, by his masterful handling of the system during and after the war, many banking friends who hope to see him reappointed in August, when his term expires, advices reaching Wall Street are that a new man may be appointed to that important post.

Who is it congratulating Mr. Harding? Who is it that praises his administration of the Federal reserve system? It is the section of the United States that fed and fattened upon the substance of 100,000,000 people and made billions of dollars out of the deflation policy carried on by Gov. Harding and his board. That is who it is.

Mr. President, in my speech which was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to-day following the proceedings of the House I said that Gov. Strong, of the New York Federal Reserve Bank, had become the dominating power behind the Federal Reserve Board and that he was really the ruling power. Let me read further from the Wall Street Journal:

John R. Mitchell, the newest member of the Federal Reserve Board, is mentioned as a likely candidate for the office.

What office? The office of governor of the Federal Reserve Board, the office Gov. Harding now holds and has maladministered.

What further does the Wall Street Journal say?

Mr. Mitchell is a Republican. If politics count for anything, he may be chosen. Incidentally, he was in New York recently conferring with Benjamin Strong, governor of the New York Federal Reserve Bank.

Oh, Mr. President, the American people must wake up. They must know what is going on here. The governor of the New York Federal Reserve Bank, who, as I have said, is the dominating spirit, the controlling personality of this board, is conferred with by the man who is suggested as the successor of Gov. Harding. The man who is suggested by the Wall Street Journal as the possible successor of Gov. Harding is conferring with the kingmaker, Gov. Strong, no doubt getting in his good graces and seeking favor with him who manipulates and controls this mighty system that was intended to spread benefits and blessings throughout the Nation. I do not know Mr. Mitchell. He may be a very clever gentleman.

Mr. President, I made a motion here a few days ago in connection with the introduction of a resolution to investigate the activities of the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta in sending out this speech at the expense of a bank of the Government. I sought to have that resolution referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. By a majority of one that motion was defeated, and the money power triumphed, and that one vote was cast by Mr. NEWBERRY, of Michigan, the sale of whose seat was confirmed in this body a few days ago.

Mr. President, I objected to referring my resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency. I sought in the resolution to have a select committee of five appointed from the body of the Senate to pass upon the question involved in the resolution. I had a motive in that, and I had a right to have it because of the situation that existed. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency and it is his speech that is at the bottom of the investigation referred to in my resolution. He is a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and the chairman of that committee, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], congratulated the Senator from Virginia upon his speech assailing my position and me personally, and now the Republican Senate seeks to refer my resolution to that committee for consideration. I do not want it to go to that committee. It is not fair to me to send it to that committee. It is not fair to the millions of American people who have a right to have their banking system kept out of politics.

Mr. President, what is the first thing that happens in a courthouse when a case comes up to be tried where only local interests are involved between two or three or more individuals? When a juror appears to be selected to try the case the judge will ask him, "Have you any fixed opinion in this matter? Is there anything that would bias your judgment or your verdict? Are you related in any way to either party to this case? Have you expressed an opinion that would show that you would be biased?" When he says he has the judge will say, "Stand aside. You are not competent to sit as a juror in this case." They do that in civil cases as well as criminal cases.

Mr. President, I saw a judge who had practiced law in my town and who was elected to the bench. Cases came on to be tried before him in which he had been counsel. He called another lawyer to the bench and said, "I ask you to act as special judge, because I have been interested in this case; I have gone into the facts; in fact, I made an argument in the case at the other trial, and therefore I am not competent to sit. I want you, an unbiased man, to sit in judgment on the case." Here, however, in the Senate a fight has been going on to this hour, lasting for nearly a week now, to refer my resolution to investigate the activities of the officers of the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta in distributing a speech of a member of the Banking and Currency Committee, a speech which they had no business to distribute, using their power to carry on a political propaganda, and from the other side of the Chamber the insistence is made that the resolution must go to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. President, I do not know how Senators feel about this point. There is not a man or woman in this Republic who is honest and fair-minded who, knowing the facts, would say that it is right to refer my resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency under existing circumstances. I am a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry; I am a party to this controversy, and I would not have the resolution referred to a committee of which I am a member. If a motion were made to do so, I should rise in my place and say: "I am a member of that committee; I am a party to this controversy; I do not think the resolution ought to be referred to that committee, and I hope my friends will not insist on it." That is what I would say. It occurs to me, however, that Senators on the other side wish to have the resolution placed in the hands of a committee which is unfriendly to the very thing which I am trying to have done. Senators, that ought not to be the case. Some of these officers admit that they have written the letter which I have read to the Senate, that they are mailing it out to the banks, and not only to the banks but to the business men, to the merchants, and to the farmers. The editorial of the Atlanta Journal stated that they had sent it to farmers. Now, it is desired to investigate that matter.

It is stated in my resolution:

Whereas the Senate would regard with keen disapproval the attempt on the part of any one of the Federal reserve banks to use its power to influence or coerce politically any banker or anyone else in his district; and

Whereas Congress, in creating the Federal reserve banking system, desired and intended that it should, at all times, be kept free from political activities—

And so on. I have previously read the resolution, and it is printed in the RECORD in two or three places. Why is it that Senators will not consent that the matter which is involved in the resolution shall be acted upon in the open Senate and let the Presiding Officer appoint a committee on the subject? I do not think, in the light of the debate, that the Presiding Officer would place any Senator on the committee who is a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, or, at least, not more than one, for this matter affects vitally the very life of this Nation.

The Money Trust does not want this investigation to be made. The Money Trust at first tried to kill the Federal reserve system; but now it has swallowed up the Federal Reserve Board and it is now operating just as the Money Trust wants it to operate. So, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate, as in legislative session, may consider the pending motion before the Senate, which is the motion made by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE], to refer my resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent to consider, as in legislative session, the motion of the Senator from New Jersey to refer the resolution indicated by the Senator from Alabama to the Committee on Banking and Currency. Is there objection?

Mr. MOSES. I object, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, that makes two or three times the Senator from New Hampshire has objected to the consideration of this important resolution. I do not suppose he wishes it considered at all. He is fast getting himself into the class of those about whom I have been talking. If he prefers to get into that company and stay in it, I can not help it.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The action of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] is additional evidence that the friends of the policies of the Federal Reserve Board are afraid to debate. It will not be long before the whole country knows it, and the country does not admire men who are afraid to fight.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is all I have to say for the present, Mr. President. Under the objection that comes from the other side I can not have my resolution considered now.

TREATY WITH JAPAN.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty between the United States and Japan with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator, in particular the island of Yap, signed at Washington on February 11, 1922.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN].

Mr. MOSES. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Glass	McCormick	Sheppard
Ball	Gooding	McKinley	Shields
Borah	Hale	McNary	Simmons
Brandeggee	Harrell	Moses	Smith
Broussard	Harris	Nelson	Spencer

Fernald	Lenroot	Reed
France	Lodge	Robinson

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to announce that the following Senators are detained from the Senate on account of attendance on the Committee on Finance:

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, article 3 of the treaty provides that—

The United States and its nationals shall have free access to the island of Yap * * *

The second clause of the article further provides that—

The rights and privileges embraced by the preceding paragraph shall also be accorded to the Government of the United States and its nationals with respect to radiotelegraphic communication: Provided, however, That so long as the Government of Japan shall maintain on the island of Yap an adequate radiotelegraphic station, cooperating effectively with the cables and with other radio stations on ships or on shore, without discriminatory exactions or preferences, the exercise of the right to establish radiotelegraphic stations on the island by the United States or its nationals shall be suspended.

Plainly the right of the United States to enter upon the island of Yap and to establish radiotelegraphic stations on that island can not accrue until Japan has failed to maintain a service of the character specified.

There is, therefore, a question to decide, a question of fact, namely: Has Japan maintained service of a particular character? That being the case, if Japan were to say that she had maintained that character of service, and the United States were to declare that she had not maintained that character of service, the question could only be decided in one of two ways—that is, by the United States and Japan agreeing upon some third party to decide the dispute, or by the United States entering upon the island and proceeding to erect stations suitable for itself. In that event the United States would decide a disputed question of fact to suit itself.

I desire to employ no language that will seemingly be impolite toward others who may have spoken; but to assert that in any disputed question of fact between two people or two nations either one of the parties has the right to decide it for himself is to assert the absurd. Of course, we could decide it for ourselves by entering upon the island with armed force, upon a territory the sovereignty of which we are conceding to Japan, and we could remain there as long as we were able to do so by armed force; but every international question could be decided in that way, and the very purpose of treaties is to prevent that sort of decision. In the whole realm of international disputes there will not be found one precedent to sustain the doctrine that when a question of fact must be decided as a condition precedent to the existence of a right, one of the parties to the controversy has the right to decide that question to suit itself. No such precedent has been cited, and no such precedent can be cited from any work on international law or from any work on common law as to disputes between individuals. If we intend to reserve the right to decide this question for ourselves, we must so specify by apt and explicit language in the treaty itself.

I repeat that to say otherwise is to say that which is absurd. But, Mr. President, if the construction contended for is correct, then Japan can not complain if we write that construction specifically into the instrument; and those who stand here charged with the duty of protecting the United States clearly, if that be their construction, ought to be willing to place the construction in plain language upon the face of the instrument. It is not the construction which will be placed upon this treaty by Japan. It is not the construction which will be placed upon it by international lawyers. It is not the construction which will be placed upon it by the world. If, therefore, we propose to reserve these rights, we must do it in a specific statement, and make that statement a part of the instrument itself. The amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada proposes to do that, and it ought to be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN].

Mr. KELLOGG. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask that the amendment be again stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 4, at the end of article 3, after the word "suspended" and before the period, it is proposed to insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided further, That the United States shall be the exclusive judge as to whether the Government of Japan has maintained radiotelegraphic communication on the island of Yap as required in the foregoing proviso.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On this question the Senator from Minnesota demands the yeas and nays. Is the demand supported?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW], and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL] is absent on account of serious illness in his family. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. ERNST. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. FERNALD (after having voted in the negative). May I inquire whether the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. FERNALD. I have a pair with that Senator, and in his absence, I will have to withdraw my vote, being unable to get a transfer.

Mr. HALE (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD], and allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 54, as follows:

YEAS—29.

Ashurst	Glass	McKellar	Smith
Borah	Harris	Norris	Swanson
Broussard	Harrison	Overman	Walsh, Mass.
Caraway	Heflin	Pittman	Walsh, Mont.
Culberson	Hitchcock	Reed	Watson, Ga.

NOT VOTING—13.

Crow	Jones, N. Mex.	Ransdell	Trammell
du Pont	La Follette	Shields
Ernst	Owen	Stanfield
Fernald	Pepper	Stanley

So Mr. PITTMAN'S amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to article 3, which the Secretary will read.

The article was read as follows:

The United States and its nationals shall have free access to the island of Yap on a footing of entire equality with Japan or any other nation and their respective nationals in all that relates to the landing and operation of the existing Yap-Guam cable or of any cable which may hereafter be laid or operated by the United States or by its nationals connecting with the island of Yap.

The rights and privileges embraced by the preceding paragraph shall also be accorded to the Government of the United States and its nationals with respect to radiotelegraphic communication; provided, however, that so long as the Government of Japan shall maintain on the island of Yap an adequate radiotelegraphic station, co-operating effectively with the cables and with other radio stations on ships or on shore, without discriminatory exactions or preferences, the exercise of the right to establish radiotelegraphic stations on the island by the United States or its nationals shall be suspended.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). Although I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] I am at liberty to vote, and I vote "yea."

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. I have been informed that were he present he would vote for the treaties as they are now pending in the Senate. So I feel at liberty to vote without considering a transfer, and I vote "yea."

Mr. ERNST. I am advised that my pair, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], would vote as I shall vote, and therefore I will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL].

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW] would vote "yea" on this article.

Mr. HALE (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr.

SHIELDS] to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW], and allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 66, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—66.

Ball	Frelinghuysen	McNary	Smith

So article 3 was agreed to.

Article 4 was read and agreed to, as follows:

ARTICLE IV.

In connection with the rights embraced by Article III, specific rights, privileges, and exemptions in so far as they relate to electrical communications, shall be enjoyed in the island of Yap by the United States and its nationals in terms as follows:

(1) Nationals of the United States shall have the unrestricted right to reside in the island and the United States and its nationals shall have the right to acquire and hold on a footing of entire equality with Japan or any other nation or their respective nationals all kinds of property and interests, both personal and real, including lands, buildings, residences, offices, works, and appurtenances.

(2) Nationals of the United States shall not be obliged to obtain any permit or license in order to be entitled to land and operate cables on the island, or to establish radio-telegraphic service, subject to the provisions of Article III, or to enjoy any of the rights and privileges embraced by this article and by Article III.

(3) No censorship or supervision shall be exercised over cable or radio messages or operations.

(4) Nationals of the United States shall have complete freedom of entry and exit in the island for their persons and property.

(5) No taxes, port, harbor, or landing charges, or exactions of any nature whatsoever, shall be levied either with respect to the operation of cables or radio stations, or with respect to property, persons, or vessels.

(6) No discriminatory police regulations shall be enforced.

(7) The Government of Japan will exercise its power of expropriation in the island to secure to the United States or its nationals needed property and facilities for the purpose of electrical communications if such property or facilities can not otherwise be obtained.

It is understood that the location and the area of land so to be expropriated shall be arranged between the two Governments according to the requirements of each case. Property of the United States or of its nationals and facilities for the purpose of electrical communication in the island shall not be subject to expropriation.

Article 5 was read and agreed to, as follows:

ARTICLE V.

The present convention shall be ratified by the high contracting parties in accordance with their respective constitutions. The ratifications of this convention shall be exchanged in Washington as soon as practicable, and it shall take effect on the date of the exchange of the ratifications.

In witness whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this convention and have hereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at the city of Washington this 11th day of February, 1922.

The preamble was read and agreed to, as follows:

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND JAPAN.

Considering that by article 119 of the treaty of Versailles, signed on June 28, 1919, Germany renounced in favor of the powers described in that treaty as the principal allied and associated powers, to wit, the United States of America, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, all her rights and titles over her overseas possessions;

Considering that the benefits accruing to the United States under the aforesaid article 119 of the treaty of Versailles were confirmed by the treaty between the United States and Germany, signed on August 25, 1921, to restore friendly relations between the two nations;

Considering that the said four powers—to wit, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan—have agreed to confer upon His Majesty the Emperor of Japan a mandate, pursuant to the treaty of Versailles, to administer the groups of the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator, in accordance with the following provisions:

"ARTICLE 1. The islands over which a mandate is conferred upon His Majesty the Emperor of Japan (hereinafter called the mandatory) comprise all the former German islands situated in the Pacific Ocean and lying north of the Equator.

"ART. 2. The mandatory shall have full power of administration and legislation over the territory subject to the present mandate as an integral portion of the Empire of Japan, and may apply the laws of the Empire of Japan to the territory, subject to such local modifications as circumstances may require. The mandatory shall promote to the utmost the material and moral well-being and the social progress of the inhabitants of the territory subject to the present mandate.

"ART. 3. The mandatory shall see that the slave trade is prohibited and that no forced labor is permitted, except for essential public works and services, and then only for adequate remuneration. The mandatory shall also see that the traffic in arms and ammunition is controlled in accordance with principles analogous to those laid down in the convention relating to the control of the arms traffic signed on September 10, 1919, or in any convention amending same. The supply of intoxicating spirits and beverages to the natives shall be prohibited.

"ART. 4. The military training of the natives, otherwise than for purposes of internal police and the local defense of the territory, shall be prohibited. Furthermore, no military or naval bases shall be established or fortifications erected in the territory.

"ART. 5. Subject to the provisions of any local law for the maintenance of public order and public morals, the mandatory shall insure in the territory freedom of conscience and the free exercise of all forms of worship, and shall allow all missionaries, nationals of any State member of the League of Nations, to enter into, travel, and reside in the territory for the purpose of prosecuting their calling.

"ART. 6. The mandatory shall make to the council of the League of Nations an annual report to the satisfaction of the council, containing full information with regard to the territory and indicating the measures taken to carry out the obligations assumed under articles 2, 3, 4, and 5.

"ART. 7. The consent of the council of the League of Nations is required for any modification of the terms of the present mandate. The mandatory agrees that if any dispute whatever should arise between the mandatory and another member of the League of Nations relating to the interpretation or the application of the provisions of the mandate, such dispute, if it can not be settled by negotiation, shall be submitted to the Permanent Court of International Justice provided for by article 14 of the covenant of the League of Nations";

Considering that the United States did not ratify the treaty of Versailles and did not participate in the agreement respecting the aforesaid mandate:

Desiring to reach a definite understanding with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the aforesaid islands, and in particular the island of Yap, have resolved to conclude a convention for that purpose and to that end have named as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America: Charles Evans Hughes, Secretary of State of the United States; and

His Majesty the Emperor of Japan: Baron Kijuro Shidehara, His Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary at Washington;

Who, after having communicated to each other their respective full powers, found to be in good and due form, have agreed as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution of ratification will be read.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. PITTMAN. Is it in order now to present a proposed reservation?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order would be to read the resolution, and then to have reservations presented.

Mr. LODGE. Let the resolution be read.

The resolution of ratification reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations was read, as follows:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive R, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session, a treaty between the United States and Japan with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator, in particular the island of Yap, signed at Washington on February 11, 1922.

Mr. PITTMAN. I offer the reservation which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the reservation.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Add, at the end of the resolution, the following words:

The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide at any time whether the Government of Japan has maintained or is maintaining on the island of Yap an adequate radiotelegraphic station cooperating effectively with the cables and with the other radio stations on ships and on shore, and whether said cable service is being conducted without discriminatory exactions or preferences and in accord with the proviso set forth in article 3.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, this reservation embodies the same proposition as the amendment which was offered by me and defeated. It is intended, I think, as the words indicate, to make clear the meaning of the proviso in article 3, where it is provided that the rights of the United States and its nationals shall be suspended during the time the Japanese Government or its nationals satisfactorily—I am not using the exact language—furnish an aerial radio system. I offer the reservation for the purpose of making it emphatic and certain that the privileges asserted under that proviso by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]—that is, the privilege to determine ourselves when the service of the Japanese is not adequate. I do not know of any objection they have made to this provision except that on the former occasion it was offered as an amendment. I offer it now as a reservation, as an expression of our understanding of the proviso.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I hope the reservation will be rejected.

Mr. PITTMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as that heretofore made with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL].

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 56, as follows:

So Mr. PITTMAN's reservation to the resolution of ratification was rejected.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I present the following reservation to the resolution of ratification.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed reservation will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. At the end of the resolution add the following:

The United States so understands and construes section 3 of article 2 to mean that all the rights and privileges guaranteed to citizens of the United States in territory controlled by the Japanese Empire, and particularly by the commercial treaty between said Governments entered into in the year 1911 anno Domini, extend to all of the mandated islands herein described, and particularly the island of Yap, and that the said rights and privileges so guaranteed are not to be considered as limited or abridged by any of the provisions of this treaty.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the same provision was offered yesterday by me in the form of an amendment to section 3 of article 2, the objection then made to it being that it was an amendment and not a reservation, and that as an amendment it would require further negotiation. Section 3, to which the reservation refers, reads as follows:

Existing treaties between the United States and Japan shall be applicable to the mandated islands.

Those treaties have been read into the Record by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. They extend to American citizens' rights in Japan equal to the rights of the nationals of Japan in the United States, with the exception probably of the ownership of property. The question is whether or not the special references to rights of American citizens with regard to Yap in this treaty limit the rights guaranteed in the general treaties to which I have referred.

The reservation simply says that the United States understands that the general rights and privileges granted United States citizens under the treaty between Japan and the United States of 1911 extend to these mandated islands and are not limited by any special expressions in the existing treaty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the reservation offered by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). I make the same announcement that I made before as to my pair and its transfer, and I vote "nay."

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL].

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 58, as follows:

So Mr. PITTMAN's reservation to the resolution of ratification was rejected.

Mr. PITTMAN. I offer the reservation which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reservation proposed by the Senator from Nevada will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the resolution of ratification the following words:

The United States understands and construes section 2 of article 2 to mean that "Vested American property rights" includes leases, licenses, franchises, and other rights obtained by the United States or its nationals from the former Imperial German Empire during the period of time that said Empire was exerting sovereignty over said islands.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the reservation proposed by the Senator from Nevada.

The reservation was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of ratification.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Has the treaty been disposed of now except the final vote on ratification?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been.

Mr. KING. I offer the reservation which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reservation will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. At the end of the resolution of ratification it is proposed to add the following:

That the United States understands and construes said treaty to mean that Japan holds the islands referred to therein under and pursuant to the terms of the treaty of Versailles, including the covenant of the League of Nations; and the United States in the ratification of this treaty does not concede, but upon the contrary denies, that Japan holds said islands as a sovereign nation with an unqualified, absolute, and indefeasible title, and declares that in dealing with said islands and in its relations to them and to their inhabitants, Japan occupies the position of a trustee as defined and determined in said Versailles treaty and the provisions of the covenant of the League of Nations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the reservation proposed by the Senator from Utah.

The reservation was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of ratification.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, is the treaty still being considered as in Committee of the Whole? I may be mistaken, but the rule of the Senate provides:

When a treaty is reported from a committee with or without amendment, it shall, unless the Senate unanimously otherwise direct, lie one day for consideration—

That action has been taken—after which it may be read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Has the Chair made the announcement that the treaty has passed from the Committee of the Whole into the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not done so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Well, what is the situation? Is the treaty still in the Committee of the Whole and open to reservation or is it in the Senate and open to reservation, or is it not?

Mr. LODGE. The rule is that after the treaty reaches the Senate it has passed beyond the stage of amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have asked two questions. The first is, is the treaty still in the Committee of the Whole? If not, is it in the Senate? Then, if it is in the Senate, is it open to further reservation? Where is the treaty—in the Committee of the Whole or in the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that treaties have been considered sometimes in one way and sometimes in the other. In the opinion of the Chair, the treaty should be considered as in Committee of the Whole, and the Chair so rules.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I had assumed that the treaty had been up to this time considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it passes to the Senate, as I understand, whenever the Chair says, "If there is no further reservation, the treaty will be reported to the Senate."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the treaty will be reported to the Senate.

The treaty was reported to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The treaty is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I beg pardon of the Chair, but I desire further to call attention to the rule, which provides:

The decisions thus made shall be reduced to the form of a resolution of ratification, with or without amendments, as the case may be, which shall be proposed on a subsequent day, unless, by unanimous consent, the Senate determines otherwise, at which stage no amendment shall be received, unless by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If no amendment is proposed, the question is on agreeing to the resolution of ratification.

Mr. PITTMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President. The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). As previously stated, I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], who, I understand, if present, would vote as I am about to vote on this question. Therefore I feel at liberty to vote, and vote "yea."

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], but on this question the Senator from Oklahoma, as I am informed, would vote as I am about to vote. Therefore I am at liberty to vote, and vote "yea."

Mr. ERNST (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], but on this question I am permitted to vote, and vote "yea."

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], both of whom, if present, would vote "yea." I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to announce that, as heretofore stated, my colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL] is absent on account of illness in his family. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE. I desire to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW], both of whom are necessarily absent from the Senate, if present, would vote "yea."

The yeas and nays resulted—yeas 67, nays 22, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the question of agreeing to the resolution of ratification the yeas are 67 and the nays are 22. Two-thirds of the Senators present having voted in the affirmative, the resolution is agreed to, and the Senate advises and consents to the ratification of the treaty.

The treaty as ratified is as follows:

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND JAPAN.

Considering that by article 119 of the treaty of Versailles, signed on June 28, 1919, Germany renounced in favor of the powers described in that treaty as the principal allied and associated powers, to wit, the United States of America, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, all her rights and titles over her overseas possessions;

Considering that the benefits accruing to the United States under the aforesaid article 119 of the treaty of Versailles were confirmed by the treaty between the United States and Germany, signed on August 25, 1921, to restore friendly relations between the two nations;

Considering that the said four powers, to wit, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, have agreed to confer upon His Majesty the Emperor of Japan a mandate, pursuant to the treaty of Versailles, to administer the groups of the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator in accordance with the following provisions:

"ARTICLE I. The islands over which a mandate is conferred upon His Majesty the Emperor of Japan (hereinafter called the mandatory) comprise all the former German islands situated in the Pacific Ocean and lying north of the Equator.

"ART. 2. The mandatory shall have full power of administration and legislation over the territory subject to the present mandate as an integral portion of the Empire of Japan, and may apply the laws of the Empire of Japan to the territory, subject to such local modifications as circumstances may require. The mandatory shall promote to the utmost the material and moral well-being and the social progress of the inhabitants of the territory subject to the present mandate.

"ART. 3. The mandatory shall see that the slave trade is prohibited and that no forced labor is permitted, except for essential public works and services, and then only for adequate remuneration. The mandatory shall also see that the traffic in arms and ammunition is controlled in accordance with principles analogous to those laid down in the convention relating to the control of the arms traffic signed on September 10, 1919, or in any convention amending same. The supply of intoxicating spirits and beverages to the natives shall be prohibited.

"ART. 4. The military training of the natives, otherwise than for purposes of internal police and the local defense of the territory, shall be prohibited. Furthermore, no military or naval bases shall be established or fortifications erected in the territory.

"ART. 5. Subject to the provisions of any local law for the maintenance of public order and public morals, the mandatory shall insure in the territory freedom of conscience and the free exercise of all forms of worship, and shall allow all missionaries, nationals of any State member of the League of Nations, to enter into, travel, and reside in the territory for the purpose of prosecuting their calling.

"ART. 6. The mandatory shall make to the council of the League of Nations an annual report to the satisfaction of the council, containing full information with regard to the territory and indicating the measures taken to carry out the obligations assumed under articles 2, 3, 4, and 5.

"ART. 7. The consent of the council of the League of Nations is required for any modification of the terms of the present mandate. The mandatory agrees that if any dispute whatever should arise between the mandatory and another member of the League of Nations relating to the interpretation or the application of the provisions of the mandate, such dispute, if it can not be settled by negotiation, shall be submitted to the permanent court of international justice provided for by article 14 of the covenant of the League of Nations";

Considering that the United States did not ratify the treaty of Versailles and did not participate in the agreement respecting the aforesaid mandate;

Desiring to reach a definite understanding with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the aforesaid islands, and in particular the island of Yap, have resolved to conclude a convention for that purpose and to that end have named as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America: Charles Evans Hughes, Secretary of State of the United States; and

His Majesty the Emperor of Japan: Baron Kijuro Shidehara, His Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary at Washington;

Who, after having communicated to each other their respective full powers, found to be in good and due form, have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE I.

Subject to the provisions of the present convention, the United States consents to the administration by Japan, pursuant to the aforesaid mandate, of all the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean lying north of the Equator.

ARTICLE II.

The United States and its nationals shall receive all the benefits of the engagements of Japan defined in articles 3, 4, and 5 of the aforesaid mandate, notwithstanding the fact that the United States is not a member of the League of Nations.

It is further agreed between the high contracting parties as follows:

(1) Japan shall insure in the islands complete freedom of conscience and the free exercise of all forms of worship which are consonant with public order and morality; American missionaries of all such religions shall be free to enter the islands and to travel and reside therein, to acquire and possess property, to erect religious buildings and to open schools throughout the islands, it being understood, however, that Japan shall have the right to exercise such control as may be necessary for the maintenance of public order and good government and to take all measures required for such control.

(2) Vested American property rights in the mandated islands shall be respected and in no way impaired;

(3) Existing treaties between the United States and Japan shall be applicable to the mandated islands;

(4) Japan will address to the United States a duplicate of the annual report on the administration of the mandate to be made by Japan to the council of the League of Nations.

(5) Nothing contained in the present convention shall be affected by any modification which may be made in the terms of the mandate as recited in the convention, unless such modification shall have been expressly assented to by the United States.

ARTICLE III.

The United States and its nationals shall have free access to the island of Yap on a footing of entire equality with Japan or any other nation and their respective nationals in all that relates to the landing and operation of the existing Yap-Guam cable or of any cable which may hereafter be laid or operated by the United States or by its nationals connecting with the island of Yap.

The rights and privileges embraced by the preceding paragraph shall also be accorded to the Government of the United States and its nationals with respect to radiotelegraphic communication; provided, however, that so long as the Government of Japan shall maintain on the island of Yap an adequate radiotelegraphic station, cooperating effectively with the cables and with other radio stations on ships or on shore, without discriminatory exactions or preferences, the exercise of the right to establish radiotelegraphic stations on the island by the United States or its nationals shall be suspended.

ARTICLE IV.

In connection with the rights embraced by article 3, specific rights, privileges, and exemptions, in so far as they relate to electrical communications, shall be enjoyed in the island of Yap by the United States and its nationals in terms as follows:

(1) Nationals of the United States shall have the unrestricted right to reside in the island, and the United States and its nationals shall have the right to acquire and hold on a footing of entire equality with Japan or any other nation or their respective nationals all kinds of property and interests, both personal and real, including lands, buildings, residences, offices, works, and appurtenances.

(2) Nationals of the United States shall not be obliged to obtain any permit or license in order to be entitled to land and operate cables on the island, or to establish radiotelegraphic service, subject to the provisions of article 3, or to enjoy any of the rights and privileges embraced by this article and by article 3.

(3) No censorship or supervision shall be exercised over cable or radio messages or operations.

(4) Nationals of the United States shall have complete freedom of entry and exit in the island for their persons and property.

(5) No taxes, port, harbor, or landing charges or exactions of any nature whatsoever shall be levied either with respect to the operation of cables or radio stations or with respect to property, persons, or vessels.

(6) No discriminatory police regulations shall be enforced.

(7) The Government of Japan will exercise its power of expropriation in the island to secure to the United States or its nationals needed property and facilities for the purpose of electrical communications if such property or facilities can not otherwise be obtained.

It is understood that the location and the area of land so to be expropriated shall be arranged between the two Governments according to the requirements of each case. Property of the United States or of its nationals and facilities for the purpose of electrical communication in the island shall not be subject to expropriation.

ARTICLE V.

The present convention shall be ratified by the high contracting parties in accordance with their respective constitutions. The ratifications of this convention shall be exchanged in Washington as soon as practicable, and it shall take effect on the date of the exchange of the ratifications.

In witness whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this convention and have hereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at the city of Washington, this 11th day of February, 1922.

CHARLES EVANS HUGHES.
K. SHIDEHARA.

IN EXECUTIVE SESSION,
Senate of the United States.

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive R. Sixty-seventh Congress, second session, a treaty between the United States and Japan with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the former German islands in the Pacific Ocean, lying north of the Equator, in particular the island of Yap, signed at Washington on February 11, 1922.

THE FOUR-POWER TREATY.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I now call up the four-power treaty relating to Pacific possessions, and ask that it be read.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and in open executive session, proceeded to consider the treaty, which was read, as follows:

EXECUTIVE N.

TREATY SUBMITTED BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES, THE BRITISH EMPIRE, FRANCE, AND JAPAN, RELATING TO THEIR INSULAR POSSESSIONS AND THEIR INSULAR DOMINIONS IN THE PACIFIC.

The United States of America, the British Empire, France, and Japan.

With a view to the preservation of the general peace and the maintenance of their rights in relation to their insular possessions and, insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean.

Have determined to conclude a treaty of this effect and have appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America: Charles Evans Hughes, Henry Cabot Lodge, Oscar W. Underwood, and Elihu Root, citizens of the United States;

His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the seas, Emperor of India: The Right Hon. Arthur James Balfour O. M., M. P., Lord President of His Privy Council; the Right Hon. Baron Lee of Fareham, G. B. E., K. C. B., First Lord of His Admiralty; the Right Hon. Sir Auckland Campbell Geddes, K. C. B., His Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to the United States of America;

And—

For the Dominion of Canada: The Right Hon. Robert Laird Borden, G. C. M. G., K. C.;

For the Commonwealth of Australia: The Hon. George Foster Pearce, Minister of Defense;

For the Dominion of New Zealand: Sir John William Salmond, K. C., judge of the Supreme Court of New Zealand;

For the Union of South Africa: The Right Hon. Arthur James Balfour, O. M., M. P.;

For India: The Right Hon. Valingman Sankaranarayana Srinivasa Sastri, member of the Indian Council of State;

The President of the French Republic: Mr. René Viviani, deputy, former president of the Council of Ministers; Mr. Albert Sarraut, deputy, Minister of the Colonies; Mr. Jules J. Jusserand, ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States of America, Grand Cross of the National Order of the Legion of Honor;

His Majesty the Emperor of Japan: Baron Tomosaburo Kato, minister for the navy, Junii, a member of the First Class of the Imperial Order of the Grand Cordon of the Rising Sun with the Paulownia Flower; Baron Kijuro Shidehara, his ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary at Washington, Joshii, a member of the First Class of the Imperial Order of the Rising Sun; Prince Iyesato Tokugawa, Junii, a member of the First Class of the Imperial Order of the Rising Sun; Mr. Masanao Hanihara, vice minister for foreign affairs, Jushii, a member of the Second Class of the Imperial Order of the Rising Sun;

Who, having communicated their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed as follows:

I.

The high contracting parties agree as between themselves to respect their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean.

If there should develop between any of the high contracting parties a controversy arising out of any Pacific question and involving their said rights which is not satisfactorily settled by diplomacy and is likely to affect the harmonious accord now happily subsisting between them, they shall invite the other high contracting parties to a joint conference to which the whole subject will be referred for consideration and adjustment.

II.

If the said rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power, the high contracting parties shall communicate with one another fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the exigencies of the particular situation.

III.

This treaty shall remain in force for 10 years from the time it shall take effect, and after the expiration of said period it shall continue to be in force subject to the right of any of the high contracting parties to terminate it upon 12 months' notice.

IV.

This treaty shall be ratified as soon as possible in accordance with the constitutional methods of the high contracting parties and shall take effect on the deposit of ratifications, which shall take place at Washington, and thereupon the agreement between Great Britain and Japan, which was concluded at London on July 13, 1911, shall terminate. The Government of the United States will transmit to all the signatory powers a certified copy of the proces-verbal of the deposit of ratifications.

The present treaty, in French and in English, shall remain deposited in the archives of the Government of the United States, and duly certified copies thereof will be transmitted by that Government to each of the signatory powers.

In faith whereof the above-named plenipotentiaries have signed the present treaty.

Done at the city of Washington the 13th day of December, 1921.

In signing the treaty this day between the United States of America, the British Empire, France, and Japan it is declared to be the understanding and intent of the signatory powers:

1. That the treaty shall apply to the mandated islands in the Pacific Ocean: Provided, however, That the making of the treaty shall not be deemed to be an assent on the part of the United States of America to the mandates and shall not preclude agreements between the United States of America and the mandatory powers respectively in relation to the mandated islands.

2. That the controversies to which the second paragraph of Article I refers shall not be taken to embrace questions which according to principles of international law lie exclusively within the domestic jurisdiction of the respective powers.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Committee on Foreign Relations reports the following resolution of ratification:

"Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive N, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session, a treaty between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan relating to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the Pacific Ocean, concluded at Washington, December 13, 1921, subject to the following reservation and understanding, which is hereby made a part and condition of this resolution of ratification:

"The United States understands that under the statement in the preamble or under the terms of this treaty there is no commitment to armed force, no alliance, no obligation to join in any defense."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether he intends to consider at the same time the second treaty that was made?

Mr. LODGE. Of course, it is part of the same transaction.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suppose it would have to be considered in connection with it by unanimous consent; but I suggest if unanimous consent can be obtained that we consider both treaties now.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent for the reading of the supplementary treaty, so that that may be before the Senate at the same time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. Let it be read before consent is given.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request was for unanimous consent that it be read.

Mr. REED. I understood the request was that it be considered. I have no objection to its being read, of course.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, I have no doubt the Senator from Massachusetts meant that it should be considered along with this treaty. It would require two votes, of course.

Mr. LODGE. Of course. It is a separate proposition. I did not expect the Senate to vote upon them together.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The first treaty had the homeland of Japan in it. The second treaty merely leaves it out—that is all—and the same question is involved in both.

Mr. REED. I simply asked that it be read before the consent was requested in order that we might know absolutely what was before us.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The supplementary treaty will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

EXECUTIVE O.

FOUR POWERS SUPPLEMENTARY AGREEMENT—AGREEMENT SUBMITTED BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES, THE BRITISH EMPIRE, FRANCE, AND JAPAN, SUPPLEMENTARY TO THE TREATY BETWEEN THE SAME FOUR POWERS RELATING TO THEIR INSULAR POSSESSIONS AND THEIR INSULAR DOMINIONS, AND DEFINING THE APPLICATION OF THE TERM "INSULAR POSSESSIONS AND INSULAR DOMINIONS" AS RELATING TO JAPAN.

The United States of America, the British Empire, France, and Japan have, through their respective plenipotentiaries, agreed upon the following stipulations supplementary to the quadruple treaty signed at Washington on December 13, 1921:

The term "insular possessions and insular dominions" used in the aforesaid treaty shall, in its application to Japan, include only Karafuto (or the southern portion of the island of Sakhalin), Formosa and the Pescadores, and the islands under the mandate of Japan.

The present agreement shall have the same force and effect as the said treaty to which it is supplementary.

The provisions of article 4 of the aforesaid treaty of December 13, 1921, relating to ratification shall be applicable to the present agreement, which in French and English shall remain deposited in the archives of the Government of the United States, and duly certified copies thereof shall be transmitted by that Government to each of the other contracting powers.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present agreement.

Done at the city of Washington the 6th day of February, 1922.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). The treaty is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the question is on agreeing to article 1.

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President; the Senator from Massachusetts made a request, which has not been acted upon, that the two treaties be considered together.

Mr. LODGE. Technically, of course, we can not consider two treaties at once. I was only desirous to have them read, so that they might both be before the Senate at the same time for consideration.

Mr. REED. I had understood the request to be that they should be considered at the same time, but of course separate votes would have to be taken. I have no objection to that course.

Mr. LODGE. I did not mean that they should be voted on, of course, at the same time, but that they might be considered together.

Mr. REED. I have no objection to that.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am perfectly ready and very glad to go on with this treaty at once; but unless some Senator desires to discuss it now I shall ask that an opportunity may be given the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to present a proposed change in the rules which ought to be made on account of the new rules of the House in regard to appropriations and the different distribution of appropriation bills.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. KING. If that is done, may it be understood that this treaty will not be taken up until to-morrow?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. It was my plan not to take it up until to-morrow; but I shall be glad if the matter of the consideration of appropriation bills, which ought to be considered at once, and is made necessary by the Budget and the changes it involves, can be disposed of. I yield for that purpose. I should not care to yield for anything else.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, has notice been given of the proposed change?

Mr. CURTIS. Notice was given; the report was made; notice was given that it would be taken up, and Senators on the other side have been advised about it through their committees, and I think they are ready to go on with it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I gave notice some days ago that upon the conclusion of the consideration by the Senate of the treaty that has just been disposed of I should ask the Senate to consider what is commonly known as the judges' bill, providing for the appointment of a number of additional district judges. I recognize, however, that it is highly important that the rule proposed by the Senator from Kansas be acted upon, in order that appropriation bills may proceed with some knowledge and certainty with respect to the composition of the committees which shall consider them.

As far as I am concerned, I am inclined to yield the position I hoped I might occupy to the Senator from Kansas with his rule, for I think that is more imperative; but I renew my notice that I intend to bring forward this measure at the first moment it is possible for me to do so.

Mr. FLETCHER. Does the Senator propose to ask the Senate to go on with his measure to-morrow, or will we go on with the treaty to-morrow?

Mr. LODGE. I expect to ask the Senate to go on with the treaty to-morrow. I shall move to go into open executive session to-morrow.

Mr. FLETCHER. If we go on with the resolution referred to by the Senator from Kansas we will have to proceed to the consideration of legislative business, because we are now in executive session.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; we will have to proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate resume legislative session with a view to considering the resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator from Kansas yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

OPINIONS UNDER THE TRANSPORTATION ACT, 1920 (S. DOC. NO. 140).

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, on Monday last, February 27, 1922, the Supreme Court announced two opinions (Nos. 206 and 283, October term, 1921) in cases arising under the transportation act of 1920, construing certain paragraphs or sections of that act. There are a great many applications for copies of these opinions, and I ask unanimous consent that these two opinions be printed as a public document in large type.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ADDRESS BY THE VICE PRESIDENT.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, on the 22d of February the Vice President delivered an address before Johns Hopkins University. I ask unanimous consent that the address may be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

At Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, Md., Wednesday, February 22, 1922, Vice President CALVIN COOLIDGE spoke as follows:

"This is a day which destiny has dedicated to a larger freedom. It takes us back to the early eighteenth century. That period was marked as one of preparation rather than attainment. Both before it and after it the manifest course of history touched a higher crest. Marlborough, the victor of Blenheim, had just departed from the scene. George II, who, with his grandson George III, was destined to reign over the British Empire for almost 100 years, had just come to the throne. Men were still living whose fathers might have known Shakespeare and Milton, might have followed Cromwell at Marston Moor and Dunbar, or might have seen the Mayflower as she carried her passengers forth upon a journey which they have not yet completed, and men were living whose sons were to stand at Concord Bridge; were to write the Declaration of Independence and adopt the American Constitution; were to take part in the French Revolution and behold the triumphs of Napoleon end at Waterloo; and finally were to see that century which this day began in 1732 close in 1832 with the parliamentary reform bill. It was to be a century of most remarkable achievements, and if its beginning was not heralded by brilliant events, it held one significant fact. Robert Walpole was prime minister. George II might reign, but he ruled. He was the first of the great commoners, a forerunner of Pitts and Gladstones in the Old World, and in the new of plain men who would rise to even greater eminence. In the Colonies legislative assemblies chosen by popular vote were slowly gaining in their claim of independence. While the people had not yet come to the full exercise of their liberties, they had reached the power to administer, and would soon be seeking the power to control their Governments.

"It was during this century that the true purpose of America began to be revealed. As we behold it, our patience ought to be increased, our faith strengthened, and our belief in human progress reaffirmed. Whatever this might require is more than supplied as we contemplate the birth of George Washington, with all that it has come to mean.

"Nations do not come into existence without a purpose. The world soon casts aside organizations which do not minister to its welfare. As we examine the course of known history, as we trace the progress of the race, as we see the problems of existence which had been met and solved by past civilization, and then as we learn of the discovery of a new continent and come to know the cause of its early settlement and mark the spirit of its institutions, there is disclosed to us the meaning and the purpose of our own Nation. In the fullness of time America was called into being under the most favoring circumstances to work out the problem of a more perfect relationship among mankind, that government and society might be brought into harmony with reason and with conscience. The great events and the great men of our country are those who have made the largest contribution to this purpose. The method by which men have always advanced this cause, the only method by which they ever can advance it, is through service and sacrifice. There can be no great people who are not willing to dedicate themselves to this high purpose.

"It was this spirit in the Pilgrim and the Puritan which has drawn to them the admiration of three centuries. For all of them the comfort of the most highly civilized society at home was open, for many of them the enjoyment of wealth and place, reaching up to the splendor of the court; all these were cast aside that they might leave tyranny behind and found a free State amid the hardships of the wilderness where that which they believed and which they held sacred might have broader scope. Nor was it of themselves even then that they thought most. Believing in piety, they formed their church. Believing in freedom and equality, they did not scruple to pay the price for their maintenance. 'Every township,' their early law decreed, 'after the Lord hath increased them to the number of 50 householders shall appoint one to teach all children to write and read; and when any town shall increase to the number of a hundred families they shall set up a grammar school.' To such a people liberty was a birthright and independence could not be long denied.

"But there was that in the experience of colonial life which brought those who crossed the sea from a somewhat different motive to the same conclusion when they considered their rights were in danger. There had been bred in the English through the centuries which disappear from view in their old German home a genius for local self-government and an intolerance of foreign interference. If the Pilgrims had landed with a miniature but none the less complete charter of democracy in the Mayflower compact, the early settlers of Virginia, landing with a royal charter, were none the less determined to maintain their rights. They early established a free government under an assembly, now one of the oldest legislative bodies in the world which has been in continual session.

"It is not my purpose to trace in detail the well-known course which led up to the American Revolution. A misguided ministry, under a despotic King, secured from a servile Parliament the passage of laws regulating and imposing stamp taxes on the commerce of the Colonies. There was never any objection to granting such supplies as were requested, however large, but there was every objection to the imposition of any unlawful tax, however small. But a Government which openly flouted public opinion at home was likely to pay even less attention to public opinion in the Colonies. These acts were recognized, however, as a direct challenge to the rights of the subjects of the realm everywhere. The Assembly of Virginia led in declaring such taxes unconstitutional and Massachusetts followed. The great Pitt supported their opposition in Parliament. 'Sir, I rejoice,' he said, 'that America has resisted. Three millions of people, so dead to all the feelings of liberty as voluntarily to submit to be slaves, would have been fit instruments to make slaves of the rest.' He saw that it was not merely the freedom of the Colonies but the freedom of all the realm which was in danger.

"Although these taxes were modified under the stress of fear and open rebellion, the right to their imposition was declared and reasserted in a vexatious tax on tea. When this was resisted a fatuous and tyrannical King resorted to repression by force. 'The colonists must either triumph or submit,' he declared. They did not submit. They answered force with force. They would live free or, in resisting usurpation, they would die.

"What began in the assertion of constitutional rights ended in the assertion of national sovereignty. If the right of local self-government, if the dearest of all privileges which Englishmen held as their heritage, that of paying no taxes which they themselves had not imposed, could not be guaranteed them under the ancient kingdom, the time had come for them to establish a new nation. This they proceeded to do, concluding the great declaration with these impressive words: 'We, therefore, the representatives of the United States of America, in general Congress assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the name and by the authority of the good people of these Colonies, solemnly publish and declare that these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States.'

"That which has raised this declaration to the dignity which it holds among the people of the earth is the genius of George Washington. He did not create the American spirit, but he organized it, he led it, he translated it from solemn declaration into effective action. The words of the delegates were impressive in Congress because they were supported by the Army of Washington in the field. It was some 15 months from that morning when patriot blood stained Lexington Green to the day when the Liberty Bell first rang in Philadelphia. Some 15 months away lay Saratoga, a purely American victory, which has been marked as one of a few decisive battles in all history. It was not in high-sounding phrase or in the voting of resolutions that the Revolution was made or won, but in the service and sacrifice of the people in their homes and, above all, of the Army in the field.

"It was not the declaration but the Army which resisted tyranny, which, breaking the power of the King to impose his unlawful will upon the people of the Colonies, broke his power to impose an unlawful will upon the people of the realm, and which, preserving the ancient freedom of Englishmen in America, preserved the ancient freedom of Englishmen at home. That army was George Washington. Under him the Americans made a sacrifice for liberty which was not local; it was universal. That sacrifice resisted then, and has ever since been successfully resisting despotism everywhere. America in its beginnings was doing the work of the world.

"True greatness can not rest merely on a negative. The fame of Washington would be very great if it ended at Yorktown, but both in what he refrained from doing and in what he did after that great event, his fame increases beyond that of a great soldier, which is shared by many, into that of a great statesman, which is shared by few, and rises to the height of a great patriot, which is shared by no one. Washington was first of all an American. He did not refuse the help of foreigners. When, some three years after the conflict began, France made common cause against England, he accepted their assistance gladly and always with the deepest sense of appreciation. But he declared that if the cause were to be won it must be won by Americans relying on themselves. It was this truly American view which not only saved the Revolution but, after its conclusion, saved what it had won. Washington was a nationalist. That principle lay at the foundation of all his statesmanship. Through the long responsibility of the war he came to know, as no one else could know, the weakness to resist evil of 13 separate colonies and the power to do good of a united nation. It was the intellectual force of Hamilton which produced the plans and poured forth the arguments, but it was the character of Washington which secured the adoption of the American Constitution. Where Caesar and Napoleon failed, where even Cromwell faltered, Washington alone prevailed. He wished the people of his country to be great, but great in their own right. He resisted the proposal that he should be set up to rule them. He adopted the proposal that they should be organized to rule themselves. He carried these principles through to the end. Later, when some of his countrymen insisted on adhering to the cause of France, while others insisted on adhering to the cause of England, he insisted on adhering to the cause of America and with patience and greatness, which were sublime, himself bore the resulting abuse of his country for his country's good.

"He was a practical man. If he engaged himself little in proclamation, he engaged himself much in action. To him the Revolution meant an Army in the field able to win victories. Knowing where that would lead, he made no haste to claim independence. He made an independent Nation. He established a Republic under the Constitution, and through two terms as President made its Government a reality, with strength enough to preserve order, with honesty enough to meet its financial obligations, and with character enough to win the respect of the world. From henceforth all men, from the most absolute monarch to the most abject subject, were to reckon with what Americans had done and what their country had come to mean.

"Under Washington, nationality became an accomplished fact. There were those who resisted it then, there were those who would resist it later through the promulgation of resolutions and finally by force of arms. There were those at home, not confined to any one section, and there were enemies of republican institutions abroad who, for their own selfish reasons, were willing to see the great experiment of self-government fail. But it was not to fail. It was not to diminish. It was to succeed. It was to increase. It was to become all free. We are not to criticize the fathers because they did not abolish slavery. Progress goes forward step by step. They took their step and in the pathway of humanity it has a measurement of great length. If they could not acknowledge universal freedom, they declared principles and they adopted institutions which by their very maintenance would establish universal freedom. But it was not only the fact but the method which is of importance to us now. There had to be an atonement for slavery. The great evil of its existence had to be resisted by the great sacrifice which was made both by the South and the North for its abolition. It was out of that sacrifice that there came a new birth of freedom hallowed by the memory of Lincoln. Out of it all there came a most unexpected demonstration of the great strength of free institutions and the power of an awakened conscience in determining the lot of mankind.

"It is this same force which sometimes works for a long period silently, with a still, small voice, and again goes forth as an army with banners which, for a century now, has shielded the western hemisphere from the menace of Old World aggressions, giving Mexico to the Mexicans and the opportunity for freedom to the islands of the seas.

"Our country had proceeded through the course of its history not unmindful of the obligations due to foreign nations, not undesirous of promoting the friendly rivalry of commercial intercourse. It had been not only the merchandise, but the word of America which has gone forth into all the world. The name of Washington was known and cherished in all lands and among all peoples, and his country came to be looked upon as Lincoln saw it, the last best hope of the world. From it there went out a missionary spirit carrying the promise of general enlightenment, for wherever the American missionary has gone he has carried not only the story of the gospel, but with it the power to establish schools and build hospitals. They ministered to the body, to the intellect, and to the soul. By bearing witness to the truth they supported the cause of freedom. The power of America became a great organizing force wherever it went, but it did not seek foreign conquests and shrank almost from assuming the government of those dependencies which the doing of duty has entrusted to its care. Serene in its power, in the doing of justice to all, free from all foreign alliances, having nothing to gain from war, foremost in its organized efforts to promote the peace of the world, it expected and feared no possible aggression.

"But unconsciously, almost unwillingly, that nation which had been established by Washington and made free under Lincoln had become a world power. The setting of its own house in order, great as that accomplishment had been, might give it the power to meet its obligations; it could not give it the power to avoid them. When a military despotism which held in its grasp a great people threatened to destroy the free Governments of Europe, when America at last came to realize the issue, the soul of her people was bound to respond. When the leader of the American Expeditionary Forces reached France, I do not know whether, as he stood before the tomb of that great Frenchman who had first befriended our country, he said, 'Lafayette, we are here,' but the event makes the report a reality. From the day when the prow of the Mayflower touched the shores of Massachusetts Bay, wherever any power has sought to substitute the rule of force for the rule of conscience in the affairs of mankind, the soul of America has stood beside the champions of freedom, proclaiming 'we are here.' That spirit of service and sacrifice by which they had saved themselves in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries called them forth in the twentieth century to cast the deciding weight of their sword into the balance of liberty.

"The trial by battle has been decisive. It was as decisive as Yorktown. A stricken and impoverished world has since been struggling to organize and adopt into permanent institutions the results of that victory. Foremost among the desires of all peoples has been the wish to secure new guaranties of peace. No one doubts that the delegates to the Paris conference were inspired by that noble ideal. Amid all the contending elements they failed to propose a plan which harmonized with the spirit of America. Everyone knows that the American soul longed to establish a condition which held the promise of a permanent peace, but its ideal was for a peace not imposed by the major forces of the world from without but maintained by the moral power of the world from within. It saw in the covenant of the league, whether intended or not, a diminution of its independence and in its provisions the final sanction not of conscience but of force. It was the American conception that nations, like men, should be free by coming unto a knowledge of the truth, by living in obedience to the law. That was the larger meaning of the war. To translate that meaning into a resolution, to draft it into an agreement, to adopt it as an ordinance, to establish it as one of the fundamental institutions of mankind for the guidance of the society of free nations, was a world desire which has tested the statesmanship of civilization.

"It was in part in response to this desire that the Washington conference was called. Men had reached the conclusion that one of the methods of securing peace was by making the necessary sacrifices and performing the necessary services to remove some of the causes of war. It is this which appears to be in harmony with the greater purpose of America. It was not merely the voice of one man or one party or one administration, but the true voice of America which proposed at the opening session of the conference the scrapping of 30 of its capital ships, aggregating nearly 850,000 tons, of which 15 were new ships under construction on which there had already been spent nearly $350,000,000, and that for a period of 10 years the capital ships of this Nation be limited to 18 in number of a displacement of 500,000 tons. It was the same voice which limited the use of submarines and forbade the use of poison gas, which circumscribed the menace of further fortifications in the Pacific, secured justice for China and equal opportunities for participation in her trade and development, and which finally removed the danger of the English-Japanese treaty, which relied on the sanction of force, and proposed in its place the four-power treaty, which rests on the sanction of justice.

"The great strength of this treaty is its simplicity. It does not undertake to establish any artificial relationship. It recognizes the natural relationship between nations. It does not make any new law; it acknowledges the binding force of an eternal law. It is an agreement to respect mutual rights, and whenever those rights are endangered to resort to mutual consultation. This has sanction to which all force is subject:

"Moreover, if thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone; if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother.

"But if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established.

"And if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it unto the church; but if he neglect to hear the church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican."

"That rests on the Rock of Ages.

"Unto America there has been granted possession of great power, which carries with it great obligations. Our domestic burdens are great, but the resources with which they can be met are greater still. We did not suddenly become a great people in 1917 or relinquish our greatness in 1918. The greatness was there, created through long years of endeavor. The occasion revealed its existence. The meaning of America is not to be found in a life without toil. Freedom is not only bought with a great price, it is maintained by unremitting effort. The successful conduct of our economic life is not easy. It can not be made easy. The burdens of existence, the weight of civilization can not be taken from the people. There is no way to establish a better relationship among the people of this Nation save through each making great sacrifice. But nowhere does duty done and sacrifice made hold the promise of larger success. The final solution of these problems will not be found in the interposition of government in all the affairs of the people, but rather in following the wisdom of Washington, who refused to exercise authority over the people that the people might exercise authority over themselves. It is not in the laying on of force but in the development of the public conscience that salvation lies.

"America stands ready to bear its share of the burdens of the world, but it can not live the life of other peoples, it can not remove from them the necessity of working out their own destiny. It recognizes their independence and the right to establish their own form of government, but America will join no nation in destroying what it believes ought to be preserved or in profaning what it believes ought to be held sacred. We are at peace with all peoples. We do not deny our duty to continue the making of sacrifices for the welfare of the world. It is not alone for their sakes but for our own sake that we should pursue that course. We have adopted toward the world the policy of Washington, not of repression, not of dictation, not of coercion, not of imperialism, but a policy of cooperation, relieving distress, of forbearance, of helpfulness, of sympathy, of forgiveness, a policy which is first of all American, but a policy above all of faith in the sanction of the universal conscience of mankind.

"That sanction is eternal. In it alone is the promise of a larger freedom."

CONSIDERATION OF APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 213, to amend the Standing Rules of the Senate so that all general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HARRISON. That is the resolution to which the Senator has been referring?

Mr. CURTIS. It is.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	France	McKinley	Rawson
Ball	Gerry	McNary	Reed
Borah	Gooding	Moses	Robinson
Brandegee	Hale	Myers	Sheppard
Broussard	Harrell	Nelson	Shields

Edge	Lenroot	Pittman	Warren
Ernst	Lodge	Poindexter	Watson, Ga.
Fernald	McCormick	Pomerene	Weller
Fletcher	McKellar	Ransdell	Willis

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate as in legislative session proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 213.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I take it that nobody intends to shove this resolution through in that sort of way. I thought the chairman of the committee would probably say something about it.

Mr. CURTIS. I intended to do so, and was on my feet seeking recognition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was just putting the motion which the Senator from Kansas made, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. REED. I thought the motion put was on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, no.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider Senate resolution 213, to amend the Standing Rules of the Senate so that all appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, which had been reported from the Committee on Rules with amendments.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, this resolution was offered by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and referred to the Committee on Rules, and after very careful consideration the Committee on Rules reported it back to the Senate with a recommendation that it pass with amendments.

Heretofore, and before the adoption of the Budget plan, there were 12 appropriation bills, 5 of which went to the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, the other 7 being distributed among the various committees—the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Committee on Military Affairs, and so on. After the Budget plan was adopted the rules of the House were amended, and all appropriation bills went to one committee, and that committee changed the titles of the appropriation bills, which it is important for all Senators to understand.

With those changes of titles, under the existing rules of the Senate, when those appropriation bills come to the Senate, there being 12 of them now, 8 will go to the Committee on Appropriations, and 4 will go to other committees—1 to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, 1 to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, 1 to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and 1 to the Committee on Military Affairs. After careful consideration your committee believes that the adoption of the Budget system and the change in the rules of the House make it advisable to send all appropriation bills to one committee of the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CURTIS. In just a moment. The committee realized that there would be some opposition to that proposal, believing that if it were done there would be an impression that the Appropriations Committee would want to take possession of the legislation of the Senate. Your Committee on Rules, in providing amendments, has tried to avoid that, and after I answer the Senator from Ohio I will explain it.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Kansas has just made the statement that the Budget law, and the change in the rules of the House, necessitated, in his judgment, a change in the reference of these various appropriation bills in the Senate. My attention was challenged by the statement that the change in the rules of the House in part necessitated that change here. Why is that?

Mr. CURTIS. Because under the rules of the House, as I stated a moment ago, all appropriation bills go to the Committee on Appropriations. Heretofore there has been in the House and in the Senate a sundry civil appropriation bill, perhaps the largest appropriation bill of them all, which went to the Committee on Appropriations. Under the new rule there is no longer a sundry civil appropriation bill. The items formerly carried in that bill are distributed among the various appropriation measures. There is one committee handling those matters in the House, and they do not in any way get them mixed or let them interfere. In the Senate the items which used to go to the Appropriations Committee now go to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, the Committee on Military Affairs, and the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Then there was the legislative appropriation bill, which has been done away with by the change of rules, and all the items in that bill have been distributed among other bills.

Now, in order that the committees which have heretofore had jurisdiction over appropriation bills might be represented the Committee on Rules have provided in an amendment that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, for instance, and two other members of that committee shall be ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations and that those two members shall be selected by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. The same is true with reference to the Committee on Military Affairs, the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Then there were two other appropriation bills, one of which, the rivers and harbors bill, went to the Committee on Commerce and the other of which, the Diplomatic appropriation bill, went to the Committee on Foreign Relations, both of which have under the new plan of the House been swallowed up, one in the bill known as the appropriation bill for the Department of State and the other in the Army appropriation bill. Under the rule the Diplomatic appropriation bill will now go back to the Committee on Appropriations while the rivers and harbors appropriation bill will go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The Committee on Rules, in order that those two committees might have representation, provide that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce and two members of that committee shall be ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, to serve when items having to do with rivers and harbors are being considered, and that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations and two members of that committee shall be ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations, and serve while items pertaining to foreign relations are being considered. In that way the Committee on Rules have given to the various committees representation on the Committee on Appropriations.

Under the subcommittee plan the chairman and the two committee members selected by him and other members of that committee now on the Committee on Appropriations will, no doubt, have almost complete, if not complete, charge of the appropriations for their respective committees, but the appropriations will all come through the one great committee, which will handle the bills on the Senate side, the same as the bills are now handled on the House side by the one committee.

Mr. REED. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I do not mean to interrupt the general plan of the statement of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I am just presenting the facts, and it does not interfere with me to be interrupted.

Mr. REED. In the case of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, all it will have to say about agricultural appropriations—and I am using it merely to illustrate—will be what it can say through the chairman of the committee and the two members sitting temporarily as members of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CURTIS. They will be present all the time the bill is up for consideration in the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. REED. They will sit while that bill is up for consideration.

Mr. CURTIS. Under the rules, if followed, it is likely that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry would be appointed chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, and he would probably have charge of the bill upon the floor of the Senate and also in conference.

Mr. REED. It would be entirely possible, then, under the proposed arrangement for nobody, except from one political party, to be present as representative of the other committees which are permitted to act in this way.

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, no. Of the three selected it is presumed that two will be from the majority party and one from the minority party.

Mr. REED. There is nothing of that kind provided for.

Mr. CURTIS. That is not necessary, of course.

Mr. REED. Then that means that the majority party will have two to one, a two-thirds representation, all the time on all of these committees?

Mr. CURTIS. No; in the make-up of a subcommittee by the chairman the minority is always recognized, just as it undoubtedly will be in this case. I simply referred to the fact that they would be selected from Senators who had served upon the committee from which the bill was taken.

Mr. REED. Let me follow that a minute and see if we understand each other. Let me take the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry for illustration. The chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is, of course, at the present time a Republican, and he would select two men to serve with him. Let us say that he selected one Democrat and one Republican. Then there would be a two-thirds representation for the dominant party upon the subcommittee serving on the Appropriations Committee.

That would be true as to all the other committees when they would be represented, so that the dominant party by this process takes over a two-thirds vote on every one of these questions instead of retaining the kind of vote which it has had in the past, when it has been generally apportioned to the numerical strength of the two sides.

Mr. CURTIS. That is not the case. In the case of the Appropriations Committee, the chairman of the committee appoints a subcommittee of not less than five, as Senators here will verify, and sometimes a subcommittee of seven. If it is composed of five members, there are three Republicans and two Democrats. If there are seven members appointed on the subcommittee, there are four Republicans and three Democrats.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the universal rule.

Mr. CURTIS. It has been the practice always, no matter which party might be in power.

Mr. REED. I do not make myself clear, or else I do not understand the question. The Appropriations Committee is meeting. They come to consider the Agricultural appropriation bill. It is referred to a subcommittee of five members of the Appropriations Committee. Thereupon the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is permitted to send over three Senators. They send over the chairman and two other Senators. The chairman is a Republican, and one of the other Senators is a Republican. In so far as the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is represented, there is a two-thirds representation for the dominant party, and that will be true as to every other committee that comes in to be represented. It does away with the old rule that the representation shall be apportioned to the membership. I can not see how we escape that.

Mr. CURTIS. Of course, if it should turn out that only three members of the committee should come from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, they could have no further representation, but in the selection of the balance of the committee there would be one Democrat and one Republican added from the Committee on Appropriations to work with the subcommittee. That would still give a ratio of three to two.

In most of the committees there are members on the Appropriations Committee who are also members of the other committees, and no doubt those Senators would be selected. I can not say; I am not chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, but I know how anxious the chairman is to get Senators on the subcommittee who understand the bills, and I feel confident that that is what he would do.

Mr. REED. I understand the answer to the question which I rose to ask when I interrupted the Senator.

Mr. CURTIS. There is another point, and I want Senators to remember this, because it is of vital importance.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, before the Senator goes to that will he yield to me?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. I assume, as I read the provision, for instance, if a question of agriculture is up that the three members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry who would be ex officio members of the general Appropriations Committee would have the right to vote in the committee on all matters relating to that particular department?

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, certainly; on the entire appropriation bill. Knowing the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations as I do know him, I can say that it is more than likely that he would place at the head of the subcommittee the chairman of the committee having the subject matter in charge, so that the chairman of the committee, being the chairman of the subcommittee having the bill under consideration, would have charge of that bill upon the floor of the Senate and in conference.

Mr. POMERENE. I have forgotten the number, but I think there are 17 members of the Committee on Appropriations now.

Mr. WARREN. There are 16 members of the Appropriations Committee, 10 of whom are Republicans and 6 are Democrats.

Mr. POMERENE. I am not going into that question. There are 16 members now, so that it would take a majority of the committee of 19 to report out a bill.

Mr. CURTIS. I know what is in the minds of most Senators and how they feel in reference to one committee taking charge of all bills of this kind. They are fearful that the committee will take unto itself the responsibility for reporting out all legislation. The Committee on Rules carefully considered that matter. I desire to call attention to the amendment which we propose.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator speak a little louder? Owing to confusion in the Chamber it is impossible to hear what he is saying.

Mr. CURTIS. I said that one of the reasons why Senators oppose these bills going to the one committee is that they are afraid that committee will take unto itself the responsibility of originating legislation and trying to rob the committees which now have jurisdiction, we will say, of agricultural questions, post-office questions, Army questions, or Navy questions of the right to originate legislation.

The Committee on Rules thought that was an important subject and one that ought to be taken care of. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the amendment we propose, which, in my judgment, will eliminate all that danger. The amendment reads:

The Committee on Appropriations shall not report an appropriation bill containing new or general legislation, and if an appropriation bill is reported to the Senate containing new or general legislation, a point of order may be made against the bill—

Not against the item, but against the bill—and if the point is sustained, the bill shall be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations.

That, in my judgment, will prevent the Committee on Appropriations from reporting out any new or general legislation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator that that would have that effect, but I am going to ask the Senator a question that arises in my mind as to a point which seems still to be a danger. Suppose the appropriations bill were a House bill, as appropriation bills always are, and the bill as it came from the House contained matter of general legislation.

Mr. CURTIS. Over that I think the Senate would have no jurisdiction.

Mr. NORRIS. Then suppose it went to the Committee on Appropriations and that committee reported the bill back to the Senate with the general legislation in it. Would a point of order then lie against the bill?

Mr. CURTIS. I do not think so. I think it would apply only to new matter put on in the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. All the Senator means, then, is that this particular provision applies only to legislative provisions put into the bill by the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate?

Mr. CURTIS. I think so. That would be my offhand judgment.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President—

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. It is true, under the House rules and under the present House practice, that no legislation is permitted on any appropriation bill in the House.

Mr. CURTIS. That is the rule of the House, and a point of order can be made against any such legislation there.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that is the rule, but still, notwithstanding that, there might be a case where an appropriation bill might come over with legislation in it just the same.

Mr. CURTIS. Sometimes it is necessary to put legislation in an appropriation bill, and the proposed amendment, while it would prevent the committee from reporting a new item in the bill, it would not prevent them from offering upon the floor of the Senate an amendment which did include new or general legislation. However, then the Members on the floor would have their attention called to it, and they could make a point of order against it and defeat it in that way, if they desired to do so. If it was a matter which the committee felt should go into the bill, of course they would let it stay in, but such a provision as is here proposed would put the committee upon their guard, and would cause the committee, in my judgment, to eliminate new or general legislation from appropriation bills and leave the question of preparing and reporting legislation to the various committees which now have charge of it. I think the amendment will do more to protect the interests of the committees than anything which has been brought before the Senate in a long time.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President—

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MOSES. I would like to ask the Senator from Kansas about the practical working of the proposal. There are certain committees of the Senate whose legislation is substantially inseparable from an appropriation. That is particularly true of the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, both of which will be affected by the rule—

Mr. FRANCE. And the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MOSES. And the Committee on Naval Affairs. I thank the Senator from Maryland for the suggestion. Under the present practice each of these committees may introduce legislation carrying an appropriation, and the whole matter may be settled by one piece of legislation. Under the proposal advanced by the Senator from Kansas, the committee originating the legislation will bring it in, and it will be passed through both branches of Congress. Then a separate process must be had through the Appropriations Committees of the two Houses in order to get the money to carry it out. Is not that the fact?

Mr. CURTIS. I think it is not the fact, for under the rules of the Senate, as under the rules of the House, it was never intended that a line of legislation should be written in that way. It was the intention of both bodies when the rules were formulated that the Committee on Appropriations should give its attention wholly to appropriations, and that legislation should originate in the committees which had charge of the various subjects.

Mr. MOSES. I point out to the Senator that with the development of the governmental functions legislation inseparable from appropriations has become involved.

Mr. CURTIS. I think there is not one case in a hundred where legislation is inseparable from appropriations. I do not think there is one question in a hundred, if committees will follow the rule, but what they can take care of any legislation that is needed, and if it does become so important that it must be attached to an appropriation bill, I know the Senate well enough to believe that if the chairman of the committee should announce that fact and that the legislation is needed, there would be no trouble in getting it through the Senate, or the House either, for that matter.

Mr. MOSES. There is no trouble now under those circumstances when legislation is brought in carrying with it appropriations, but I can cite the Senator from Kansas to a measure now under consideration by a committee of this body in practically every item of which is embodied legislation wrapped up with an appropriation, which legislation to be made effective requires an appropriation. I refer to the Post Office appropriation bill, with which a subcommittee, of which I am a member, is now wrestling.

Mr. LENROOT and Mr. NORRIS addressed the Chair.

Mr. CURTIS. I will first yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that if there be such a bill every piece of legislation which it contains is subject to a point of order and is subject to be stricken from the bill under the present rules.

Mr. MOSES. That may be true, but a Senator favoring such legislation has an immediate remedy by making an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CURTIS. Now I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator that, at least in theory—and I want to see the theory carried out; I think we ought to adopt some rule in regard to the matter—the duty of the Appropriations Committee ought to be confined entirely to appropriations and legislative jurisdiction should be entirely taken away from it. That is now the theory; but everybody knows that, as the Senator from New Hampshire has stated, half the legislation which we get through on some subjects is passed on appropriation bills, until it has come to be understood that if one wishes to be sure to get certain legislation passed it is only necessary to have it placed on an appropriation bill. Nearly half of the legislation which has been passed for years has been tacked onto appropriation bills. It is all wrong and affords an opportunity for a great many jokers to creep into the laws. Theoretically, at least, it is vicious and ought to be stopped. This proposed amendment of the rules is a move to stop it. Since we have the Budget system I feel that it should be given a fair trial. Still I do not like this proposed rule.

I want to ask the Senator from Kansas why the committee feels it is necessary to constitute an appropriations committee the membership of which is going to vary so that when it has an agricultural bill before it it shall have three members on it who are not on the committee at any other time, and when the Post Office appropriation bill is pending those Senators who come from the Agricultural Committee are excluded and there shall be three members from the Post Office Committee substituted for them? Why add all the additional language which constitutes the bulk of the proposed rule? Why not stop and let the Committee on Appropriations remain as it is now and let the Committee on Appropriations handle the appropriation bills? I want to ask the Senator, has this language been added to secure votes of the members of the various other committees that under the present rules consider appropriation bills? Is it feared if some power is taken away from them that they will be against the proposed rule and will defeat it?

Mr. CURTIS. No, Mr. President. When the matter was first discussed the question of having the various committees which now have jurisdiction of appropriation measures represented on the Appropriations Committee was considered, as was also the question of enlarging the Appropriations Committee. The Committee on Rules, after careful consideration, came to the conclusion that it would be better to add three members from the various committees separately when the respective bills were considered than to increase the membership of the Committee on Appropriations, say, to 25 or 26.

Mr. NORRIS. Why increase the membership of the committee? Why not let the membership stand as it now is?

Mr. CURTIS. That, of course, could be done; but the other House has increased the membership of its Committee on Appropriations from 17 to 33.

Mr. NORRIS. The House did that by adding to its membership the members of other committees, as it is proposed to do in this case.

Mr. CURTIS. As was at first proposed; yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator think that that was done to avoid opposition to the change in the rules?

Mr. CURTIS. I do not. There is a feeling, which has been expressed to me by other Senators, that as the members of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, for instance, are familiar with the subjects which come under the jurisdiction of that committee, therefore, they ought to be represented on the Committee on Appropriations when considering the Post Office appropriation bill. The same statement, of course, applies to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and also as to the Committee on Military Affairs and other committees in considering appropriations in which they are interested.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. If that were the reason, then why in this proposed rule has the committee excluded members of the Committee on the District of Columbia? In the case of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, why not let the chairman and two members of the Committee on the District of Columbia sit with the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. CURTIS. Because the District of Columbia appropriation bill has never heretofore been in the hands of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly; but this policy would only have to be followed for a little while, until the situation as to the other committees would be the same; one year will settle it all. Then it may be said that they have not handled the appropriation bills which at one time they considered, and, therefore, why should they be represented upon the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, to be frank with the Senator from Nebraska, I really think it would be better to leave the Committee on Appropriations just as it is.

Mr. NORRIS. Then let us so provide.

Mr. CURTIS. I think the experience which the Senate has had with the few bills—general appropriation bills—which have been reported out of the committee by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations under the new practice and which have been passed by the Senate, has demonstrated the advisability of the change, because they have promptly come out of the committee and have gone through the Senate in a very short time.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not making any criticism, I want to say to the Senator, in any sense as an opponent of the proposed rule, but I am going to offer an amendment to it as soon as I can get the floor, to strike out that part of the rule which I think ought to be stricken out and to leave the membership of the committee just as it is, clothing it, however, with the additional authority, with the amendment of which the Senator has spoken and which I commend, to take away all of the legislative jurisdiction of the committee, and providing that if it bring in an appropriation bill that contains general legislation a point of order will send the whole bill back to the committee. If that shall be done, we shall have shorn the committee of the power in which now lurks the danger, and we shall confine it entirely to the consideration of appropriations.

Mr. CURTIS. Let me answer the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I happen myself to be one of the Members of the Senate who would sit on the Committee on Appropriations under this proposed rule, if there be any Senator who ought to be added to its membership in the manner proposed.

Mr. CURTIS. Let me say to the Senator that the committee very carefully considered the question whether the Committee on Appropriations should remain as it is now constituted, whether its membership should be increased or whether representation should be provided in the manner proposed, and the vote in the committee was almost unanimous for the proposed rule.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has just said that he himself favored retaining the present membership of the committee.

Mr. CURTIS. I say the committee was "almost unanimous."

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator agrees with me, as I understand.

Mr. CURTIS. I am going to stand with the committee, because I believe in standing with one's committee. I offered a resolution even before the new system was adopted to refer all appropriation bills to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator another question. If he is opposed to this rule, as he says—

Mr. CURTIS. I am not opposed to it; I say I am going to stand by the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not mean that, but that, though he is in favor of modifying the rule as I have suggested, he is going to vote for this proposal as it is, because, as he says, he is going to stand by the committee. Now, he proposes to make the Appropriations Committee so almighty big that it will take in most of the Senate, and if they have that spirit of loyalty to the committee which has always prevailed and which the Senator has just exhibited, will not the Committee on Appropriations be able to secure the passage of any legislation it may desire, because everybody will have to stand by the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. CURTIS. No; I do not think so.

Mr. POMERENE and Mr. LENROOT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield first to the Senator from Ohio, as he has been on his feet a long time and desires to ask me a question.

Mr. POMERENE. I want to see if I understand this proposed rule. There is an inhibition in the amendment against new or general legislation to which the Senator has referred and which has been the subject of discussion. Now, assuming that a bill comes over from the other House with new or general legislation which has already met the approval of the House, and it comes before the Appropriations Committee, does this rule make it the duty of the committee to strike out that new or general legislation?

Mr. CURTIS. I think not, because that is a matter which has been put in the bill by the House of Representatives, and over it we have no jurisdiction except to amend or change it as we please. That is a matter which they settle under their rules. They have a rule against new or general legislation, and if they allow such legislation upon an appropriation bill, it is a matter for them to consider.

Mr. POMERENE. I understand as to that, but the proposed rule prohibits all new or general legislation. It seems to me that it is just as offensive to have new legislation come from the House of Representatives through the committee as to have it originate with the committee.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator—

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. The same rule which is proposed here with respect to new or general legislation applies now in the House of Representatives, except that a point of order in the House of Representatives strikes out the item which is obnoxious to the rule, whereas a similar point of order under the proposed Senate rule would send the bill back to the committee.

Mr. POMERENE. But it would not send it back to the committee if it were new legislation which originated in the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; but it is exceedingly rare under the rules of the House, as stated by the Senator from Wisconsin, that new legislation is incorporated in an appropriation bill. The fact of the matter is that the rule is enforced rigidly there, and no new legislation is inserted unless an emergency exists and unanimous consent is given for its insertion.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President—

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. First, with reference to the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska that the committee would be so large as to take in the entire Senate, under this rule it could never consist of a greater number than 19 members upon any item of appropriation. That is true, is it not?

Mr. CURTIS. That is true.

Mr. LENROOT. With reference to the Appropriations Committee having complete jurisdiction without any additional members, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Kansas that, if this rule shall be adopted, the Committee on Appropriations will have to deal with appropriations that now go to six different committees.

Mr. CURTIS. It will have to deal with bills which used to go to seven different committees.

Mr. LENROOT. It will have to deal with bills which used to go to seven different committees, but which now go to six different committees in addition to the present jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CURTIS. That is true.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas whether it would be feasible to create subcommittees from the present 16 members without making it very burdensome to the members of that committee to do the work?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President—

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The purpose of permitting the members of the various committees which at present report appropriation bills to sit ex officio as members of the Committee on Appropriations is to give that committee the advantage of the knowledge and experience which these members have acquired respecting the several subjects which have heretofore come within their jurisdiction. For instance, when the Agricultural appropriation bill is under consideration the chairman, one other Republican, and the ranking Democrat on that committee would be present with the Appropriations Committee or the subcommittee to advise and assist in the formulation of the appropriation bill, and it would be a very valuable service.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MOSES. Let me say to the Senator from Arkansas and to the Senator from Kansas that the practical result of that proceeding will be that three rank outsiders will be educating the 16 regular members of the Committee on Appropriations. The Senator from Kansas has pointed out the great success attending the consideration of the appropriation bills thus far during this session. His statement is accurate; but, Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the fact that no one of the bills dealing with technical subjects has as yet been considered. Every bill reported thus far by the Committee on Appropriations during this session of Congress has had reference to matters which the Committee on Appropriations have heretofore handled. The Committee on Appropriations has not as yet considered one of the measures which involve the technical subjects which are wrapped up in appropriations.

It can not be said that the success of the present course has been so great in the House as to lead us to swallow it whole. We are now considering the Post Office appropriation bill, which, so far as most of its items are concerned, might just as well have been a piece of blank paper sent over here from the other House through the Committee on Appropriations of that body. It was first drawn by a subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee of the House, no one of whom ever served on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads or knew anything about the technique of the service, so that we have been compelled to take that bill from its enacting clause and go through it stage by stage and practically to rewrite it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Kansas—

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. There is no doubt that this subject presents serious and important difficulties; but I want to bring to the attention of Senators what I think makes it necessary for the Senate to agree to this provision or something similar to it.

The House of Representatives in practice originates the appropriation bills, and it has revised the system of making appropriations, as stated by the Senator from Kansas in the beginning of his remarks. We no longer have a sundry civil bill or a legislative, executive, and judicial bill, and we will not have rivers and harbors bills nor pension bills, so that the items respecting these subjects will come to the Senate in new bills, so to speak. For instance, rivers and harbors items will come in the military affairs bill, and a large number of items that formerly came in the sundry civil bill will also come in the military affairs bill. If you do not make this arrangement, how will those various items be distributed when the bill reaches the Senate? How will you determine to what committee the bill shall be referred? You will have endless conflict and confusion; and if you say that you will segregate the items in the bill and send them to the same committees that now consider them, you can readily see that great confusion will arise and many delays will occur and legislation will be unduly hampered. I do not see how it is practicable, so long as the House pursues the course that it is pursuing, for the Senate to refuse to adopt some such amendment to its rules as the Senator from Kansas has proposed.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, how was it done last year? The House had that rule last year. How was it done? If it will cause so much confusion this year, why did it not cause confusion last year?

Mr. CURTIS. Because last year the bills were prepared exactly as they were the year before. There were 13 bills last year. This year they have all been changed and scrambled.

Mr. ROBINSON. The whole system has been revised.

Mr. McKELLAR. How does the Senator know that it may not be entirely revised again by the House? Why should we change our rules?

Mr. ROBINSON. In order to facilitate legislation. I do not think there is any likelihood of the House receding from its position. In 1865 the Appropriations Committee was created, and up until 1885, if my memory is correct, it had exclusive jurisdiction, as it now has, in the case of all appropriation bills. In 1920, however, the House went back to the old system and provided that all appropriation bills thereafter should be reported from the Appropriations Committee. During the present year, in order to make the system conform to budgetary plans, and for greater convenience in coordinating the appropriations, the entire system of bills in which these appropriations are embraced was revised, so that now, if we retain our rules as they now exist, the Military Affairs bill will have to be segregated into at least three different divisions and sent to three committees, namely, Military Affairs, Appropriations, and Rivers and Harbors. Senators can readily see that if we have three committees considering different parts of one bill, we may be indefinitely delayed in securing reports on the bill as a whole.

Mr. OVERMAN. How would we get conferees?

Mr. ROBINSON. Then, as suggested by the Senator from North Carolina, a very much greater difficulty and more extensive confusion will arise when the question of a conference is to be arranged for. The Senate will have had three committees considering one bill, and unquestionably when the Chair comes to appoint conferees the very greatest of difficulty and confusion will exist as to who shall go on the conference committee for the Senate. In the case that I used as an illustration a while ago, a compromise might be effected by putting on one conferee from the Military Affairs Committee, another from the Appropriations Committee, and another from the Rivers and Harbors Committee; but the difficulty of that would be that in practical effect it would be dividing the strength of the Senate on the items which the Senate might have inserted in the bill by way of amendment. It would weaken the force of the Senate conferees in their dealings with the House of Representatives.

I think the provision that gives these various committees representation on the Appropriations Committee is a beneficial one. When the Appropriations Committee is sitting for the consideration of items that are now embraced in the agricultural bill I should like to know that three members of the Agricultural Committee as it is now constituted, familiar with the work of the committee, familiar with the legislation of the committee and its history, will be there to assist and advise in the preparation of the bill. The same is true as to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. The same is also true of the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. So I think that is a valuable and a useful provision, and I shall oppose any amendment striking it out.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I have not the floor. I was speaking by the courtesy of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I just wish to call the attention of the Senator to the situation that we had last year. Under the House rules the conferees on the military appropriation bill were members of the Appropriations Committee. They are all perfectly splendid and very capable and able gentlemen, but they had never served on the Military Affairs Committee over there, and therefore were without such experience as it seems to me they ought to have had to serve on a conference committee dealing with military matters; and we had great difficulty in handling the bill because of their unfamiliarity with the general subject of military affairs, though of course not because of any lack of ability, for there were no abler men in the House.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I understand that the gentleman who had charge of the bill was a member of the Committee on Military Affairs—Mr. ANTHONY, of Kansas—but that is neither here nor there. I am going to detain the Senate only a minute longer. With the explanation I have made, together with what the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has so well said, I think all has been said on this subject that need be said, except this:

The Budget system, for which we worked for so many years, and which was favored on both sides of this Chamber, has come. I think it has come to stay, and I believe it is going to be a wonderful success. I think within a very few years we are all going to be glad that we adopted it; but in order to make it a success I think it necessary to send all these appropriation bills to one committee, and I therefore ask for the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. HARRISON obtained the floor.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Kansas a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. CURTIS. If the Senator from Mississippi will yield, I shall be glad to answer it.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, yes; I gladly yield.

Mr. FRANCE. I confess to great confusion as to the meaning of this proposed rule, and I desire to ask the Senator if he will explain somewhat more in detail how it would operate. Let me state a hypothetical case.

Suppose the Secretary of the Navy, as a result of the finding of these conferences, should recommend to the House an appropriation, we will say, taking an arbitrary figure of $200,000,000, which, we will say, would support a navy of the strength allowed us by the other powers under this treaty; and suppose the House, if it should be in the frame of mind that it seems to be in at the present time, should reduce that appropriation to $100,000,000, thus cutting the size of the Navy in half, and suppose the committee of the Senate should agree with the House in appropriating $100,000,000. That bill then comes before the Senate; and it seems to me that under this rule the Senate would be prevented, even if much more than a majority of the Senate should so desire, from increasing the size of the Navy desired by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. CURTIS. No more so than they would be under the existing rule.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Maryland will permit me, the size of the Navy is a matter of legislation, and would go to the Committee on Naval Affairs. After the Committee on Naval Affairs had reported this item fixing the size of the Navy and that had passed the House of Representatives, the duty would then devolve upon the Committee on Appropriations to make the appropriation. I do not think the matter which the Senator from Maryland has in mind would be materially affected by this amendment of the rules, because he refers to a matter of legislation, and that would still go to the Committee on Naval Affairs. The Committee on Appropriations can not legislate on any subject pertaining to naval affairs, military affairs, or rivers and harbors. It can only make appropriations after they have been authorized by these respective committees.

Mr. FRANCE. But take the question of new construction. All that is necessary in the way of legislation is to say, "For new construction, so many millions of dollars."

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, no; the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. CURTIS. It must be authorized.

Mr. ROBINSON. Under the practice of both Houses now, an appropriation for new construction can not be made in a general appropriation bill until a law exists authorizing the construction.

Mr. FRANCE. Of course, the difficulty in my mind is due to the fact that I had not thoroughly considered the proposed rule; but it seemed to me that it did further impair the power of the Senate over the appropriations, and its authority to increase appropriations should an emergency arise.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I stated in my opening statement that all of that could be cured by the committee offering it on the floor and explaining the necessity for it, as is done now. In cases where a matter is subject to a point of order, Senators frequently waive the point because the explanation is enough to convince them that the appropriation is justified.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas a question, if he will permit it.

Mr. CURTIS. If the Senator from Mississippi will yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. Pardon me; I did not know that the Senator from Mississippi had the floor. I understood the Senator from Kansas to say that an appropriation bill might come from the House containing new or general legislation, and that the Senate Committee on Appropriations could report that new and general legislation, and it would not come within the provisions of this rule.

Mr. CURTIS. Because it originated in the House.

Mr. STERLING. It occurs to me that under the language of this proposed amendment it could not be reported. The language is:

The Committee on Appropriations shall not report an appropriation bill containing new or general legislation.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, we considered that very carefully, and we concluded that the Presiding Officer would hold that that applied only to matters put in in the Senate; that what originated in the House and passed there became subject to our consideration, and would not be subject to a point of order in the body where it did not originate.

Mr. STERLING. But under the very general language of the resolution it could not be reported, from whatever source the legislation came.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the existing rule prohibits any general legislation on an appropriation bill; but appropriation bills come here from the House with general legislation in them, and never has a point of order been made unless it was put in by the Senate committee.

Mr. STERLING. But this goes to the whole bill, and the bill could not be reported. I think the difficulty could be cured and the matter made perfectly plain by the use of two or three words.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I shall be very glad to have the Senator suggest the amendment when we reach that point, but not now when the Senator from Mississippi has the floor.

Mr. STERLING. Very well; I will do so later.

Mr. STANFIELD. As in open legislative session, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of House bill 10185, authorizing the exchange of lands within the exterior boundaries of the Malheur National Forest, in the State of Oregon, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield for that purpose, but I do not want to lose the floor.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Should not the resolution of the Committee on Rules be temporarily laid aside if other business is to be taken up?

Mr. CURTIS. I do not want to have something else taken up. I want to go on with this resolution to-night.

Mr. HARRISON. I am perfectly willing to yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CURTIS. I hope the Senator will put off calling up his bill until to-morrow.

Mr. STANFIELD. Very well.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am opposed to this proposed change in the rules, and I voted against it in the Committee on Rules. There has been a tendency lately to break the grip of the few men in the Senate who control all legislation which comes before the Senate. We heard much about that when there was a change of administration. Men who have served here for years and are on important committees become conferees, interlocking, and consequently, because of their length of service, and the important places they have obtained on important committees, they control practically all the legislation, so far as its being reported out of the committee or being smothered in the committee is concerned.

Members of the Committee on Appropriations naturally welcome this proposed change in the rules. We know that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is a modest individual, but if he were like most men he could become a giant in this body, an autocrat. As chairman of the Committee on Appropriations he could dominate everything. What place more powerful could you imagine? What position would carry greater power than the chairmanship of the Committee on Appropriations, with such power lodged in it as is proposed to be given by this change in the rules, to enable them to pass on all appropriation bills in the Senate?

So naturally the members of the Committee on Appropriations will vote for this proposed change. It enlarges their powers; it makes their influence greater. All appropriations for agriculture are to be taken from the Agricultural Committee and given over to the Senator from Wyoming, the Senator from Kansas, and the other members of the Appropriations Committee. I have been interested in agriculture, and when I came here sought membership on the Agricultural Committee because I believed, forsooth, that I could render my people greater service by being on that committee than on any other committee of the Senate, and do Senators believe that I would vote to disrobe myself from that authority and responsibility, and give it over to the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator if he does not believe that if we did that, if we took away from the members of that committee all legislative jurisdiction and placed it within the power of any one Member of the Senate to block any legislation that was brought in, it would not compensate for the additional power that was given them by giving them jurisdiction of different items of appropriations? It would not give them any additional power, except that their field of operations would be larger. They could report on appropriations, for instance, for Agriculture or for the Army, whereas now they are deprived of jurisdiction over those two matters, but they would not have any power to report any item of legislation, and that is where the danger comes.

Mr. HARRISON. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has no right to have general legislation put on a general appropriation bill.

Mr. NORRIS. But the Senator knows we do, and that every other committee does, and that there is more legislation on these appropriation bills than in the other bills considered by the committee. We put through more appropriation on the Agricultural appropriation bills than the committee puts through outside of those bills.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; that is true. This is giving too much power, as I said, to the Committee on Appropriations. Here is a list of the membership of the Committee on Appropriations. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is chairman. He is also a member of the Committee on Military Affairs. It is proposed to take away from him and the Military Affairs Committee the authority to make appropriations for the defense of the country and lodge it in the Committee on Appropriations. Of course, that does not affect his standing, because he still will retain the power which he has as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs as well as of the Appropriations Committee.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is chairman of the Committee on Commerce, the committee which now passes upon all river and harbor appropriations. But he is a member of the Appropriations Committee, and it would not affect him. He still would be a member of the Appropriations Committee and would have the same power that he had as a member of the Committee on Commerce, so far as river and harbor appropriations are concerned.

Where does the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] come in? He might be on the Commerce Committee. I see before me the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], who has been a great and valuable member of the Committee on Agriculture, who has fathered legislation there and fought for legislation for the agricultural interests of the country. Is he going to vote for a rule which will take that power away from him as a member of that committee and give it over to his colleague, the senior Senator from Wyoming, and the other members of the Appropriations Committee? Does he not believe that as a member of the Committee on Agriculture he can better serve the agricultural interests by retaining the power in the Agricultural Committee rather than giving it over to the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], and a few other members of the Appropriations Committee?

What answer can the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNary], a valuable member of the Commerce Committee, who has rivers and harbors in his State, give when he votes to change a rule which would relieve him of the power he has now as a member of the Commerce Committee, and say that the Senator from Wyoming and the Senator from Kansas, as members of the Appropriations Committee, should have that power?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HARRISON. I gladly yield.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, I appreciate the rhetoric of my genial friend—

Mr. HARRISON. I am stating facts now.

Mr. WARREN. No; not facts. I wish the Senator would hew a little closer to the line. What was formerly the river and harbor bill would now go to the Committee on Military Affairs, and the Senator to whom he alludes is not a member of that committee. The Senator, of course, is building up a very large bogey man to throw bricks at.

So far as the Senator from Wyoming is concerned, as chairman of that committee, he stated very distinctly, when he first brought the subject up, that he was only too ready to step aside for somebody who is more competent to take this up if anyone can take all of these bills and put them through in better shape. If the Senator thinks that the chairman of the committee and the members of the Committee on Appropriations are undertaking to take on a great deal more work, and have to tease the Senator from Mississippi to be allowed to do so, he ought to be thankful to them instead of wishing to scold them.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the Senator will not take any offense personally at what I say. I love the Senator, and I realize what a valuable member of the Committee on Appropriations he is. I am talking against the proposed change. I just used individuals for illustration.

Mr. WARREN. The illustrations do not agree with the practice. I presume the Senator does not wish to misstate the facts.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator says the river and harbor appropriation bill goes to the Military Affairs Committee.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. The practice for a long time in this body, if I recall it correctly, has been that the Commerce Committee of the Senate has passed on the appropriations for rivers and harbors. Is not that right?

Mr. WARREN. The practice for some years was to send them to that committee, though it was not always so. They do not go there now, because they do not come to the Senate in the form of a river and harbor bill.

Mr. HARRISON. They went there last year, did they not?

Mr. WARREN. They will now come to the Senate as a part of the War Department appropriation bill, just as a great portion of the sundry civil bill, and of the fortifications bill, and of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill go to the Military Affairs Committee.

Mr. HARRISON. They should not go there. They should go to the Commerce Committee. They can go there.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is speaking of something he either does not know about—

Mr. HARRISON. Why can we not split them up and send them to the various appropriate committees? Are the officers, clerks, and employees so incompetent that they can not look over a bill and dissect it and send the separate parts to the appropriate committees?

Mr. WARREN. What would it amount to?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know what it would amount to.

Mr. WARREN. They have to be in shape to be considered.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator from Mississippi contend that under the present rules of the Senate an appropriation bill can be split up and divided and sent to different committees?

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, we could send the various parts to the appropriate committees.

Mr. LENROOT. Who would make the report?

Mr. HARRISON. The committee which considers the proposition could make the report.

Mr. LENROOT. What right or jurisdiction is there to make two bills of one under the rules of the Senate?

Mr. HARRISON. If we are to change our rules—

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, well—

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is proposing to change the rules so as to send all the bills to one committee. I would offer this suggestion, that as long as there is such a mess in the other body, the Senator and his colleagues should confer with the leaders of the House and should straighten the matter out so that they would not be in this mess, and it would be better, of course; but why can we not provide a change in the rules, so that when these bills come from the other House, even though they might deal with matters some of which should go to the Committee on Military Affairs and some to the Committee on Commerce and some to the Committee on Indian Affairs, the Secretary, or some one who could segregate them and send them to the appropriate committees, and let them make the reports on them?

Mr. LENROOT. Then what procedure would follow, according to the Senator's idea, from there on?

Mr. HARRISON. It would be reported and we would pass it.

Mr. ROBINSON. There would be three bills in the case which the Senator cited.

Mr. HARRISON. We could pass one, then the next one, and then the next one.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, there can not be three bills, and that is the difficulty. There is only one bill, and you could not enact it into law if you segregated the items into three bills by the action of the Clerk of the House of Representatives. The measure comes here as one bill, as a single instrument.

Mr. HARRISON. We could provide some rule which would effect the change all right. I have not any doubt about that; or a conference could be held with the Members of the House and some arrangement made about it. The fact about it is that certain men want to get control of all the appropriations, and this is the scheme that has been evolved to do it and to take away from the other committees the power they now have. I am not willing to consent to that, as one Member of the Senate, and it will be some time before this resolution is passed if I can prevent it.

Mr. MOSES. May I point out to the Senator from Mississippi that the procedure which he has indicated is perfectly simple. The Secretary, as he says, is quite competent to dissect these bills, and to send the appropriate items of each to their appropriate committee. The rules have to be changed in any event, and if they are to be changed, they may be changed as suggested by the Senator from Mississippi, so as to send the segregated items to the appropriate committees, with a time limit within which the committees shall report, and those reports having been brought into the Senate, the items, with the accompanying reports, can be brought together again under the title, and have one bill, to meet the objection raised by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think there is any doubt but that they can work out some plan along that line. The whole proposition is whether or not we want to take away from these committees the power they now have and put it in one committee, or leave it as it is.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the Senator how he would arrange the matter of conferees under the scheme he suggests?

Mr. HARRISON. I know we could arrange it, the same as you are arranging this now. The Senator knows that the House and the Senate leaders could get together on some policy about this legislation, and if the majority of the Senate and House should desire, you could take away this power that is lodged in the Appropriations Committee in the House, and which is sought to be lodged in the Appropriations Committee of the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator think that agriculture has suffered by the House depriving the Committee on Agriculture there of the power of appropriation, and placing it in the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know. I have not watched the system over there.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator is familiar with the bills which have come from that committee.

Mr. MOSES. Agriculture has not suffered, because the Senate Committee on Agriculture has looked after those bills.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know what the system is over there. I know they have created a big committee of about 36 members.

Mr. LENROOT. Have the agricultural bills which have come over to us in the past two years been disadvantageous to agriculture?

Mr. HARRISON. They have been increased in amount generally. We have increased the appropriations.

Mr. LENROOT. That has always been true, has it not? Does the Senator think that the plan of the House has worked any discrimination against agriculture?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know whether it has or not.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator ought to know, as a member of the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. HARRISON. I know I am not going to consent to take that power away from the Agricultural Committee and give it to the Appropriations Committee. There are Senators who sought membership on the Committee on Agriculture, and who want to stay on the committee, who want to handle these matters. There are Senators who went by preference on the Commerce Committee, because they were interested in certain matters over which that committee had jurisdiction. The same thing is true of the Committee on Military Affairs. They have studied military problems for years. So the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs have become almost expert on naval subjects. Their study of those subjects now is to be held for naught. The power is to be taken away from them and given over to a committee which has not studied those propositions which the Naval Affairs Committee have studied, or those studied by the Committee on Military Affairs, or by any other committee.

Mr. LENROOT. Is not the Senator aware of the fact that the Committee on Agriculture, the Committee on Military Affairs, the Committee on Commerce, and various other committees having jurisdiction of various subjects can by legislation provide for every dollar of appropriation that they desire, and the Committee on Appropriations, if they do so provide, has no discretion except to make the appropriation?

Mr. HARRISON. They can pass general legislation, of course. You are not taking that power away from them, but you are taking away from them the handling of the general appropriation bills, which is now lodged with them.

Mr. LENROOT. If the Committee on Agriculture does recommend general legislation, directing that certain appropriations shall be made, it becomes the duty of the Committee on Appropriations to do whatever Congress directs shall be done, as suggested by the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; they sometimes respond to it, and we could still do that.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I fail to see the advantage up to this time in the changes made in the other body. It seems to me our old rules and our old practice in the Senate produced a much better result than would be brought about by this change. At the same time we are confronted with a practical situation. General appropriation bills, instead of coming as they formerly did from various committees, now come from one committee in the House, and they are referred here to committees which have the largest interest. For instance, the Army appropriation bill, which covers appropriations for rivers and harbors, would, unless the majority should decide otherwise, go to the Committee on Military Affairs, whereas formerly the bill came from the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House and was referred to the Senate Committee on Commerce. The situation is changed by reason of the operation of the system over in the House.

I like the amendment to the rule very much better than I did the original resolution without the amendment. I think the amendment very much improves it. It distributes this power, to which the Senator from Mississippi refers, very largely to the other committees handling these important subjects. I would not like to see the resolution pass without the amendment, but with the amendment I think the situation will eventually work out perhaps where it will be in a measure satisfactory, especially since these bills are general appropriation bills, and that is the thing we are dealing with and that is what the rule is confined to. It seems to me, however, that we will have to make a change of section 2, Rule XVI, because that provides, in addition to section 1, which we are proposing to change, as follows:

In like manner amendments proposing new items of appropriation to river and harbor bills shall, before being considered, be referred to the Committee on Commerce; also amendments to bills establishing post roads, or proposing new post roads, shall, before being considered, be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Of course, we will not want that rule to stand without change if we change Rule XVI as proposed by the pending resolution. Section 2 will have to be amended so that amendments to the bills will go to the Committee on Appropriations instead of to the other committees as the rule now provides, to which I have just referred.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me to ask the Senator from Florida a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Florida said he likes the amendment of the rule with the amendment offered by the Senate committee better than as originally framed. Does the Senator believe this rule could possibly have passed the Senate without that amendment? In other words, the substance of the amendment is simply to make 12 other Senators, 4 of whom are chairmen of committees, members of the Committee on Appropriations to a limited degree. Could it have been passed, or could it now be passed, without having the approval of the chairmen of those four committees?

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, I have no information on that subject. What I would say would be the merest guess, as I have not any data upon which to form any opinion. I am not on the Committee on Rules, and I do not know what has influenced them in the matter. I presume very likely in discussing the proposed change they found that the other committees want to be represented on the Committee on Appropriations in considering the subjects which heretofore have gone to those other committees, and this is a way of giving them that representation. I do not know whether it strengthens the proposition or not. I think it improves it very much. In my judgment, it was a very wise thing to do. I can not say it was done to get votes for the proposed change, because I have no information.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask the Senator another question, with the consent of the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will ask the Senator from Florida if he had been chairman of the Committee on Commerce, as he has been previously for a long time, and a very able one, too, would he have voted to centralize this power in the Committee on Appropriations unless he had been put on the committee in the way that has now been suggested?

Mr. FLETCHER. I say frankly to the Senator that it would not have made a particle of difference to me in my vote on the matter whether I had been on the committee or not. It is a question of what is the wisest and best thing to do in the situation in which we find ourselves. So far as I am individually concerned, it does not cut any figure one way or the other, and it would not have influenced my vote one way or the other.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, as I understand the Senator, he thinks all of the power over all appropriations to be made by the Senate ought to be centralized in one appropriations committee? That is the result of what the Senator has just said, and I want to be certain I am right about it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I just said that I think the rule as it is worded was a wise rule originally and is a wise rule now, and the practice as heretofore was a better practice, but I can not have my own way about the matter. I like the Senate rules as they are. I like the way the committees have the work divided up among them. I think that is the better way.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why the proposed change, then?

Mr. FLETCHER. Because we have to change some way, somehow. The bills are coming here now, not as they used to come but differently under the new House rules. The general appropriation bills now come from one House committee instead of from various committees of the House. We can not help that. We can not control that. I do not like it. I am frank to say I do not like it. It may be that I am a little slow about making changes and am rather conservative in a way, but I think the old system works the best and I would like to see that continue.

But we can not control that new situation at all, and inasmuch as the bills, as I say, could not in any practical way be divided up among the various committees we have to meet conditions in a practical sort of way here. It seems to me that this is about the best plan that has been suggested, because it gives representation actually and expressly to the various committees handling these important subjects.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. In connection with the statement just made by the Senator from Florida, if this amendment to the rules be not adopted, when the river and harbor bill reaches the Senate it will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course if there is any legislation in the river and harbor bill when they send it over from the House, it will go to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly; but I am speaking of the river and harbor appropriation bill or the item of appropriations for river and harbors. It would go to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I think it would be infinitely better to have those items considered by the Appropriations Committee than by the Committee on Military Affairs, although I am a member of the Committee on Military Affairs and I am not a member of the Committee on Appropriations. I recognize the fact that the Committee on Appropriations then can coordinate the appropriations, and the confusion I spoke of a moment ago with reference to conferences would be avoided.

Now, with respect to the question which some one asked as to whether this amendment was devised for the purpose of securing votes, I think it appropriate to say that when it was first brought to my attention in the Committee on Rules I felt the same repugnance the Senator from Mississippi now expresses about reposing in one large powerful committee of the Senate the duty of making all appropriations; but after a careful study of the subject I reached the conclusion that the various new bills, as they are now organized by the House of Representatives, can not be efficiently handled in any other way, and it was at my suggestion that the Committee on Commerce was given representation on the Committee on Appropriations when the item of rivers and harbors was being considered.

I certainly had no thought of procuring votes for the resolution, because I care nothing about what becomes of the resolution except from the standpoint of what I conceive to be my duty to promote efficiency in the handling of appropriation bills. I think the Committee on Commerce should be given representation on the Committee on Appropriations when that committee is considering items relative to rivers and harbors. I think that is a better system than referring the river and harbor items to the Committee on Military Affairs, which will occur unless some other rule be adopted.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is aware that the Chief of Engineers of the Interior Department, from which the items for rivers and harbors come, is an Army officer, the other engineers are Army officers, and it might well come under that head. I think it rather a remarkable thing that it does not come under that head.

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly, and that is the reason why the river and harbor appropriations were placed in the Military appropriations bill; but, as a matter of fact, the Military Affairs Committee has never taken jurisdiction of legislation concerning construction work on rivers and harbors.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator know any good reason why it should not do so? It comes directly from Army officers, and the reports come directly from them.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not think that is so directly related to the War Department as to bring it necessarily within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Military Affairs. I would prefer to see the jurisdiction vested in the Appropriations Committee, where other appropriations have uniformly gone.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. CURTIS. I hope the Senator will not do that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I withhold it for the moment.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator from Mississippi advises me that it is impossible for him to get through to-night, and if he will yield the floor I will ask that the resolution be temporarily laid aside and then move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business with closed doors. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the resolution be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE MUSCLE SHOALS PLANT.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD in regular 8-point type an article by Mr. M. B. Morton entitled "The Muscle Shoals a national project." Mr. Morton is one of the best and ablest men of Tennessee; he is thoroughly familiar with the subject; and I wish to call the special attention of the Senate to this splendid article. I think it is one of the clearest and best presentations of the matter that has been made during its pendency and that it will be of great value to Members of the Senate in reaching their conclusions on the subject.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Nashville Banner, Nashville, Tenn., Feb. 21, 1922.]

MUSCLE SHOALS A NATIONAL PROJECT.

(By M. B. Morton.)

What is Muscle Shoals? It is a long stretch of rapids in the Tennessee River where it sweeps westward through northern Alabama before it turns northwest to join the Ohio, a short distance above the point where the latter river empties into the Mississippi. The shoals gets its name from the bivalves—mussels—which are found there in great abundance. They are the same mussels that produce the wonderful fresh-water pearls which Tiffany buys from the southern pearl hunters. They are the same mussels whose shells furnish the material from which many of the buttons we wear on our clothing are made. Of course, the name should be, and was as long as we old-fashioned southerners had our way about it, Mussel Shoals. But along came a great multitude of ignoramuses and called it Muscle Shoals, and then the Government adopted the spelling of the ignoramuses and tried to make the excuse that "muscle" was the correct spelling, because at this point the river spreads out and resembles the muscle in a man's arm. However, the spelling does not resemble the corrugations in a man's brain—but let that pass, and Muscle Shoals let it be.

I believe that it is not unfair to state that the people at large desire that Ford be given a chance to realize on his vision. I know this is true of the people in the vicinity of Muscle Shoals.

But now that question has become a political one; it is being claimed by some that the project is local to the South, and this brings us to the main proposition:

What does the development of Muscle Shoals mean?

It means that the Muscle Shoals of the Tennessee River will, by a system of great dams, be navigable, and that commerce can float from East Tennessee to the Gulf of Mexico. This is in a measure local.

The Muscle Shoals comprise many miles of the Tennessee River. They have since first known by white men presented an insuperable barrier to successful navigation, though above them are hundreds of miles of navigable river extending far up through the East Tennessee valley almost to the Virginia line. In the years gone by the Government has spent millions trying to make the shoals navigable, but so far the problem is unsolved.

The present Muscle Shoals project, for which Henry Ford and others are now making bids, is located at the lower or western end of the rapids. It is well known that this series of great dams and factories was started by the United States Government during the World War primarily for extracting nitrogen from the atmosphere for making explosives to be used by our Armies in Europe. Approximately $100,000,000 were expended, and when the war ended work on the project was suspended.

Henry Ford had a vision and made the Government a proposition to take over the work, utilize at least part of the power for making nitrates and the rest of it for equipping factories of various kinds that would furnish employment for 1,000,000 men. I know recently some of the writers have cut the figures to 500,000, but either is sufficient, and Ford himself said Muscle Shoals could be made to furnish 1,000,000 horsepower, and that his experience proved that one horsepower meant employment for one man.

After Ford made his proposition several others were made to the Government, and no doubt others are still in incubation.

The vista opened up by Ford's vision was so great that the Government officials could not take it in, and now the whole question goes before the Congress and into politics.

It means that great factories will be built along the Muscle Shoals; that inestimable electric power may be furnished for various purposes within a radius of hundreds of miles. This again is in a measure local.

It means it will be demonstrated beyond peradventure whether nitrates for fertilizing the soil can be there produced from the air at a figure low enough for purchase and use by the farmers of this Nation. Ford believes this can be done; and Edison, the greatest authority, says it can be done. This is not local but country-wide and world-wide.

Most of our commercial nitrates for fertilizer purposes come from the Chile nitrate deposits. These must necessarily soon be exhausted. Then we must depend for our commercial supply on nitrates produced from the air by water power in Europe or discover some other source; and in case of war we might find ourselves helpless.

Nitrates could easily be shipped from Muscle Shoals to every part of the country. They could be given water transportation throughout the great Mississippi Valley and our entire coast line, the plant being situated on a river navigable to the Ohio. And while a great deal of commercial fertilizer, including nitrates, is used in the South, the fact remains that the farmer can secure more cheaply nitrogen for the soil from leguminous crops, such as peas or clover, than from any other source. The South produces many legumes in abundance, and is not nearly so dependent on commercial fertilizers for nitrogen as many other sections, where legumes do not grow abundantly or do not grow at all.

The development of Muscle Shoals in accordance with Ford's plan means the producing of an enormous power from water now going to waste; and this means an enormous saving of coal, which we are now mining and using with feverish activity, apparently totally oblivious to the fact that our coal mines will soon be exhausted.

Muscle Shoals is one of the greatest water powers in the world, and if Ford can make "his dream come true," it means that hundreds and thousands of water powers in this country and throughout the world now going to waste will be utilized.

It means a saving in fuel beyond the capacity of the human mind to grasp.

It means the beginning on a large scale of the conservation of the natural resources of the world.

No; the Muscle Shoals project is not local.

MALHEUR NATIONAL FOREST.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 10185) authorizing the exchange of lands within the exterior boundaries of the Malheur National Forest, in the State of Oregon, and for other purposes. The bill passed the House a few days ago, and involves an exchange of property in the Malheur National Forest, in Oregon. It is exclusively an Oregon measure, reported favorably by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CURTIS. May I ask if that is the bill which the Senator's colleague desired to call up?

Mr. McNARY. It is the bill my colleague desired to get up.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Oregon when the Committee on Public Lands had a meeting? I have been trying to find out about a meeting of the Committee on Public Lands in order to get one or two bills similar to this reported from that committee.

Mr. McNARY. The committee had a meeting day before yesterday at 5 o'clock, at which there were 14 members present. This is the first measure that was brought up, and it was reported unanimously. It went to the calendar yesterday.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have no objection to the bill; but, as I said, I have a bill just like it that passed the House and has been pending for some time. I have been trying to find out when a meeting of the committee would be held.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me, the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, as the Senator knows, has been very busily engaged with other matters.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand that.

Mr. NORRIS. There were some very urgent bills to be considered, and we had a meeting yesterday afternoon at 5.15, when a quorum was secured. I have no doubt that if the Senator had received notice he would have been there and the bills in which he is interested would have been reported and would now be on the calendar.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If I had known of the meeting I myself would have been there.

Mr. NORRIS. It was unfortunate that the meeting was held at an unseemly and unusual hour, but it was about the only time when a meeting could be held.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I would attend a meeting of that kind to-night, so far as that is concerned. I will see the chairman of the committee and ascertain if I can not arrange to be notified when a meeting is going to be held. I understood, however, that Wednesday was the regular meeting day of the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. We have not held a meeting for seven weeks on the regular meeting day.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I spoke to the chairman of the committee some days ago about this matter. I am glad the Senator from Oregon secured action on his bill; but I wanted to know how it was done, so that I might arrange to secure action on the bills in which I am interested.

Mr. McNARY. I will say to the Senator that I "was on the job."

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think the Senator's colleague is a member of the Committee on Public Lands, and that is how he came to secure action.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 10185) authorizing the exchange of lands within the exterior boundaries of the Malheur National Forest, in the State of Oregon, and for other purposes, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized in his discretion to accept on behalf of the United States title to any lands in private ownership within the exterior boundaries of the Malheur National Forest which, in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture, are chiefly valuable for national-forest purposes, and, in exchange therefor, may issue patent for an equal value of national-forest land in the State of Oregon; or the Secretary of Agriculture may permit the grantor to cut and remove an equal value of timber from any national forest in the State of Oregon, the values in each instance to be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture and be acceptable to the owners as fair compensation. Timber given in such exchanges shall be cut and removed under the direction and supervision and in accordance with the requirements of the Secretary of Agriculture. Lands conveyed to the United States under this act shall, upon acceptance of title, become parts of the Malheur National Forest.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7158) to amend the Army appropriation act approved July 11, 1919, so as to release appropriations for the completion of the acquisition of real estate in certain cases and making additional appropriations therefor.

The message also announced that the House disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9981) making appropriations for the Executive and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appointed Mr. Wood of Indiana, Mr. Wason, and Mr. Harrison managers of the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed bills of the following titles, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 3164. An act supplemental to an act entitled "An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes" (Public, No. 215, 66th Cong.), approved May 22, 1920; and

H. R. 9606. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time for payment of charges due on reclamation projects, and for other purposes.

EXECUTIVE AND INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9981) making appropriations for the Executive and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, and that the Vice President be authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. SMOOT, Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. GLASS conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were each read twice by title and referred as indicated below:

H. R. 3164. An act supplemental to an act entitled "An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes" (Public, No. 215, 66th Cong.), approved May 22, 1920; to the Committee on Civil Service.

H. R. 9606. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time for payment of charges due on reclamation projects, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business with closed doors.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the Senate, as in legislative session, took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, March 2, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 1, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by Hon. William Tyler Page, Clerk of the House, who read the following communication from the Speaker:

SPEAKER'S ROOM,
 HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
 Washington, D. C., March 1, 1922.

I hereby designate Hon. JOSEPH WALSH, of Massachusetts, to act as Speaker pro tempore to-day.

F. H. GILLET.

Mr. WALSH took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Spera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we still find Thee in life's way. Impress us that this is our greatest possession. Grant us hearts that beat responsive to the directing, controlling power of the Lord of Hosts, and thus shall we maintain the sanctity of Thy law. Be unto us a sweet, subduing energy that lifts us beyond the clutch of weakness and supports us with a wise self-assertion. O let us be merciful by being just, sympathetic by being true, and loving by being honest. For our country's sake and for the welfare of human kind may our faith in God and man never falter nor fail. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. MADDEN, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, by direction of that committee, reported the bill (H. R. 10663) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending July 30, 1922, and for prior years (Rept. No. 746), which was read the first and second time, and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee reserved all points of order.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10267) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, had further insisted upon its amendments Nos. 5, 6, and 28, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. JONES of New Mexico as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 295.

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to consider, under the general rules of the House, H. J. Res. 263 (reported by the Committee on Military Affairs), S. J. Res. 125 (reported by the Committee on Military Affairs), S. 2492 (reported by the Committee on Military Affairs), H. R. 8475 (reported by the Committee on Military Affairs). The consideration of these bills not to interfere with conference reports, bills from the Committee on Ways and Means, bills from the Committee on Appropriations, or other privileged business.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this resolution makes it in order for the Committee on Military Affairs to call up these several bills. They will be called up to-day if they can be disposed of to-day. Otherwise any bill not considered to-day would go over and take its chances on any day when the business of the House would justify it. All the bills were unanimously reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. As indicated in the titles, two of the bills have already passed the Senate. One of them relates to the purchase of the necessary ground for a burial place in France. The appropriation is already made, but in the application of the fund the War Department finds it necessary to make certain diversions of the fund for the purchase of land in France. There will be about 32,000 bodies to remain there, and it is desirable that their burial place be owned by the Government of the United States. One relates to fixing the price at which clothing may be sold to soldiers. Under the general law clothing can not be sold to soldiers except at the lowest price it was purchased by the War Department. The current price of this clothing is very much lower now than it was at the time it was purchased. This bill amends the general law so that the clothing may be sold on the basis fixed by the current price of the clothing at this time. Another bill relates to the statute of limitations with respect to deserters and those who failed to respond to the draft law. Another refers to the payment made to soldiers and noncommissioned officers during the war. The auditor allowed the payments at the time, but has since discovered, as he thinks, that the payments were erroneously made. This is to confirm the payments as originally made by the War Department to these noncommissioned officers and soldiers.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXTENDING ARMY APPROPRIATION ACT—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 7158) to amend the Army appropriation act, approved July 11, 1919, so as to release appropriations for the completion and the acquisition of real estate in certain cases and making additional appropriations therefor.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7158) to amend the Army appropriation act, approved July 11, 1919, so as to release appropriations for the completion of the acquisition of real estate in certain cases and making additional appropriations therefor, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 2.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 3: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 1 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out the figure "3" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "4"; and the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to H. R. 7158, to amend the Army appropriation act, approved July 11, 1919, so as to release appropriations for the completion of the acquisition of real estate in certain cases and making additional appropriations therefor, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on amendments of the Senate to the said bill:

On amendment No. 1: By this amendment a mandatory provision in the House bill directing the War Department to sell certain property to the Canton Co. of Baltimore, Md., for a specified price was stricken from the bill, and the House conferees not wishing to injuriously embarrass the War Department in the disposal of surplus property agreed to the Senate amendment.

On amendment No. 3: The House receded with an amendment changing the number of the section from "3" to "4," in order that the numbering of the sections might be correct. The House conferees agreed to the retention of this section in view of the following: In 1918 the War Department requisitioned 55 acres of land from the Norfolk Country Club. The land during the war was used in connection with the Norfolk Army supply base. Since that time the club has received no compensation for the use of its property. In 1921, 44 acres of the above tract were transferred to the Treasury Department for the use of the Public Health Service, and is now under the jurisdiction of that department. At about the same time the club recovered, through a revocable lease granted by the War Department, the use of a portion of its former golf course. At the present time the War Department does not need all of the land over which it now has jurisdiction; nor does the Treasury Department any longer need the area transferred to it. The War Department has entered into negotiations and feels confident of making a settlement under the terms of which the club will recover permanently a portion of the area formerly requisitioned, together with a cash payment, and the United States will receive title to that portion of the requisitioned area on which the railroad yard is constructed, and will be released from any payment for the use of the club's property and from all claims for damages. The amendment authorizes the retransfer from the Treasury Department to the War Department of the 44 acres referred to above and, further, authorizes the Secretary of War to make a settlement with the Country Club along the lines indicated. No increase in the appropriation for the Army supply base at Norfolk is requested. The amount of money involved, being comparatively small, can be taken care of by the $190,000 carried in the first section of the bill.

JOHN C. MCKENZIE,
FRANK L. GREENE,
W. J. FIELDS,

Managers on the part of the House.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. MCKENZIE, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

STATUS OF DESERTERS FROM THE MILITARY OR NAVAL SERVICE.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the resolution (S. J. Res. 125) to continue the military status of persons deserting the military or naval service during the World War, and the amenability to trial of those persons who failed to comply with the terms of section 5 of the selective service law.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That none of the provisions contained in section 2 of the act of May 18, 1917 (40 Stats., p. 77), or in section 4 of the act of June 15, 1917 (40 Stats., p. 217), or in any other act or joint resolution of Congress, or in any proclamation heretofore issued by the President, or in any proclamation of peace that may hereafter be issued by the President, shall be construed as terminating the military or naval status of any person who, having been drafted or having voluntarily enlisted for the period of the emergency due to the World War in the military or naval service of the United States, or having been commissioned as an officer for the period of said emergency in the military or naval forces of the United States, thereafter deserted such military or naval service; or as terminating before the expiration of three years after the date of the President's proclamation of peace as required by section 4 of the act of June 15, 1917 (40 Stats., p. 217), exclusive of all periods of absence from the jurisdiction of the United States, the amenability to prosecution and trial of any person who willfully failed or refused to comply with any of the requirements of the act of May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," or of said act as amended, or with regulations promulgated by the President pursuant thereto.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of War sent a very urgent message to the Committee on Military Affairs asking that this bill be passed as soon as possible, because the existing law expires on the 14th of March next. So that two weeks from to-day the present law goes out of existence. Under existing law, when men deserted from the Army of the United States they were liable under court-martial for trial. There are quite a number of cases of this kind. The War Department has not been able to try all the men who are charged with this offense, because the War Department has had since the close of the war a great many things to attend to that were necessary for the military service. These men who failed to report for duty on the conscription law were never in the Army of the United States, and therefore they could not be tried by court-martial; but they can be tried in the civil courts of the country. Under the law of May 18, 1917, which provides for the induction into our Army of men by conscription, the House put a provision to the effect that four months after the declaration of peace all the laws that were effective under that provision in the original act should be discontinued. This law contemplates simply the continuance of that period for three years longer.

There were many men who refused to answer the draft; many of them went away to Mexico, and they are in Mexico now. They do not dare to come back to this country.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. But unless this law is passed, you will find them all coming back here after the 14th day of March.

Mr. WHEELER. The statute of limitation expires within a few months for these men who refused to answer the draft call?

Mr. KAHN. It expires on the 14th of March next.

Mr. WHEELER. The 14th of March next—a year from this March?

Mr. KAHN. No; two weeks from to-day.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman said March next.

Mr. KAHN. This is the 1st of March, and the 14th of March is the day when it expires.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Can the gentleman give me the number of draft evaders from the records of the War Department?

Mr. KAHN. No; I can not give that to the gentleman.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I understand something like 100,000 names have already been published in the Record, and there are about 30,000 more to be published.

Mr. KAHN. I understand that while there has been a publication of a great many names, it was found that the publication of many of them was erroneous.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Does the gentleman know how many of those draft evaders have already been apprehended and arrested for trial?

Mr. KAHN. I do not know, but I understand the number is very few.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Of the 130,000 names on the list as draft evaders, certainly not all of those have gone to Mexico or Canada, but are in this country.

Mr. KAHN. I understand that out of the whole number published, many of them were found to have been in this country right along and had reported themselves to the proper authorities; the War Department has kept records of where they were.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I know of several such cases myself.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. KAHN. I will yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Those who are registered, are they considered as soldiers and subject to court-martial?

Mr. KAHN. They were when sworn into the service.

Mr. WHEELER. But they were registered.

Mr. KAHN. Unless they are in the military service itself they would not be subject to court-martial.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. The gentleman from Iowa asked the gentleman from California several questions as to the division of draft evaders who might be in the United States, or who might be abroad. Would it not be true that it would be absolutely impossible for the War Department to divide those men into the per cent of those abroad and those who were at home, because the average draft evader does not come back to the place of his original residence, and no information could be procured?

Mr. KAHN. That is very true.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Do I understand this measure is one that proposes an extension of time in which the War Department may take cognizance of deserters from the service, or is it intended to cover those who have evaded the draft and never were in the military service?

Mr. KAHN. That is one part of it, but during the war men were taken into the service, were sworn in, and then deserted. It is also desired to capture those men, if it is possible.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to call the gentleman's attention to this state of facts: Last fall I had a constituent in my county who had a son charged with evading the draft. He was anxious to surrender him and have him punished. I wrote the district attorney for the northern district of Alabama, suggesting this state of facts, and he replied that the statute of limitation expired and the man was not subject to any prosecution by the Department of Justice.

Mr. KAHN. Well, the attorney for the northern district of Alabama was evidently laboring under a mistaken idea as to what the law was. The law really expired four years after the 18th of May, 1917, plus four months.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Let me get this distinction clear in my mind, if the chairman pleases. If this bill is passed as to the men who were notified to report for service, but never, as a matter of fact, did report and who never were inducted into the military service, pure draft evaders, does the War Department have anything to do in this bill with the prosecution of those men or will it be the Department of Justice?

Mr. KAHN. The civil authorities.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is my understanding.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The bill reads "or in any proclamation of peace that may hereafter be issued by the President." What does that refer to?

Mr. KAHN. That refers to the proclamation that the President made on the 21st day of November announcing that the war with Germany had come to a conclusion by the action of the Congress declaring peace.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. The language of the resolution that refers to any proclamation heretofore issued by the President refers to that proclamation. I do not know when this resolution was introduced in the Senate. Of course, the resolution, when it refers to any proclamation heretofore issued by the President, would refer to the proclamation of peace already issued by the President. Now, what is meant by "any proclamation of peace that may hereafter be issued by the President"? Are we not at peace with the world?

Mr. KAHN. Absolutely.

Mr. MANN. That is probably superfluous language, at least. As I understand, the statute of limitations under the existing law would prevent the prosecution after the 14th of this month. Suppose the 14th of this month expired without this act being passed. Could we then go back and make an offense punishable again—an act for which the statute of limitations had expired?

Mr. KAHN. I do not think so.

Mr. MANN. Well, can we extend, then, the time for prosecution if we pass it before the statute of limitations expires?

Mr. KAHN. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the letter of the Secretary of War. The resolutions were sent up on October 18, 1921, which was prior to the time the war was declared ended. So I assume the letter was sent to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs and also to the House Committee on Military Affairs on about October 18, 1921.

Mr. MANN. That language in the bill which reads, "or any proclamation of peace that may hereafter be issued by the President," really ought to be left out, though I do not know as it makes any difference.

Mr. KAHN. Of course, I do not know that it is important. The Secretary of War sent me a letter to the effect that it was very essential that this bill be passed before the 14th of March, and referred to the bill as it had been sent to the Senate and also to the House.

Mr. MANN. I understand. I have read the letter of the Secretary of War, and while I am not prepared to express any opinion upon the subject, the Secretary of War evidently assumes that if the 14th of March came and the statute of limitations became effective, Congress could not thereafter provide for prosecution of the offense. Now, if that is the case, can Congress by the extension of the time, providing a statute of limitations runs, practically make an offense now which does not exist? At the time the offense was committed the law provided the statute of limitations would prevent prosecution for the offense after a certain time.

Mr. KAHN. Four months.

Mr. MANN. And we propose to extend that time three years, or nearly three years.

Mr. KAHN. Practically three years after the four months' period.

Mr. MANN. Of course, I understand there is quite a distinction between creating a crime ex post facto, which we can not do under the Constitution, and fixing a statutory limit for prosecution.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield? It seems to me that the question here is whether the Judge Advocate General is correct in his view that the offense of the draft evader is a continuing offense. The Judge Advocate General takes the view that the statute of limitations in the case of a draft evader begins to run only after the proclamation of peace has been issued.

Mr. KAHN. Four months after.

Mr. LONDON. I think the Judge Advocate General is mistaken. I do not believe it is a continuing offense; that the date of the offense was the date when the man should have presented himself and failed to do so, which was three and one-half or four years ago, and that in all these cases the statute of limitations has already expired, and the practical question that now presents itself is the question presented by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], whether we can after the statute of limitations has expired continue the statute of limitations.

Mr. MANN. Continue the crime.

Mr. LONDON. Continue the crime. I do not believe we can.

Mr. KAHN. The Judge Advocate General is of the opinion that the law runs for the full time.

Mr. LONDON. Meaning the offense is a continuing offense?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no. I mean he has held all the time that the law was in effect and will be in effect until the conclusion of four months after the President made his proclamation of peace. Now, I assume that the law officer of the War Department looked into that question thoroughly. Because, after all, the Members of the House ought to follow the advice given by the gentlemen who are in charge of the various bureaus of the department.

Mr. MANN. Perhaps we ought to follow it, but we are not bound to do so.

Mr. KAHN. We probably ought to follow it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield further for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would like to ask the gentleman if this question was submitted to the Attorney General of the United States for an opinion as to whether or not it made the crime retroactive?

Mr. KAHN. I do not know whether the Attorney General passed upon this or not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does not the chairman think that in view of the fact that he assumes the cases of draft evaders will have to be prosecuted in the civil courts, it is most important to have the opinion of the Attorney General, especially in view of the fact that the district attorneys in the several States think these are barred by the statute of limitations?

Mr. KAHN. After all, I have a great deal of confidence in the Judge Advocate General of the Army. I have generally found him thoroughly correct and up to date on these questions.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am not impugning the ability of the Judge Advocate General, but, inasmuch as it is a matter for the civil courts, it seems to me the Attorney General should have been consulted for a legal opinion on that phase of the bill.

Mr. KAHN. As far as that is concerned, the gentleman assumes that the Judge Advocate General did consult with the Attorney General, but he has no knowledge on the subject.

However, I want to say frankly that the Committee on Military Affairs, even though we have no further jurisdiction over appropriations, has as many meetings or more meetings at the present time, trying to get back to the prewar basis, than it had heretofore; so that every member of that committee is working day and night. We do the best we can under the circumstances.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman must not think that I am reflecting on his committee in any degree.

Mr. KAHN. I understand that. The gentleman himself has been before the committee day after day in recent weeks, and has seen with what earnestness and with what patience the members of that committee have been working.

Mr. LONDON. They have had so much work to do that they have not been on guard against error.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I judge from what the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] said that he is of the opinion that there should be considered no continuing offense on the part of a man who failed to respond to the draft; that in the case of a man ordered to report who did not report there should be no continuing order for him to report during the war. As a matter of fact, most authorities hold that there was a continuing order and that the man violated the order each and every day that he did not report. I will call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that practically this same matter has been before the legal department of the Government—the office of the Attorney General—in the legal prosecution of several men who took money from the Government in war contracts, and that this House has already passed one continuing statute of limitations. Those opinions, which I do not happen to have before me now, have been rendered by the Attorney General, and they would answer very quickly the questions brought up by men who apparently are opposing the prosecution of these draft evaders and these deserters.

Mr. KAHN. I do not impugn the attitude of any Member of the House in that connection. Of course Members have the right, if they desire to, to take exception to any bill. But I want to say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] that if many of his constituents have evaded the draft and he feels that they are absolutely safe even if this bill is passed, the best thing he can do for them is to vote for it.

Mr. MANN. There is no statute of limitations in the fixing of the time of four months from the date of the commission of the crime, but the statute of limitations is the fixing of the time after the proclamation of the President, so that it would not make any difference when the offense was committed. The statute of limitations does not run out until a certain time after the proclamation of the President, and that time has not yet expired.

Mr. KAHN. Yes. That is the law.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. If I remember correctly, this four months provision was put into the law some years ago by an amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Cullop, and because of that four months amendment, which was adopted at that time, it is now necessary to make this extension. Is that correct?

Mr. KAHN. That is quite right.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Some months ago the House, at the instance of the distinguished chairman, passed a resolution to investigate the escape of Bergdoll.

Mr. KAHN. That is not up at the present time. It has been investigated, but the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is not a member of that subcommittee. He understands that it is on the House calendar.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. The reason I ask the gentleman is that he is familiar with military affairs, and the country at large is very much more interested in the arrest and trial and conviction of this millionaire deserter than it is in the cases of these poor devils.

Mr. KAHN. Yes. I want to say that the committee had a very full hearing. They made a report, but the report has not come up.

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, I think I can answer the gentleman's question on that point.

Mr. KAHN. But I can not yield further as to that.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. As I understand both the bill and the report, the statute of limitations do not apply to them. As long as they have military status they are subject to prosecution by court martial, and the purpose of the bill is to extend their military status, not for three years, but indefinitely.

Mr. KAHN. No. The law itself provides that the time is three years, but the gentleman is correct, so far as the drafted men are concerned. But there were quite a number of men who were in the Army who deserted. Now, they come under court-martial.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I understand.

Mr. KAHN. The draft men who were never in the Army are called up in the civil courts.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I understand that. To them the extension of the statute of limitations will apply. But I want to call the attention of the gentleman to this language in the letter of the Secretary of War. He says:

As I have pointed out in previous communications on the subject, desertion in time of war is an offense for the prosecution of which there is no period of limitation. By continuing the military status of these men they remain triable by court-martial for the offense of desertion in accordance with the spirit of the Articles of War.

Apparently he is of the opinion—

Mr. KAHN. During the war—

Mr. CHINDBLOM. He says, "Desertion in time of war is an offense for the prosecution of which there is no period of limitation." Then he goes on to say—

By continuing the military status of these men they remain triable by court-martial for the offense of desertion in accordance with the spirit of the Articles of War.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Now, I want to ask if they will be subject to the period of limitation of three years? I think not.

Mr. KAHN. I do not understand it so.

Mr. MANN. They do not have a military status, because when peace was proclaimed all those men were dismissed from the Army and Navy.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. No. The dismissal did not take effect until four months after the proclamation, so that they are still in the Army. They still have military status, and the purpose of this bill, if I understand it correctly, is to extend that military status.

Mr. LONGWORTH. So that they can be tried by court-martial?

Mr. KAHN. Yes. They must be tried by court-martial.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is the purpose of this bill?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And they could not be tried after the 14th of March unless this bill were passed?

Mr. KAHN. That is absolutely the case.

Mr. SISSON. I should like to ask the gentleman from California if it is his intention to move the previous question before surrendering the floor?

Mr. KAHN. It is.

Mr. SISSON. Then will the gentleman yield me five minutes?

Mr. KAHN. I will yield the gentleman five minutes; yes.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I can not attempt the discussion of a legal question in five minutes, but I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that in all liberty-loving countries so far as I know and in every State in the Union where the common law prevails prosecutions for all misdemeanors are barred by the statute after a certain limitation of time has run. It is not the policy of an English-speaking people to be cruel. Mr. Lincoln set a splendid example for the people after the Civil War, even before the hostilities had actually ceased. This example of charity and mercy was opposed by all who hate mankind, by every man of cruelty, and by all who sought to show their patriotism by cowardly insisting on keeping military laws alive after the war was over, especially by every cheap politician and every cowardly demagogue. He issued a proclamation which quieted the country and settled all cases of this kind. Now, unless the American people have changed wondrously I do not believe that three or four years after the war is over they desire to have military courts-martial being held throughout the country. Nobody justifies desertion or failing to respond to a draft law; but I do not indorse petit larceny, and neither do you, and yet in every State in the Union there is a statute, which provides that unless you prosecute for petit larceny within a certain number of years—in my State it is two years—the statute runs against the prosecution; and in all States of this Union the statute runs against prosecutions for crime, with the exception of felonies. Now, the war has been over for three years. In my judgment, nothing would be more unpopular than the extension of this limit of time for these prosecutions. Our people do not want drumhead courts sitting in time of peace. Of course, there are two classes of these cases. One class is reported to the civil authorities and the other tried in Army courts. But the bill is really after the draft evader and seeks to keep alive a statute which would expire on its face three years after the war is over. This war law ought to expire. It will cost millions of dollars to run down these men, and God knows taxes are high enough now; let us not add this additional burden.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; just for a question.

Mr. STEVENSON. This question bothers me. Where an offense has been committed and we have provided a certain limit of time within which the prosecution must be begun and that time has expired or is about to expire, can we extend the time for prosecution and avoid the ex post facto provision of the Constitution?

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] raised that question a moment ago. If I represented a deserter I would without hesitation sue out a writ of habeas corpus and have that question tested. I do not believe that you can add to a crime after the crime has been committed; and when the criminal statute provides that if a certain crime is committed the prosecution shall be made within three years, the courts have no jurisdiction after the expiration of that time, and it is doubtful if Congress can extend the time. When we had real lawyers in Congress and when we had real lawyers on the bench I doubt extremely whether a bill like this would have been tolerated for one moment, because you must give a person accused of crime the benefit of all the doubts, not only in reference to facts but you must construe the law favorably to him. The question raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] presents to my mind a further reason why we ought not to vote to continue this matter. I do not believe it would be wise to have the Government prosecuting men and having lawsuits about this matter long after the war is over. It is too much like a cruel military despotism to me.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I gather that the gentleman questions the advisability of extending this statute of limitations. Is that correct?

Mr. SISSON. I do not want the statute of limitations extended. I do not want this bill to pass.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Would not the gentleman say this Congress would be in a rather peculiar position if it should continue to refuse to give adjusted compensation to the men who volunteered and fought and on the other hand should proceed to exempt from punishment those who evaded the draft and those who deserted after they were taken under the draft?

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman has set up a man of straw and then proceeds to knock him down. Nobody says we want to change the law. I want the law to remain as it was when we passed it. There were a considerable number of young men who for various and sundry reasons, not sufficient in law, failed to respond to the draft; but I do not believe that we are now justified in cruelly exacting the pound of flesh nearest the heart. The war is over and the three years of limitation are about to expire, and, as Grant said on one occasion, "Let us have peace. We have had enough of bloodshed."

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Which is the more cruel, to punish the man who runs away and leaves his comrades to fight alone on the battle field, or to hold him guilty of his offense three years or even 16 years afterwards?

Mr. SISSON. This act applies not alone to men who deserted. It applies also to the men who failed to respond to the draft.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is just as bad, and in some respects worse.

Mr. SISSON. I do not think so. I do not think a man has ever become subject to a military trial unless he has taken the oath as a part of the Army. But in many of these cases these men never got notice of their draft because they failed to receive the notice mailed to them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi one minute more.

Mr. SISSON. I feel that this Congress can afford at this time to say, "We will let the law remain as we passed it." There is no good and sufficient reason why these prosecutions have not been had within the time prescribed by statute. It is the fault of the officers of the law. It is the fault of Congress.

I can discuss but one other question in the time remaining. If this prosecution is vigorously carried on you will find that the expense is going to run into many hundreds of thousands of dollars and perhaps into millions of dollars. We shall have to appropriate the money to conduct the prosecutions of these men, because we are having to appropriate money now for the prosecution of arrested deserters. In other words, if we attempt to make a network covering the entire country in order to hunt down these men, you are going to have a vast army of detectives and spies in time of peace going all over the country necessitating vast expenditure. You will not popularize the Army and military rule by, in the name of patriotism, extending this statute.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE].

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am not unmindful of the fact that perhaps there is some force in the contention of the gentleman that this bill if enacted into law may be overturned by the courts of our country. That is a possibility; but that is not the question with which we are confronted this morning. We are confronted with the proposition of extending the time in order to enable the Government to prosecute the men who deserted from the ranks of our Army, or the men who failed to respond to the draft; in other words, draft dodgers. So far as I am personally concerned, I am not in favor of taking a position that in my judgment would be an insult to every man who wore the uniform of our country during the last war—to say that the soldier who deserted and left his comrades on the firing line should now be excused because it is three years after the war, or to say that the young man who lived in the same community from which went many of his neighbors into the service and served faithfully their country—that the young men who slipped away and cowardly dodged, who declared that they would not in the hour of the country's emergency yield their services to the land that protects them shall escape prosecution. I want to call the attention of my good friends in the House to the fact that four and a half million young men of the country submitted themselves to military law and jurisdiction to defend our country in the war, and these young men rightfully are looking toward the Congress of the United States, and for one I am not ready to condone the offense of desertion and draft dodging, because it is an insult in the face of those four and a half million men who did their duty. [Applause.]

I want to call attention, my friends, to the fact that it is a serious matter, that it is something we can not pass lightly by. The argument of the gentleman from Mississippi that it will cost a few dollars to prosecute these men has no weight with me. Great God, have we become so poor that we can not spend the money necessary to uphold the honor and the dignity of the men who fought our battles? [Applause.] I hope this bill will pass, and if the courts of our country construe it to be unconstitutional, that we can not extend a limitation of this character, well and good, but let the Congress of the United States do its duty at this time. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the beautiful and patriotic speech made by my colleague [Mr. MCKENZIE] from Illinois made me wonder why the committee of which he is a very distinguished member constantly engages in the practice of reporting to this House bills to remove the charge of desertion of men who deserted during the Civil War in order that they may be placed on the pension rolls of the United States. That practice, I suppose, in view of my friend's position, will be changed, and hereafter instead of removing the charge of desertion the committee will bring in a bill authorizing the prosecution of these deserters "at a time when our Nation needed their aid."

Mr. MCKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I merely wish to say that in the bills we have reported it was the judgment of the committee that it was necessary to correct a mistake, and I hope the Committee on Military Affairs will never deny a man justice when he has a just case.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I have read the reports on the bills, and there is no pretense in most of them that the man did not desert. They say he is old and needs the money, and because he served, because he was inducted into the Army and did desert, they give him a pensionable status. I am not complaining about it.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman realize that the Committee on Military Affairs in investigating these desertion cases takes into consideration the fact that in almost every one of them the man served at least three full years in the military service, and that when he did desert it was at the end of the war, and in most cases the evidence before the committee is that many officers connived at the desertion?

Mr. MANN. I do not realize that fact, because I do not think it is a fact. Now, I am not criticizing the committee for reporting in behalf of the men who did serve in the Army. But here is the situation: Congress passed a law after we had engaged in the war providing for the draft and providing that the man who evaded the draft should be subject to prosecution after a certain time following peace. I have no sympathy with draft evaders or deserters. I wish they had been punished if the circumstances were such that they were really guilty. But really I question the desirability or the propriety because some man wants revenge—like my friend from South Dakota—I question the propriety after the war is over of extending the time for the prosecution of these men, when, if you leave the law as it was enacted at the time of the war, they would be exempt from prosecution. I feel much more bitter toward those men in a time of war than I do when peace comes.

I feel much more bitter toward my enemy when I am fighting him than I do after we have quieted down. But this bill proposes to say that the Congress of the United States adds bitterness, as time goes on, after the conclusion of peace.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. What I am interested in is whether or not the gentleman thinks Congress has the power to pass this?

Mr. MANN. I do not know. I raised that question.

Mr. RAYBURN. I might vote for the bill if I thought I was not violating the law by doing it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE].

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I realize that in the discussion of a technical legal point a layman is at a disadvantage. I would suggest, however, from that layman's viewpoint this question for the consideration of my colleagues who are learned in the law, to see what their judgment may be about it, and I present it only in the form in which it suggests itself to the average man who does not know all of the quirks and quiddities of the law, who is not familiar with the judicial and bench decisions as to the technical construction and the shadows of meanings that may lurk in ambiguous phrases, but is interested in the plain, common sense of a proposition as understood in the English language by people who have to read it and live by it.

I do not understand that extending the time during which you can punish a man for an offense is in any sense adding to his crime. I do not understand that extending the time in which the machinery of justice may be authorized to operate has any effect whatever upon the degree of the original offense. If a man broke the law, he broke the law. The proposition as to the time within which he can be punished is in the interest of the Government and not in the interest of the man—

Mr. LONDON. Oh, yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am talking from the popular viewpoint—else we are setting out to say that you can commit an offense, and if you can keep out of the way for a certain length of time it will be no offense.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will we by this law be extending the statute of limitations, or enacting a new statute of limitations, or merely writing our interpretation upon the law?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The question as to those finer technical legal aspects I can not answer.

Mr. RAYBURN. Here is what I mean: Is a deserter a deserter for only a day at the time of actually quitting the Army, or is he a deserter for the duration of the emergency, or is a draft evader an evader for a day, or an evader for the period of the emergency, and when should the statute of limitations begin to run—from the time the emergency closes or from the time he actually deserts or evades the law?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It seems to me that the cases that are brought into apposition here by comparison—that is, the civil cases—have scant analogy. An offense that may be committed against people in peace times, when the law is normally enforced, and when there is no jurisdiction except the civil law, is one thing. It is to be presumed, I dare say, in the interest of Government that cases may not be allowed to continue and drag in the courts overlong, and that where the offense is less than a felony it is not worth the time of the Government to be chasing the four corners of the earth to search out some man who stole a chicken, so that after a certain length of time the authorities have a right to drop the case. It seems to me that is in the interest of public policy.

I never realized before, and if I am mistaken it is time to be corrected, that the law was made with the intention of benefiting the criminal. This question of making a comparison with civil offenses hardly holds, because the questions that are involved in this are altogether ones relating to the safety and the security of the Nation itself—not its mere machinery of justice; not the ordinary rights involved in the relationship of man to man or man to things, but the right of the Nation itself to be preserved by its own people.

When somebody runs away from that duty or fails in obedience to a summons to perform that duty, he is not guilty merely for the time of the emergency. He is guilty for all the rest of the time that he lives. He is a man who would not join with his neighbors in defending their common hearthstone, and it does not seem to me that any question of technicality as to the machinery of his punishment, or as to the details of the length of time within which that machinery may be invoked, have any relation whatever to the enormity of his offense.

We are up against a question of public policy, not one of merely trying to refine a refinement or of making a shadow cast a shadow, in the meanings of words. The question is whether we shall declare, as the Congress of the United States, that when a man has deserted no amount of lapse of time afterwards, if he can keep safely in hiding, will permit him to evade the consequence of his act. We have to look to the future; we have something else to think of except the possibility of action on that particular man.

I do not think my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN], always tactful as he is, really meant to base the prosecution of this act upon the mean spirit of revenge. Governments are not conducted for revenge, but Governments ought not to be above their own self-respect, and when their own people will not defend their own hearthstones it is time that somebody made some provision to make a warning of those men, so that in the future the hearthstone may be reasonably safe.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Vermont has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Is not this what this bill seeks to do? As I understand the situation, it is not a question of limitation, because the Government can now prosecute these people for three years after the proclamation of peace, but it is the fear that after the 14th of March of this year they will cease to be soldiers, and therefore can not be tried by military courts.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. If they are at this present moment within the military service, and the Judge Advocate General holds they are, is it not perfectly competent for Congress under its power to draft soldiers to continue them in the service, just as they did during the war, just as the Confederate States and the Union during the Civil War drafted soldiers already in the service for a continued service?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I suppose that supreme and ultimate power might be invoked.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Is not that what the law does? It will continue them as military offenders.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It does continue them as military offenders.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. It does not change the statute of limitations?

Mr. MANN. Oh, there are two parts of the bill.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Does it extend the statute of limitations?

Mr. MANN. It extends it expressly.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Not as to deserters.

Mr. MANN. Not as to deserters.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I am speaking about deserters, because that is what we have been discussing here.

I am only discussing the question of deserters, and I thank the gentleman from Illinois because he has made a very clear and, as usual, able argument.

Mr. STEVENSON. The Supreme Court of the United States says that any law which changes the status of a defendant to his disadvantage after the offense is committed is ex post facto. As I understand it, this changes the status of a fellow to his disadvantage.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am suggesting to you, gentlemen, as a matter of public policy, not of course as a lawyer, that there is some virtue in the suggestion that peace-time administration is one thing and the question of preserving the Government in its hour of stress is another.

Mr. RAYBURN. I want to ask the gentleman from South Carolina how?

Mr. STEVENSON. If it does not change it to its disadvantage, what advantage does the Government get in passing it? I understand gentlemen here to say that if it was not passed these folks would escape, and if you fix it so that he can not escape, to be sure you are changing it to the disadvantage of the man.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It is a change to hold them to the original punishment.

Mr. STEVENSON. Hold them to the original punishment which could not be applied now because of the lapse of time.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Would the gentleman contend that the philosophy of this statute of limitations runs directly, specifically, and intentionally in the interest of the respondent? It runs in the interest of the Government, does it not?

Mr. STEVENSON. The Government put the statute there—

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. For its convenience.

Mr. STEVENSON. For the purpose of ending the confusion that arose out of an offense which can be kept alive for all time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. KAHN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will advise the gentleman from California that he has five minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. KAHN. I will yield those five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Unless some gentleman moves the previous question, there could be another hour. Do I understand the gentleman is going to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from California be extended 10 minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Does that mean at the end of that time he is going to move the previous question?

Mr. MANN. The minority ought not to ask the gentleman in charge of a bill to yield control over his bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from California be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think we ought to have more time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from California be extended 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from California be extended 20 minutes beyond the hour. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, there are two entirely distinct and separate propositions involved in this legislation, and I think it rather important before we vote on it to have a clear understanding of what is involved. I want to say in the beginning it is not my purpose to advocate the extension of any clemency whatever to a deserter or a draft evader, but there is a legal proposition involved in this Senate joint resolution that it is rather important that the Members of the House should consider before passing upon the proposition, so that they may vote upon this bill with their eyes open. Now, there is no question in my mind in reference to that feature of the bill dealing with actual desertion from the military service that this legislation would be germane, but when it comes to the question of extending the time for the prosecution of offenses punishable only in the civil courts, as this report says these draft-evader cases must be, then it presents a rather serious proposition; for the effect of this legislation, if passed, would be to extend the time in which prosecutions in the civil courts could be extended beyond the period of the statute now existing. Under that statute a prosecution is limited to three years after the offense is committed.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman will excuse me, I am afraid I will not have the time, but I will try to yield in just a moment. Under the decision of the Attorney General's office—and that is the forum that will have to prosecute these cases in the event this legislation should pass—the Attorney General's office has taken the position, and takes it now, that Congress has no authority to pass a law extending the time of the statute of limitations.

I had occasion to inquire into that matter last fall in my district, as I stated a few moments ago, where the district attorney advised me in the case of a draft evader who wanted to surrender and take his punishment that he could not be held by the courts because the period of limitation had expired, and only a few moments ago, in order to ascertain the present judgment of the Attorney General's office, I called them up—although I do not like to appear in Congress here as quoting opinions received over the telephone, I think probably it is a bad practice—but I called up the Assistant Attorney General, Mr. Crim, who has charge of these cases, and he said to me that it would be absolute folly, a mere waste of time of the Congress and for the department to undertake to pass this bill extending this limitation in respect to draft evaders. Now, there is the judicial situation, gentlemen, with which we are confronted.

Mr. RAYBURN. I want to vote for this bill extending the time, if allowed to do so under the law. When does the gentleman think the crime of being a draft evader ends? Does he think it happens only once?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I doubt if a crime can be committed more than once.

Mr. RAYBURN. There is just this about it. A man is a deserter, he is not a deserter for a day, but he is a deserter for all time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Let me ask my friend this question: Could not he be indicted by the Federal grand jury for not obeying the order of the draft board the day after he failed or refused to obey the order to report for duty?

Mr. RAYBURN. Or any other day.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is not the construction that is put upon it by the Attorney General's office. That may be an open question, but I thought it important to call the attention of the committee to the attitude of the Department of Justice on that phase of this resolution.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to my friend from Alabama.

Mr. OLIVER. Is not the evader also a military offender? In other words, did not the draft law of its own force draw him into the military service on the happening of a condition, and does the gentleman understand that his reporting alone constituted a military status for him?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That was the construction placed upon it by the Judge Advocate General during the war.

Mr. OLIVER. But surely the draft law was a war measure passed during the war for the purpose of prosecuting the war, and it occurs to me that the draft evader is just as much an offender against the military law as the deserter after he comes in. If that be true, then they are exactly on the same status.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Secretary of War in his report says that this reference to draft evaders is an offense of which the civil courts alone have jurisdiction and not the military courts. And it was evidently on that basis that the Department of Justice has taken the attitude they have assumed on this question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] such time as he may desire.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, before the debate closes I want to reply briefly to the criticism of the Committee on Military Affairs by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] for reporting out bills to remove the charge of desertion or to give pensionable status to former soldiers charged with desertion.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit me to say that I certainly made no criticism of the Committee on Military Affairs on that account?

Mr. FIELDS. Well, then, Mr. Speaker, in justice to the committee and in justice to the soldiers to whom the committee sought to extend relief by these bills, I desire to submit a few observations. I would infer from the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois that he places in one and the same class the draft dodger, who at no time rendered military service of any character, and a soldier who rendered possibly three, four, or five years' military service, and who for some reason, possibly beyond his control, was charged with desertion.

To my mind there is a wide difference between the two cases. I recall that the Committee on Military Affairs reported out a bill some years ago extending relief to a man who had enlisted in the Army from the State of Ohio. He served some seven months, during which he was in several engagements, and was captured at the Battle of Richmond by the Confederate forces. He was kept in prison for seven months. He broke guard and got away. His organization was then in Texas, as I now recall, or some point in the far South.

It was a physical impossibility for him to return to his organization, and he enlisted in the first military organization that he could reach and served to the end of the war. He was charged with desertion. These facts were brought before the Military Committee of the House. An investigation of the records disclosed that he had enlisted; that he did serve until captured; that he was captured and placed in prison; that he did break guard; and that he joined another regiment and served until the end of the war. Now, the Military Committee looked upon the service and character of that man entirely differently from what it would look upon the conduct of the man who evaded military service by refusing to respond to the call to report to the draft board and be inducted into the service.

Mr. GENSMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Not just at this moment.

There is another very large class of cases, charges of desertion, that have been considered by the Committee on Military Affairs. At the close of the Civil War, when peace was declared, or when Lee surrendered, a military organization was stationed here at Washington. The personnel of that organization was made up largely of men from West Virginia, Kentucky, and farther down the Ohio Valley. The organization was ordered to report to New York for muster out. Their officers said to them, as was later testified to by the officers, "The war is over, boys. You have fought a good fight. You are anxious to get home. Just go home. It will be all right. Instead of going to New York to muster out, go back to your homes, most of which are west of here." And instead of going to New York to be mustered out they did return to their homes. They had rendered most splendid military service. The thought of desertion had never once entered their minds. Yet under those peculiar circumstances they were charged with desertion, and many of them stand charged as deserters to-day. Many of them went to their graves with that charge against them. Ah, Mr. Speaker, there is a vast difference between the status of those men and the draft dodgers to whom this bill applies. Yet every time the committee has brought a bill to the floor of this House attempting to extend relief to some man who served his country, and who served it well, but who is charged with desertion, though the circumstances under which he was charged were, as previously stated, possibly beyond his control, the committee has been criticized for favoring deserters and attempting to extend unmerited benefits to them. And I felt, in justice to the committee, that I should submit these observations, in view of the remarks that have been submitted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

And I want to go a little further. There are many men—old men—in the United States to-day suffering under the stigma of the charge of desertion, who served their country during the war, and some of them for the entire period of the war, against whose names, by some technicality, the charge of desertion has been entered. To my mind the most cruel thing that can happen to a citizen after having served his Government faithfully and well is for that Government to refuse to be liberal in removing the charge of desertion, if the proof shows that he was not responsible for it, and place him and his posterity under the criticism of the community in which he lives that always attaches to the charge of desertion. To my mind it is the most cruel thing that the Government or any agent of the Government could do. I have no sympathy with the draft dodger. I would enact this bill so as to preclude any chance of any draft dodger getting out by reason of the limitation on the time within which the Military Establishment may prosecute him. But I look at him, as I have said, in a way entirely different from the way in which I look at the man who did serve his country, who was wounded in battle, as many of these men were, and who is charged with desertion because of circumstances absolutely beyond their control. They are not in the same class, and it is unfair for any man on the floor of this House or elsewhere to take any position that attempts to put them in the same class.

Now, with regard to this bill, the department has been waging a campaign of prosecution against draft evaders. They can not all be apprehended in a day. The prosecutions can not all be completed at once. The department may have devoted a great deal of time to running down the draft dodger who is in hiding and who is hoping that some advantage may accrue to him by the limitation of the statute under which he is being prosecuted, and possibly the department may almost have its hand upon him. Shall all that work be lost by allowing the limitation to stand, or shall we extend it so that the Government may have more time in which to prosecute the draft dodger?

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Let me finish this thought, and then I will.

Another thought: The question has been raised as to whether this Congress has the constitutional power to enact this law. Why, the Congress fixed the date when this present law should expire. Would any man contend that in fixing that date Congress could not have fixed the date proposed in this resolution instead of the date that it did fix as the date on which this statute shall expire? If Congress had that power when the original law was enacted, it certainly has the power now to amend the law by substituting a later date instead of the former one.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. I yield.

Mr. STEVENSON. Suppose the punishment for murder was imprisonment for life. The legislature has the right to fix that limit, has it not, and if a man has committed a homicide and the legislature increases the penalty to death, does the gentleman think the legislature has the power to do that?

Mr. FIELDS. This does not increase the punishment.

Mr. STEVENSON. No. It has the right to fix any limitation, but having fixed one, and the defendant having committed the offense under that limitation, can it now go and make another limitation to the disadvantage of the defendant? I hold that it can not.

Mr. FIELDS. It does not deprive the draft dodger of any right. It does not change the character of his offense or the punishment or penalty.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman said a minute ago that the Government was about to get its hand on a man, and the time expired. The Government can indict without having arrested, and from the time the indictment is found the statute does not run, and therefore when the Government indicts, whether it has got him or not, it can get him, even 10 years from now.

Take the case of Breese against United States, in North Carolina, where the indictment was found 12 years before the man was put to trial and convicted and sentenced.

Mr. FIELDS. Well, Mr. Speaker, being a layman, I am not familiar with the technical terms to which the gentleman refers and am unable to discuss that feature of the matter as ably as he discusses it. But I can see in this resolution no change in the crime of the draft dodger, and no change in the punishment to be inflicted upon him. The same punishment would be inflicted by an extension that would be inflicted if he were tried to-day.

Mr. STEVENSON. Does not this resolution take away the advantage he would have?

Mr. FIELDS. It does not deprive him of any right. It may deprive him of an advantage that he is about to enjoy by reason of a limitation of the statute to which he is not entitled.

Mr. STEVENSON. And it does work to his disadvantage, because it takes an advantage away from him, and that is the Supreme Court's definition of an ex post facto law.

Mr. FIELDS. Aside from the hairsplitting distinctions which are injected into the discussion, I think, Mr. Speaker, that the draft dodgers ought to be prosecuted, and in order to prosecute them this limitation should be extended.

Mr. STEVENSON. I agree thoroughly with the gentleman on that.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I want to say to the gentleman from Kentucky that so far as the question of limitation is concerned the law is stated in Twelfth Corpus Juris, page 1103, as follows:

A statute which purports to authorize the prosecution, trial, and punishment of a person for an offense previously committed, and as to which all prosecution, trial, and punishment were at the time of the passage of such statute already barred, according to preexisting statutes, is ex post facto.

And, of course, would be unconstitutional. I read further:

But it has been said that, in any case where a right to acquittal has not been absolutely acquired by the completion of the period of limitation, that period is subject to enlargement or repeal without being obnoxious to the constitutional prohibition against ex post facto laws.

Mr. STEVENSON. What court is that?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That cites no United States Supreme Court decision, but it cites Missouri, New Jersey, Texas, and Pennsylvania decisions.

Mr. STEVENSON. As I understand it, in many of these cases it has already expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The point I was going to make, if the gentleman will permit me, is that under all the decisions I have been able to find the rule seems to be that if the statute of limitations has expired you can not resurrect the offense and extend it. If it has not expired, you may enlarge it without violating the ex post facto prohibition of the Constitution.

Mr. FIELDS. Yes. That answers the objections to the bill that I have heard raised on my side of the Chamber, and I hope that those who have felt impelled to vote against the resolution because of those objections may now vote for it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Mr. FIELDS. I did not yield the floor to the gentleman. Can he take me off my feet?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is the gentleman's right to make the point of no quorum present.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. How much time has the gentleman left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] has three minutes remaining. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Almon	Foster	Linthicum	Rose
Ansoerge	Free	Lyon	Rosendale

Fenn	Lee, Calif.	Rodenberg
Fish	Lee, N. Y.	Rogers

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On this call 309 Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] has three minutes remaining.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, when interrupted by the point of no quorum I was just about to say that the soldiers who rendered service in the World War feel that those who refused to render service, who refused to comply with the draft law, should be called to account before the law for their actions. Not only do the soldiers feel that way but their people feel that way, and every citizen of the country not directly in sympathy with the draft evaders feels that draft evaders should be punished for their failure to serve. It is further to enable the department to carry on its campaign of prosecution against draft evaders that the enactment of this joint resolution is sought, and I trust that it may pass. It should pass unanimously. Every Member of the House should vote for it, because I feel—I know—that there is no Member of the House who is in sympathy with the men who failed to respond to their country's call in the hour of need, and who are now, many of them, in hiding, some under assumed names, hoping that they may be able to continue in hiding until the limitation runs, when they may gain some advantage.

Mr. Speaker, I yield the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi demands the yeas and nays. All those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Thirteen Members, not a sufficient number.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. KAHN. I make the point of order that that is dilatory, because we have just had a roll call which disclosed the presence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that we have voted on ordering the previous question and also upon the third reading since the quorum appeared, and the Chair thinks that the point of order is properly made. The Chair will count to ascertain if a quorum is present. [After counting.] Two hundred and two Members present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees. Those in favor of the passage of the joint resolution will, as their names are called, vote "yea," those opposed, "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 264, nays 20, answered "present" 5, not voting 140, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

On motion of Mr. KAHN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives to the bill (H. R. 9981) making appropriations for the Executive and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, had agreed to the conference asked for by the House, and had appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. SMOOT, Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. GLASS as conferees on the part of the Senate.

PURCHASE OF LAND FOR CEMETERIES IN EUROPE.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House joint resolution 263, authorizing the purchase of land for cemeteries for American military dead in Europe, and the improvement thereof.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. MCARTHUR in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the House joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to expend not to exceed $856,680 of the appropriation, "Disposition of remains of officers, soldiers, and civilian employees," in the act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes, approved March 4, 1921, for purchase of such real estate as is necessary to establish suitable burial places in Europe for American military dead, and for suitable and necessary improvements thereon, of which not to exceed $111,000 may be applied to the purchase of land as follows: Aisne-Marne, $20,000; Suresnes, $9,000; Somme, $11,000; Brookwood, $31,000; St. Mihiel, $15,000; Oise-Aisne, $20,000; Flanders Field, $5,000; total, $111,000.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, this resolution makes no new appropriation, but it allows a part of the money which was appropriated in the last bill to be used for the purchase of land which is now used as a cemetery in France. After the war the United States began to send back to this country the remains of many of the soldiers, sailors, and marines who lost their lives abroad. There are now 32,000 Americans that remain on French, Belgian, and English soil. It is thought that they will be allowed to sleep their last sleep in those countries. The War Department believes that after the great struggle which we went through the American people would like to see this Government get possession of the areas in France near the big battle fields where these men are buried and take proper care of those cemeteries; so that when any American who feels inclined to visit the Republic of France will be able to go to these places where our soldiers lie at rest and feel that his fellow countrymen are being cared for by the country that they served so well and so faithfully.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I notice on page 2 that $111,000 is set apart for the purchase of land; I presume near these battle fields. Has any investigation been made as to whether the lands can be purchased for this amount?

Mr. KAHN. I understand that these lands can be purchased for the amount set forth in the resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That has been arranged for.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And the balance of the appropriation is to be used to fit up the grounds.

Mr. KAHN. Oh, most of the balance of the appropriation is to be expended in this country.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if I may have the attention of the gentleman from California, I do not remember the amount of the appropriation in the sundry civil act, but this resolution authorizes $111,000 out of the appropriation already made for the purchase of land and $745,000 for the improvement in Europe of these cemeteries.

Just what the improvement is to be I do not know, but I suppose that includes inclosing the grounds, headstones, and various things of that sort.

Mr. KAHN. I have been at several of these cemeteries in Europe, the one at Suresnes, which is mentioned in the resolution here. It is just outside of the city of Paris. I think they have something like 3,000 graves there now. They are beautifully looked after. Various families among the people of France agreed among themselves to adopt for each family one grave to look after so long as there is anybody belonging to that family on earth. It is a beautiful thing to do. It is a remarkable sight to see dozens of families represented on those grounds by the children who were planting flowers on the grave of which their parents had become guardian. At one place in the north, Romagne, there were 27,000 graves dug at one time, but of course many of the bodies have been brought back to this country.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. VESTAL. Can the gentleman give us any information as to whether we propose to keep and improve all of the cemeteries that we have in France, or are they to be combined into one or more large cemeteries? At Romagne, for instance, the cemetery is quite large.

Mr. KAHN. Twenty-seven thousand Americans were buried there.

Mr. VESTAL. While at Theicourt, the cemetery is very small. I am wondering whether those cemeteries are going to be combined into one cemetery in France.

Mr. KAHN. Of course, they will have to have more than one. The bill contemplates more than one, but they expect to have a good-sized cemetery at some point near where the battle was fought, and the bodies will be brought into those large cemeteries from the smaller ones in the neighborhood.

Mr. VESTAL. At Romagne we have a force of Americans who are keeping the cemetery in fine condition.

Mr. KAHN. Twenty-seven thousand were buried at Romagne at one time, but now all of the Americans who are buried over there number only 32,000, so that Romagne has been probably cut down to about 9,000 or 10,000 graves.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I notice that in the appropriation originally made, it was not to exceed $856,680 for, as was stated, the disposition of remains of officers, soldiers, and civilian employees. I presume a question might be raised as to whether that would include the purchase of real estate, and for that reason this act provides that it shall be so included. Then, beside that amount, $111,000 is appropriated by specific amounts for certain named cemeteries.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. With regard to the consolidation, I presume it would be impracticable to make a consolidation all in one or two cemeteries.

Mr. KAHN. It would be impracticable.

Mr. TOWNER. And for that reason these cemeteries are particularly named?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. My understanding is that the total appropriation in the beginning was $856,680.

Mr. MANN. It was $1,000,000.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. And that out of this appropriation have been used funds already to bring the bodies back from France, and the balance is to be used for the purpose of purchasing grounds and improving property over there.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] who has looked at the law, finds that in the original bill $1,000,000 was appropriated, of which $856,000 is available for taking care of the bodies of certain officers and soldiers and civilian employees. Of that amount it was deemed advisable to segregate $111,000 and use that for the purchase of the cemeteries, where these men are buried.

Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, soon after the war closed I introduced a measure looking to the creation of what was to be called the field of honor in Europe, thinking that it might be possible to collect all the bodies of our soldier dead and bring them into one field for rest. It was the idea to have it so arranged that some beautiful section of France might be chosen as a spot for that purpose. I was told that it would not be difficult to have such a concession of land made by the French Government, and I introduced that measure. The plan was to have an incorporation to establish a fund of not less than $15,000,000, not to come out of the Treasury of the United States unless the Government so desired, and then have the grounds so arranged that the place of the burial of each soldier would be marked on a chart, which was to find a permanent place in some chapel to be erected out of the fund, so that when any American should go to France and go to this place he could go to the record and find where each boy was buried and what his service was, when and where he enlisted, the full record so far as his service was concerned and where he died.

The suggestion was very warmly accepted at first on the basis that if it were feasible it should be done, but some confusion about whether the Government should allow any association to contribute money for this purpose arose and it finally was dismissed and nothing further has been done. Probably it would not be feasible, but it seems to me that if we could have erected some sort of a field of honor of that kind somewhere in the most beautiful section of France, it would have been a very commendable tribute to our soldier dead and would be very far-reaching in its significance in respect to our thought about their sleeping in a foreign land. I presume there is no possibility of this at this stage. I gave up the effort some time ago, since my suggestion never got further than an interesting proposal.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, we have several times appropriated money designed to be expended in bringing the bodies of the soldier dead home from France. In 1921 we made an appropriation of $1,000,000 for "the disposition of the remains of officers, soldiers, and civilian employees." It covered quite a number of items. The purpose of this resolution is to permit the use of $111,000 of that million-dollar appropriation in the purchase of the land in seven cemeteries where the bodies of our soldier dead lie in France.

As I understand, the resolution also provides for the expenditure of a large sum of money out of the original appropriation for the purpose of improving these cemeteries. I am one of those who thought that while the parents of a deceased soldier who desired the body brought home should have that desire effectuated; but, after all, the most beautiful thing to do was to bury the bodies of the boys over there where they died and then forever keep that resting place in the most beautiful form which nature can give. There they passed away. We preserve some beautiful cemeteries in the United States where our soldiers fought and died in the past, and I think—at least it appeals to my heart—we ought to give these soldiers who died over there and their friends over here this resting place to be taken care of by a loving country forever in memory of their deeds and their loss, so that the people here may know that over there they are no more forgotten than they are forgotten here at home. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the joint resolution before the committee. I think the committee ought to know some of the phases of the proposition that has been submitted that were brought to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations recently. This proposition was discussed both in the regular bill for the support of the Army and also was asked to be included as an item of the deficiency bill. One of the arguments which influenced the subcommittee in not including it in the deficiency bill was that the program contemplated by the War Department involves a total expenditure, of which this is a beginning, of several million dollars. It also involves what the committee thought would be more of a desecration of the graves of the American soldiers in France than anything else in that the men who are in most of the cemeteries in France to-day are buried in rows about 3 feet apart. We were advised by the War Department they thought 6 feet was a proper width between those graves, and they told us that with this money they proposed to disinter a majority of the bodies there and reinter them according to those specifications. Our committee thought the men should be permitted to rest still where they are in peace for a while at least.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. Are we to understand they are to use part of the $110,000, or would they ask for other appropriations later?

Mr. ANTHONY. Our understanding is that they will ultimately ask for several million dollars, and in my opinion it will run to eight or ten million dollars, of which this is a beginning.

Mr. McKENZIE. That would be another feature but not connected with the appropriation for the purchase of land?

Mr. ANTHONY. No. There is only $111,000 included for the purchase of land. To complete the plan and program, however, involves an immense expenditure of money, and we felt we would like to have a more complete and more ample program before us before we allowed close to a million dollars to start that work.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Is the land on which they are buried now the property of the United States Government?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not know as to that. I am informed it is not. I understand the French Government has at all times stated that it is willing to give title or give the right to this Government to use the land for all time.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. That is without compensation?

Mr. ANTHONY. Without compensation.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Then there is no real need of purchasing the land at this time?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; in order to round out certain tracts. They desire to purchase additional tracts. But I understand the French Government has given guaranties that it will provide adequate land for that purpose. That is our information.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. The gentleman's judgment is these additional tracts called for in this bill ought to be purchased at this time?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think at some time they should be purchased when we can agree on what is a proper program over there. Just at present we do not have detailed information and we do not have a comprehensive plan on which we could proceed, and it is going to cost a great many million dollars before they get through with it.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. In other words, we are voting just a little blindly at this time?

Mr. ANTHONY. In my opinion we are voting a little blindly now if we vote $800,000 without knowing what the ultimate cost will be.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. KAHN. You have already voted the $800,000; that is in the bill; but this $111,000 that this bill contains takes in the matter of the purchase of the land only.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say we found there was over $5,000,000 yet unexpended and available of funds previously appropriated, which can, in my opinion, be used for this purpose; and it is our intention to put that money back into the Treasury until Congress has a chance to act definitely on a definite program. That money is now available for expenditure.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. TOWNER. This bill provides only for the purchase of real estate, at least it makes no provision for anything else. There is nothing else, as I understand it. I would like to have the gentleman from Illinois call attention to it if it is not correct—

Mr. MANN. This bill authorizes $111,000 for the purchase of real estate, and it authorizes the Secretary of War to expend $856,680 for the purchase of real estate and for suitable and necessary improvements thereon. So we appropriate or authorize the use of $111,000 for the purchase of the real estate and $745,000 for the improvement of that real estate.

Mr. TOWNER. It includes here the purchase of real estate, as the gentleman will see on line 9, as well as the particular purchase of real estate as thereafter mentioned.

Mr. MANN. But that purchase is limited.

Mr. TOWNER. The last purchase is limited to the purchase of real estate.

Mr. MANN. The purchase as mentioned on line 9 is limited by the language commencing on line 1, page 2, which says:

Of which not to exceed $111,000 may be used for the purchase of land, as follows.

That is the way I read it.

Mr. TOWNER. That is exactly my idea about it also. I have no doubt but the gentleman from Illinois is correct. But a part of this purchase money, of $856,680, may be used for the purchase of real estate, besides the $111,000 particularly mentioned, as I understand it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman may be correct, though that is not my construction of it.

Mr. TOWNER. It states specifically here that it is for the purchase of such real estate as is necessary, and besides it is specifically mentioned that $111,000 is to be used for the purchase of land, as follows, and particularly mentioning it in the item.

Mr. FAIRFIELD and Mr. KREIDER rose.

Mr. KAHN. I first yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD].

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Unless this bill passes, as I understand it, the appropriation which has been made is not available for this purpose.

Mr. KAHN. It is my understanding that it is not available for this purpose.

Mr. KREIDER. I would like to ask the gentleman, the chairman of the committee, whether all the soldiers that are buried in France and in Belgium are now buried at these five points enumerated in this bill?

Mr. KAHN. No; but they propose to bury them there if this bill goes through.

Mr. KREIDER. The gentleman knows, and so do I, as we were both over there at the same time, that they were buried in certain cemeteries. Does this bill cover those cemeteries?

Mr. KAHN. Not all of them. This is what happened: The department began to bring back to this country men who died and were buried in France. They have brought back a good many former soldiers, sailors, and marines. But there are still in France and in Belgium and in England 32,000 American dead.

Mr. KREIDER. Not now interred in these cemeteries?

Mr. KAHN. No. Some are interred in smaller cemeteries and some in larger. For instance, when I saw the gentleman over in France I think I went beyond the Hindenburg line. I saw the Chinese digging 27,000 graves; that many of our men were to be buried in that one cemetery alone. But subsequently, when the parents began to request that their loved ones be sent back to this country wherever they could be located, wherever the remains could be found, they were promptly sent back to this country. Now, we lost in war alone over there over 50,000 soldiers—50,350, I think. Those remains are buried near where they fell, sometimes in single graves, sometimes, as around Belleau Woods, a hundred in one little space.

Mr. KREIDER. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. KREIDER. Heretofore, as I understand it, it has been the privilege of the relatives or parents of those on the other side to have the bodies brought back?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. KREIDER. If I read this bill correctly and I have the thought right, the bill that was first passed appropriated $1,000,000 for this purpose?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. KREIDER. Of which apparently about $143,000 has been used. Now, then, we are specifying for what purpose this money may be used?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. KREIDER. Under the terms of this bill we provide that $111,000 may be used for the purchase of the real estate, and the difference between $111,000 and $856,680 can, under the terms of this bill, be used for suitable and necessary improvements thereon?

Mr. KAHN. That is it.

Mr. KREIDER. What I want to know is whether if the parents of these soldiers desire to have the bodies of their dead brought to this country—which I do not especially approve of, but yet I am willing to do whatever the parents of these soldier boys want done—I want to know if there are any funds available in order that they may continue to be brought back to this country at the expense of the Government?

Mr. KAHN. I think that the War Department has gone almost to the very bottom of those things. They announced very publicly, and it was known very generally in this country, that if anyone wanted the remains of the soldiers brought back to this country, by applying to the War Department the remains would be brought back.

Mr. KREIDER. I think that is true.

Mr. KAHN. But all of that has ceased now. They are not asking at this time that these boys be sent back here, and therefore the War Department has felt that this Government ought to have special burial places over there, so that any American visitors going over there can visit these cemeteries.

Mr. KREIDER. But you are not answering my question.

Mr. KAHN. What is your question?

Mr. KREIDER. My question is, if now, whether the War Department wants to or not and thinks the time has come when they should not be brought back, the parents of a boy think the time has come when he ought to be brought back, whether the War Department has the funds to do it and whether they will do it?

Mr. KAHN. I think they have the funds under this language:

Disposition of remains of officers, soldiers, and civilian employees.

Mr. KREIDER. I understand that, but if the War Department has expressed an opinion—

Mr. KAHN. They have not expressed any opinion, and that language at the head of a section in the original bill, in the appropriation bill, would take care of men that the gentlemen refers to.

Mr. KREIDER. But not after the passage of this bill.

Mr. KAHN. As long as that kind of language remains in an appropriation bill the money will be there to bring them back.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. This $856,680 is only a portion of the appropriation?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. KREIDER. I beg your pardon. It was $1,000,000 appropriated and $145,000 has been spent. This is what is left out of the $1,000,000?

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman is right about that.

Mr. KREIDER. And when you appropriate all that is left for the purchase of ground and the improvement thereof you are liable to use every dollar of it. The only question I am interested in—and I want it to be clearly understood—is that the parent of the boy who has died in France and who desires the body to be brought back can be gratified by having the remains of his boy brought back.

Mr. KAHN. I think he can be brought back.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. KETCHAM. In line 12 of the resolution I notice this language:

Of which not to exceed $111,000 may be applied to the purchase of land.

Mr. KAHN. Yes—

to the purchase of land as follows.

Then the places and amounts are given.

Mr. KETCHAM. In the letter of the Secretary of War I notice the same identical language. Is the chairman able to advise us as to whether or not the $111,000 is to cover the entire purchase price, or whether that language can be so construed as to convey the idea that this is but a partial payment?

Mr. KAHN. No. I believe that it is in full payment for the rights of America to these various tracts of land.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. KAHN. I was going to make a little statement. Then I will yield.

Mr. TILSON. Let the gentleman make his statement first, and then I will follow.

Mr. KAHN. I was in France at the time our cemeteries were established there. They were very large tracts of land, most of them. We had thousands of former soldiers and ex-soldiers buried there. I saw in Romagne alone 27,000 buried; in Surmes there were 3,000 buried. In Thiencourt there were 6,000 buried, and in various other places throughout France large cemeteries have been established.

Now, when the War Department began to bring home the remains of these boys there were large numbers brought out of the cemeteries, which left big void spaces in many of them. For instance, the Romagne, which had 27,000 dead at one time, has been cut down, so that there are only about 9,000 there now, all told.

Now, the purpose of this law is to get absolute title to some of those places where the Americans are buried, and later on, of course, they will be beautified and the people of this country will be given every opportunity to visit these places and visit the graves of those in whom they are interested.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. In view of the gentleman's explanation, would he be willing to make this change in the language: "not to exceed $111,000 may be used for the purchase of land" instead of "applied to"?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me there to offer a suggestion?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think my friend from Michigan is needlessly troubled about that. The whole sum is applied by the terms of this bill generally to undistinguished purchases of land, with the reservation that $111,000 is to be applied directly to the cemeteries that follow. The word "application" does not mean partial payment. It means that in the distribution of the amounts of money, wherever the rest may go, this goes to those places.

Mr. KETCHAM. In that event my amendment would not do any harm, would it?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It simply might delay the passage of the resolution through another House, requiring that it should come back here again. I know the gentleman does not intend to do that.

Mr. KETCHAM. No; I do not desire to do that.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. There is money enough possibly to supply all of these requirements. The general provisions of the bill will supply that money to go there, and, whatever we do with the rest, the sum of $111,000 is to be used in these particular instances.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. TILSON. Before the gentleman from California proceeds, will he allow me to say a word?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. We have already appropriated $1,000,000 for the disposition of the remains of officers, soldiers, and civilian employees. In this bill we propose to authorize the Secretary of War to expend not to exceed $856,680 of this $1,000,000 for the purchase of such real estate as is necessary to establish suitable burial places in Europe for American military dead. Is that correct?

Mr. KAHN. Yes. Of course, that simply repeats the language that is already in the appropriation.

Mr. TILSON. No; I think not.

Mr. KAHN. I think it is.

Mr. TILSON. I have searched through the section of the sundry civil bill to which the gentleman refers, and I can not find the language there. It seems to me the purpose of this resolution is to authorize the Secretary of War to purchase such real estate as is necessary to establish suitable burial places in Europe for American military dead and to make improvements thereon. Out of this $856,680 he may expend not to exceed $111,000 for certain specific real estate mentioned here; that is, a certain amount for each one of these specific cases?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. It seems to me that he is authorized to expend $856,680 for the purchase of such real estate as is necessary, and so forth, and out of this amount he is authorized to expend not to exceed $111,000 for these specific places. Is that the meaning of the bill?

Mr. KAHN. That is the new language of the bill. The other language is practically in the bill under the head of "Disposition of the remains of officers, soldiers, and civilian employees."

Mr. TILSON. I have that act referred to in the resolution before me, and I do not find the language there.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was looking at it a little while ago.

Mr. VESTAL. The gentleman is right. The language is not in there.

Mr. MANN. There is no provision in the original appropriation for the purchase of land.

Mr. TILSON. That was my impression and that is the way I read the law.

Mr. LOWREY. Will the gentleman from California yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. LOWREY. What was the meaning of the statement made a while ago that France had expressed a willingness to give the land for the burial of these boys? Does it mean simply that she allows us to purchase it from private individuals?

Mr. KAHN. Of course, I have heard a great many things about what this country or that country was willing to do or was not willing to do, but my own experience is that the pay that they demand is very welcome for anything they give us.

Mr. LOWREY. Then this appropriation is to buy land owned by private individuals?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. LOWREY. On certain fields?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. LOWREY. I just wanted to bring that fact out.

Mr. KAHN. We were involved in the greatest war that ever called for the soldiers of any country, and we came forward in a splendid manner. All told, our armies and our navies and the marines furnished very nearly 5,000,000 men. It was a terrific number of soldiers, sailors, and marines. Two million of them went over to Europe. A little over 50,000 were killed, and there were buried originally wherever they happened to fall. When I was over there I saw the original graves—one man buried here, another man buried 5 feet away, another man buried 10 feet away, and then probably three or four buried in a little space close together. Then our graves registration people went over there and they took up every one of those bodies buried in isolated graves and reinterred them in larger cemeteries. Around Belleau Wood I saw cemeteries that had as many as 100 dead, or 200, and occasionally I would see a cemetery that had as many as a thousand dead. In every one of those terrific battles through which our soldiers passed we had many dead. At the Meuse-Argonne fight we lost at least 20,000, who were all buried, nominally, up at Romagne, beyond the Hindenburg line. They arranged for 27,000 men to be buried in that cemetery. I do not know whether they were all recognizable. They had been stricken down on the battle field. A shell would come along and possibly knock off two or three heads, and it was hard to identify the bodies. But our forces did the best that could be done. I was hoping that this Government would be content to allow those men who died over there to rest there in peace forever. I was up at the little grave erected over the remains of Quentin Roosevelt. There was a family that had as much right to demand the return of their boy's body as any family in the country, but the ex-President and his wife both agreed that the body was properly buried where it fell, and the grave is taken care of beautifully by the French people. It is an isolated grave. It is not surrounded by any other bodies.

A great many of the people who lost their loved ones in that war began to feel that they wanted them brought over to this country. They wanted them buried in the cemeteries near their own homes, so that they could visit the graves whenever they were inclined to do so, and the War Department yielded to that feeling.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield for a question for explanation?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. After a great battle it is necessary to have a large area of ground to bury the dead. The Republic of France did not own any ground there. It belonged to private landowners—the farmers. How did they acquire the land in that emergency, and what title did they take to the land?

Mr. KAHN. Of course, these cemeteries were opened up on land that was not occupied by dwellings or buildings. It was farm land in some cases and vineyard land in other cases, and I imagine that the Republic of France took possession because the men fell just where this vacant land happened to lie.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Does the gentleman suppose that the French Government has since paid the owners?

Mr. KAHN. I do not think so. I think the money is due for this land, and this bill allows the Government of the United States to make that payment. That is the situation as I view it; but there is a situation over there that singularly appeals to me. These boys were mostly born in the United States of America. They gave to their country in the hour of its stress the greatest thing that any man could give to his country under such circumstances. They gave their lives to the Republic. They were buried over there. Many relatives have not demanded that their loved ones be brought back to this country. They are going to sleep the everlasting sleep right over there in France, and I for one feel that this country, which they served so well and so faithfully in those days, can well afford to see that their last resting place is well cared for; that everything possible to be done by this country should be done in order to make their final sleeping place worthy of the land for whose welfare and rights they were willing to lay down their lives. [Applause.]

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. TILSON. I thoroughly agree with all that the gentleman has said, and I would like to ask him just how much it is intended under this authorization to pay for real estate? Is it just the $111,000?

Mr. KAHN. That is all.

Mr. TILSON. The remainder of the language is to provide an authorization for such improvements as may be necessary. Is that the purpose?

Mr. KAHN. I take it that that is what it means.

Mr. TILSON. It seems to me that under the language of the resolution they might expend it all for the purchase of real estate; therefore I asked the gentleman what was the purpose of the committee?

Mr. KAHN. The purpose of the committee was to allow $111,000 to be expended for the real estate referred to in the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the bill for amendment.

Mr. TILSON. There is a misspelled word in the third line of page 2; the word "Oisne" should be "Oise."

Mr. KAHN. It should read "Oise."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House, with the recommendation that the joint resolution be agreed to.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. McARTHUR, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House joint resolution 263, authorizing the purchase of land for cemeteries for American military dead in Europe and the improvement thereof, and had directed him to report the same back with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution to final passage.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the resolution.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KAHN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I submit a conference report on the bill (H. R. 10267) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, for printing under the rule.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN ENLISTED MEN.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8475) to relieve enlisted men affected thereby from certain hardship incident to the operation of the proviso of section 4b of the national defense act of June 3, 1916, as amended by the act of June 4, 1920, and to protect disbursing officers in connection therewith.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union with Mr. MAPES in the chair.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all payments heretofore made in good faith to enlisted men while in active service by reason of anything contained in that portion of the proviso of section 4b of the act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, as amended by the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes,' approved June 3, 1916, and to establish military justice," approved June 4, 1920, reading: "That nothing in this section shall operate to reduce the pay which any enlisted man is now receiving during his current enlistment and while he holds his present grade," be, and the same hereby are, validated for all purposes, irrespective of whether such payments conform to decisions of the Comptroller of the Treasury or the General Accounting Office; and such payments shall be passed by the proper accounting officers of the United States to the credit of the disbursing officers making the same. Any sums of money which have been deducted from the pay of any enlisted man on account of any such payment validated by this act shall be refunded.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, this bill was introduced at the request of the War Department on account of the peculiar situation that developed in the Military Establishment. About a year and a half ago a law was passed changing the pay of soldiers of the United States, especially the noncommissioned officers. The matter was submitted to the Comptroller of the Treasury. The comptroller made a decision and held that these noncommissioned officers were entitled to certain amounts. Thereupon the officers in the pay department of the Government began to expend the money accordingly. About three or four months afterwards the comptroller reviewed his own decision and concluded that he had been in error and that his first recommendation was not in accordance with the law. The War Department thereupon issued an order to these noncommissioned officers to repay the amount they had received above the original amount, and if they could not pay it all at once they could pay a certain amount of it at a time until they were again square or even with the Government.

It developed then that some of the noncommissioned officers had left the Army. Others made protestations to the effect that they were not able to pay these amounts, and there was such confusion in the matter that the War Department, after investigating the whole situation, decided that this bill ought to be introduced and to let bygones be bygones. In other words, some of the men had got an excess of money and can not pay it back, others had left the service, and others who were able to pay were wroth about being compelled to pay, because they claimed that it was a severe hardship on them.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. How much will it cost the Government to "let bygones be bygones"?

Mr. KAHN. I understand the amount is not very great.

Mr. GARNER. That term does not give me much information.

Mr. KAHN. The amount is not in the report.

Mr. GARNER. In other words, you are asking the House to pass a resolution taking money out of the Treasury without any information as to how much it will be. It seems to me that the committee at least ought to get sufficient information to tell the House what the Government is going to lose by the passage of this resolution. You provide for the repayment of certain moneys and say it is not very great, but you can not give any information as to the amount. That is the kind of a report that is coming from the Military Affairs Committee.

Mr. KAHN. As I recall the matter, I think the highest amount that it could possibly carry would be $75. That is, a noncommissioned officer was getting at the time the law was passed $75 a month.

Mr. GARNER. There are quite a number of noncommissioned officers in the Army.

Mr. KAHN. I think it will not amount to much.

Mr. MANN. Oh, an enlisted man told me he was getting $130 a month.

Mr. GARNER. That is just about the same kind of information that we have about the bill. It about represents the difference between 75 and 130.

Mr. KAHN. Seventy-five dollars a month was the pay that an enlisted man was to get. Now, I think the most that he can get is about $97. That is the outside limit. I do not know how the man of whom the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] speaks gets $130 a month.

Mr. MANN. Oh, that is about what these private enlisted men get who are detailed for service in the departments in Washington, with all of the extra allowances given them. They earn the money.

Mr. KAHN. Unless they are noncommissioned officers—

Mr. MANN. But this man I speak of is an enlisted man and not a noncommissioned officer.

Mr. KAHN. How he can possibly get a salary like $130 a month I do not know.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I think the committee ought to congratulate the gentleman from California upon the information that he has from his committee touching this resolution. It is gratifying to know that the 21 members of that committee are so diligent in making inquiry as to the effect of legislation that they can not even estimate the amount of money that the resolution will carry.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Praise from Sir Hubert is praise, indeed, inasmuch as Sir Hubert is now up to his ears in an effort to find out how much the bonus will cost.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I have a case in point which I desire to ask the gentleman about. A noncommissioned officer left the Army, and he has been notified that he must refund certain money and has paid back a certain amount of it. He has written to me asking whether it is necessary for him to continue paying that back. What about it?

Mr. KAHN. If this bill becomes a law, he will not have to do it.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. He has already refunded a portion of it.

Mr. KAHN. That will be returned to him.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Have the rulings of the comptroller become so settled that they are not likely to have difficulties like this arising in the future?

Mr. KAHN. Of course, the comptroller has been changing his mind always whenever he has gotten new light on a question. I do not want to be responsible for the rulings of any comptroller in the past or in the future.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. As I understand the statement of the gentleman, the money has been paid out, the water has passed over the wheel.

Mr. KAHN. Yes; most of it.

Mr. McSWAIN. So that really the purpose of this bill is to give credit to these disbursing officers whose books do not exactly balance with the new ruling of the comptroller.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. So that it is not so much a bill as it says, to relieve the enlisted man of certain hardships, as it is to relieve the disbursing officer.

Mr. KAHN. Yes; the disbursing officer, of course, is charged with the payments, but the payments were made through no fault of his.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. LOWREY. I think my friend from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN] is not exactly accurate on that. I know a soldier now who has been utterly disabled for a year and a half or such a matter. He has a large amount of this kind charged against him. The money was paid to him; paid to him in good faith and he accepted it in good faith. Now they have demanded that he pay that money back, and he is in no shape to do it. It works a hardship upon him. It was not his fault that he got the money and spent it.

Mr. McSWAIN. The point I make is that the water has already gone over the wheel.

Mr. LOWREY. I agree with my friend from Texas [Mr. GARNER] that we ought to know how much we are voting, but I do not believe these boys ought to be made to pay this money back, especially disabled boys.

Mr. KAHN. This is to relieve them.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. In the interest of keeping the record clear, the chairman of the committee used the term as I understood him "Comptroller General." The decision in this case was made by a comptroller prior to the appointment of the present Comptroller General. There has been no change of opinion on the part of the present Comptroller General, because he did not come to the office until the 1st of July, and these decisions were made before that time.

Mr. KAHN. That is correct. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be read for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk again reported the bill for amendment.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. WALSH, having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MAPES, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 8475, and had directed him to report the same back with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KAHN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SALE OF CLOTHING TO ENLISTED MEN.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 2492, to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1921.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 2492, with Mr. DOWELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 2492, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2492) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1921.

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1921, be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

That the first paragraph under the heading "Clothing, camp, and garrison equipage," on page 15 of the law, be amended to read as follows:

"For cloth, woollens, materials, and for the purchase and manufacture of clothing for the Army, including enlisted men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps and retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty; for issue and for sale at a price to be determined and fixed by the Secretary of War; for payment of commutation of clothing due to warrant officers of the Mine Planters Service and to enlisted men; for altering and fitting clothing and washing and cleaning when necessary; for operation of laundries; for equipment and repair of equipment of dry-cleaning plants, salvage, and sorting storehouses, hat repairing shops, shoe repair shops, clothing repair shops, and garbage reduction works; for equipage, including authorized issues of toilet articles, barbers' and tailors' materials, for use of general prisoners confined at military posts without pay or allowances and applicants for enlistment while held under observation; issue of toilet kits to recruits upon their first enlistment, and issue of housewives to the Army; for expenses of packing and handling and similar necessities; for a suit of citizen's outer clothing, to cost not exceeding $30, to be issued when necessary to each soldier discharged otherwise than honorably; to each enlisted man convicted by civil court for an offense resulting in confinement in a penitentiary or other civil prison; and to each enlisted man ordered interned by reason of the fact that he is an alien enemy, or, for the same reason, discharged without internment; for indemnity to officers and men of the Army for clothing and bedding, etc., destroyed since April 22, 1898, by order of medical officers of the Army for sanitary reasons, $12,000,000: Provided, That hereafter the settlement of clothing accounts of enlisted men, including charges for clothing drawn in excess of clothing allowance and payments of amounts due them when they draw less than their allowance, shall be made at such periods and under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War."

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 2, line 2, strike out the words "a price" and insert in lieu thereof "average current prices."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] as may be required to explain the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for one hour.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration provides for the making of a new schedule for materials allotted to soldiers and carried in Army post exchanges. The present schedule was fixed at a time when prices were very much higher than they are now. Therefore the present schedule is not at all in line with the present market and it puts the Government in this position: First, in making allotment to the soldier for the clothing that he draws from the Government they must charge him with a price, as I have said, much higher than the price of to-day's market in the goods carried by the commissary, for the goods carried by the commissaries cost much higher prices than current market prices. If this condition is not met by a new arrangement, of course, the people are not going to buy those goods. They would be left on the Government's hands. The Government has sold a lot of stuff as surplus and at a great deal lower prices than its post exchange prices upon those goods to-day, and in order to correct that situation the War Department has asked for this legislation which the committee has recommended and which I think should pass.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. I will.

Mr. FESS. If the War Department can sell surplus goods to the jobber at prices lower than the cost price and they would not be able to sell to the soldier except at cost price, there is of necessity a discrimination against the soldier?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes; a discrimination that should be corrected and corrected as speedily as possible. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Vermont such time as he may desire to use.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. I want to ask the gentleman from Kentucky the same question which the gentleman from Texas just propounded on another bill to the gentleman from California. How much will this cost the Government?

Mr. FIELDS. I do not see where it will cost the Government anything. It may save a great deal of money because, if these goods now in the hands of the Government are not disposed of, they will naturally become shopworn and deteriorate.

Mr. MANN. They are now being disposed of at the price the Government paid plus 10 per cent.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MANN. Can anybody tell what that cost price is? I had supposed the gentleman from Kentucky would have the information right at hand.

Mr. FIELDS. I did not grasp the gentleman's question. It seems that the gentleman from Vermont did, and I was going to yield to him.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The letter of the Acting Secretary of War to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, given in the report, tells how the price lists are made up.

In preparing price lists to govern the sale of clothing, the following procedure is used: The quantity of each article on hand at the time the last price list was issued is multiplied by the price then in force. The quantity of each article purchased since the publication of the last price list is multiplied by the cost per article. The sum of these two amounts divided by the total of the quantity of the articles on hand and purchased give the price for the new list.

Mr. MANN. Well, it is the cost price plus a certain percentage to cover expenses. How much is that extra percentage?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It is not fixed at a percentage.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. This letter explains the average struck by making this mathematical computation.

Mr. MANN. This is to get the cost price?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No; this is the price list governing the sale, and it says so in English.

Mr. MANN. This is all in regard to the cost price.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It says, "In preparing price lists to govern the sale of clothing, the following procedure is used." And by that they try to strike an average.

Mr. MANN. Certainly; they are trying to arrive at the cost price or the average, if they have got several lots of the same character, and to that they add a percentage to protect the Government for the expenses of attending to the business by these sale of stores, and so forth, and certainly I was sure that some member of the Committee on Military Affairs would know what that percentage is.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think that obtains when they sell things outside of military supplies, but the gentleman will bear in mind that articles of clothing are issued to the soldier as the soldier's right, and he is charged a certain amount on the books, and, because he has a certain clothing allowance, until that allowance is reached he is entitled to draw at these prices. And there is no profit to be charged upon it, because he has a right to be clothed.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is correct about that as to clothing for the enlisted men.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. In the other supplies there is a profit.

Mr. MANN. This covers underclothing and everything of that kind.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the gentleman will again permit, the new plan adopted by the Army is a reversion to the plan followed prior to the war, when the soldier was given a clothing allowance, and when he made incidental economies inside that allowance he had something coming back from the Government. He sometimes bought cloth and other things which by his own tailoring he made come within his own price. He still had at the end certain commutation he could draw out of his original clothing allowance. He did not therefore always draw all in kind. But that was suspended during the war, because, of course, the great consumption in uniforms during war times was such that the soldier ought not to have been held down to any particular price. Now that the war is over, they have gone back to the clothing-allowance system again.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, several years ago I went over this matter of the commissary supplies and I found it very interesting. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is mistaken largely—and he seldom is mistaken—as to the sale of these commissary supplies. The Government does not charge a profit. It does not even charge for the transportation of the commodity that is intended for the soldier or for the officer. All that they pay is the invoice price of the commodity. So the commissary department is under very heavy expense on account of that law. I have often thought that it would be a good thing if there were a charge made for overhead expenditures. Surely the Government ought not to be called upon to pay these large amounts. I think the Government sales to these men through the commissary very reasonable. I think if the Government were to charge a small profit, so that there would not be a terrific deficit at the end of the year, it would be a very much wiser thing to do in handling this matter.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. It has seemed to me in studying this proposition that it would be wise for the Government to entirely eliminate these commissaries, except on military posts and places where there is no market that the Army people can reach. What does the gentleman think about that?

Mr. KAHN. Of course, at one time in the history of the country we sent our soldiers to the frontier—

Mr. FIELDS. And it was absolutely necessary to provide for this.

Mr. KAHN. Absolutely so.

Mr. FIELDS. And we may have some isolated cases yet.

Mr. KAHN. A very few.

Mr. FIELDS. And it would be very necessary to supply them. But where supplies can be had in the general market, what does the gentleman think about it?

Mr. KAHN. I think the commissary stores should largely be closed up and that the men should be allowed to purchase their supplies with the other citizens of the Republic.

Mr. FIELDS. You say "allowed." They are not prevented from doing that now.

Mr. KAHN. No; but they get special benefits from going to the commissaries, I think.

Mr. FIELDS. Special benefits that other citizens do not get.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They dispose of these goods now, do they not?

Mr. KAHN. Of course, that is hard to say. The various officers were allowed to declare certain supplies surplus, and then bids were called for for the sale of that surplus. Every few months lately, I understand, they have been announcing additional surplus.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And without this law?

Mr. KAHN. They do not need this law for supplying surplus. The consequence has been that private parties have bought large quantities of goods—

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. To their advantage.

Mr. KAHN (continuing). Of shoes, outer clothing and under-clothing, hats, socks, and are to-day able to sell them cheaper than the Army itself can sell them. That is the reason why the Army is asking for the passage of this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And this will remedy that, will it?

Mr. KAHN. Yes, sir.

Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE].

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I only wanted to suggest this in connection with the colloquy which has just taken place. Of course, it was not intended to apply to the real purpose of this bill, because this bill does not relate to the general purposes of those post-exchange establishments, or anything of that kind, in the usual sense. This bill is based upon the fact that the soldier has a right to get his clothing from the Government anyway, and the question is how much you are going to charge him for it on the clothing allowance. The other thing is incidental.

I simply want to say, however, lest there be some altogether different impression gained by an inadvertent remark here, that the so-called post-exchange establishments in the Army do not serve altogether the same idea of extravagance and uselessness that might be inferred, and it does not depend necessarily upon the post being so isolated on a frontier that such an establishment is necessary for the convenience of the people at the post. I only suggest to you, for instance, a case right here in mind, at Fort Myer, across the river. You must remember that your commissioned officers and their families must support themselves. They do not draw any rations from the Government. They have to make their own purchases. Here they are, right within the shadow of a great city, and yet they are miles away from it, and it is a matter of simple, everyday common convenience that there be some establishment there that will take care of the ordinary housekeeping wants of those housekeepers and enable them to make their purchases there at Fort Myer instead of trudging across the river to Washington in order to do it. And they enjoy other conveniences.

I think we ought not, perhaps, to permit ourselves to get a prejudice against the so-called post exchange of an Army post just because it does not happen to be on a frontier and because there may be some economic advantage of a small percentage to the people who benefit by it. It has long been the established policy of the country to understand and to put into the philosophy of its military laws that while it did not pay these people a price that would enable them to live in luxury, if it could furnish any conveniences for them at the military posts that would enable them to piece out economies and bring their recognized small salary up to a fair standard, the Government was always willing to do it. Nobody pretends that an Army officer gets enough money to-day to save any, like they would be expected to do in civil life.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1921, be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

That the first paragraph under the heading "Clothing, camp and garrison equipage," on page 15 of the law, be amended to read as follows:

"For cloth, woollens, materials, and for the purchase and manufacture of clothing for the Army, including enlisted men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps and retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty; for issue and for sale at average current prices to be determined and fixed by the Secretary of War; for payment of commutation of clothing due to warrant officers of the Mine Planters' Service and to enlisted men; for altering and fitting clothing and washing and cleaning when necessary; for operation of laundries; for equipment and repair of equipment of dry-cleaning plants, salvage, and sorting storehouses, hat repairing shops, shoe repair shops, clothing repair shops, and garbage reduction works; for equipage, including authorized issues of toilet articles, barbers' and tailors' materials, for use of general prisoners confined at military posts without pay or allowances and applicants for enlistment while held under observation; issue of toilet kits to recruits upon their first enlistment, and issue of housewives to the Army; for expenses of packing and handling and similar necessities; for a suit of citizen's outer clothing, to cost not exceeding $30, to be issued when necessary to each soldier discharged otherwise than honorably; to each enlisted man convicted by civil court for an offense resulting in confinement in a penitentiary or other civil prison; and to each enlisted man ordered interned by reason of the fact that he is an alien enemy, or, for the same reason, discharged without internment; for indemnity to officers and men of the Army for clothing and bedding, etc., destroyed since April 22, 1898, by order of medical officers of the Army for sanitary reasons, $12,000,000: Provided, That hereafter the settlement of clothing accounts of enlisted men, including charges for clothing drawn in excess of clothing allowance and payments of amounts due them when they draw less than their allowance, shall be made at such periods and under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War."

With a committee amendment, as follows:

On page 2, line 2, strike out the words "a price" and insert in lieu thereof "average current prices."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to ask the gentleman from California a question about that amendment. I understood the gentleman to say that these articles are sold at cost, and he proposes to amend by saying "at average current prices." If the average current prices were less than the prices charged you would have to charge a profit.

Mr. KAHN. No. This is the situation: Most of these materials were bought during the war. They are charged for at war prices, but they can be bought in these stores which deal in Army equipment for very much less than they can be bought in the Army, because a great deal of this stuff has been declared surplus and has been sold to the dealers at very much lower rates.

Mr. HOCH. You are proposing a permanent law here?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. HOCH. Under the facts that the gentleman has mentioned these articles were all bought at a cost price higher than the market price, according to his statement.

Mr. KAHN. The articles in the hands of the commissary department were all bought at higher prices.

Mr. HOCH. Yes. But the question I am asking is this: Hereafter, under this law, when articles are bought at a cost price less than the market price, under this amendment you will then have to sell them at the current market price, even though that involves a profit to the Government.

Mr. FIELDS. If the gentleman will yield, as to these articles, if you confine the price strictly to the current price—

Mr. HOCH. You mean the current retail price?

Mr. FIELDS. No; the current cost price to the Government.

Mr. HOCH. It does not say that. It says they shall be issued and sold at the average current prices.

Mr. FIELDS. That means cost price to the Government. There may be and are fluctuations, and if you attempt to follow each item and all the fluctuations it would be an endless task to keep up with it, and the object of that language was not to confine it to that but to the current average price of the commodities.

Mr. HOCH. If the gentleman's interpretation is correct, I was raising the question of the meaning of that language. I would say that ordinarily that language, "average current prices," would be construed as average current retail market prices.

Mr. FIELDS. It means average current cost prices.

Mr. HOCH. Why should it not say that, then?

Mr. FIELDS. It would do no harm. I do not see that it would do any good.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The bill has passed the Senate. You would not want to offer an amendment unless there was use for it.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment. On page 2, line 3, after the word "current," insert the word "cost."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOCH to the committee amendment: Page 2, line 3, after the word "current," insert the word "cost."

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I do not see how that amendment does any good, nor does it do any harm, and I therefore agree to it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield the floor?

Mr. HOCH. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, that word "cost" is the stumblingblock in this thing, because the War Department already has a system whereby it averages the cost. It has to do that sort of thing in order to maintain anything like a fair, even rate at which it distributes these things from time to time to the soldiers. The purchases are made at varying times.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, as I understand, the insertion of that word "cost" destroys the whole purpose of this bill.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It does.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. According to the statement made to the Committee on Rules, this material had, most of it, been bought at a high price, and it was desired to change the act so that it could be sold to the soldiers at a lower price.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The word "cost" would require in each case the definition of what was paid for that specific thing, whereas these things go upon the shelves and the things are not priced at the exact purchase price from time to time.

Mr. MANN. If they were buying these things currently, I do not see that there would be any objection to putting in the language, "the average current cost price." But I assume, although I do not know, that when the Army has a large surplus on hand of certain kinds of cloths, woolen materials, and so forth, they have no average, no current cost price, because they are not buying an additional surplus.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. HOCH. I was only trying to give as the interpretation what members of the committee say this language means. My point is this: We are enacting here permanent legislation. It so happens that under present conditions these articles are bought at a much higher current market price. The gentleman says the purpose of the Government is to sell these articles at cost.

Mr. MANN. Not at cost; at value.

Mr. HOCH. Under the present system they must sell them at the average cost, under a certain system. Now, they seek to sell them nearer the current market price. But suppose that the Government had bought these articles at lower than the current market price?

Mr. MANN. That occurred to me; and we would change the legislation so quickly that we would not let one night pass over it.

Mr. HOCH. If it is the purpose to change the legislation subsequently, that, of course, will accomplish the purpose; but under this language it is entirely conceivable that you might be compelled to charge a profit to the men.

Mr. MANN. That would not hurt them, as far as that is concerned; but we would not do it.

Mr. HOCH. If that is desirable, very well; but the chairman of the committee says he does not want to do that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Government does not want to go into the profit-making business.

Mr. HOCH. I asked if it meant the retail price, and they said not, but that it meant the cost price.

Mr. MANN. If they were making a purchase of these surplus materials there would be no objection to inserting the word "cost"; but if they are not making purchases, they can not reduce the sales price, because they have no average cost price.

Mr. HOCH. I have no desire to urge the amendment. I was simply trying to carry out what the members of the committee said they intended. Apparently they do not agree as to what they intended.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendment back to the House, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. WALSH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOWELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (S. 2492) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1921, had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. MANN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY, NAVY, AND MARINE CORPS.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 296.

Resolved, That the report of the special committee created by the provisions of section 13 of the act entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service," approved May 18, 1920, shall be referred to a special committee of five to be appointed by the Speaker, which committee shall have power to report to the House by bill or otherwise.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Was this plan of disposal agreed upon by the entire joint committee?

Mr. McKENZIE. I would not say that it had been agreed upon by the entire joint committee, but it has been discussed among us, and it has been agreed that it is the only parliamentary way in which we can handle this bill properly. I spoke with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] about it and with the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], and in fact we have discussed it quite fully; and while the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] and perhaps the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KRAUS] may not support the bill in the end, it is agreed that this is the only way in which we can get the bill reported to the House, get the report into the House, and get a bill onto the calendar. This is simply to take care of the parliamentary mechanism.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In other words, the subject matter is one that would be divided among several committees if it were introduced in the regular way, as I understand?

Mr. McKENZIE. That is it exactly; and as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs I do not want it to come to our committee, and members of the Committee on Naval Affairs would feel that it should not go there, and this will simply provide for a committee to which it may be sent in a parliamentary way, with authority to report back a bill if they can agree upon one.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 297.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, authorized to sit during the sessions of the House, such permission being confined to the present session of the Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman a question? I assume this authority is sought on account of the desire of the committee to consider legislation suggested in the message of the President yesterday?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. It is not expected to go any further than that bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is it the purpose of the committee to have open hearings?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Has the gentleman in mind now about what he thinks the extent of the hearings are likely to be?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I can not tell anything about it. I do not know how many people care to be heard. They will not begin probably for a week.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I read what I suppose all have read in the local press at two or three different times, that the majority members of the committee had really agreed upon a measure. That was a week or 10 days ago—long before the President delivered his message. I presume it is like a good many newspaper stories—that there is nothing in it.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I did not hear any recommendations until it was delivered here, and I had not seen any bill. The bill was not in my possession until after that time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

COAL LANDS IN ALASKA.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 8842, with Senate amendments, and agree to the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 8842. An act to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands in Alaska.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. GARNER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SINNOTT. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. Has the gentleman talked with the ranking minority member of the committee?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes; I talked with Judge RAKER, of California, and this is agreeable to him.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. SINNOTT. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. I have examined the changes that have been made by the Senate amendments, and I understand it is the opinion of the gentleman from Oregon and my opinion that these amendments do not in any essential way modify the legislation or change its effect.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

INSCRIPTIONS ON MEMORIALS AND TABLETS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The attention of the Chair has been directed to a bill passed the other day entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to sanction the use of certain titles on tablets and other memorials." The House agreed to a Senate amendment striking out the word "titles" and inserting the word "inscriptions" in the bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMPBELL] was to ask that the title of that bill be amended to conform with the text in order that the word "inscriptions" might appear in the title as it appears in the body of the bill. He has prepared a concurrent resolution. The Chair does not see the gentleman from Pennsylvania present.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 49.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 5013) entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to sanction the use of certain titles on tablets and other memorials" the Clerk be authorized and directed to enroll the title so as to read as follows:

"An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to sanction the inscription of titles upon certain monuments, tablets, or other memorials."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I would like to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I would like to inquire whether a bill reported by the special committee provided for in the McKenzie resolution adopted a few moments ago will be a privileged bill?

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether the Speaker has examined it or not, but plainly it would not be a privileged bill. They have not the authority to report at any time. It is just authority to the committee to report a bill.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that it is not the understanding of the members of the joint committee that this will give the bill any special status at all, but that it will have to be reached in its regular order if put on the calendar, in case we should report by bill or by a special rule.

Mr. MANN. It never would be reached in its regular order.

Mr. McKENZIE. It might if we stayed here long enough.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; that committee would not be called. This does not give it a privileged status.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. So far as I know, I would have no objection to its being privileged.

Mr. MANN. I should.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the gentleman's inquiry has been answered by the gentleman from Illinois and the Chair concurs in the view expressed by him.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. KOPP, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for three days on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 41 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 2, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.
